Mr. WRIGHT. So far from being satisfied by what the Senator has said, I think I am confirmed in the justice of the position I have taken. He says the time taken in the consideration of this abstract question, if devoted to the bill, could have passed it. That is true enough; but so you can pass a dozen such bills without any trouble if you just let them go on and make no objection to them. But why not amend your general law at once? The committee, if they will turn their attention to the general law and amend it, can obviate the necessity of introducing these special bills. It is not the fault of these gentlemen, nor the fault of the committee, it is said. I do not lay it to the fault of any person. It is said this can be done not by a mere amendment, but by a new chapter. That is an amendment of the general law. Why not introduce a new chapter and have a general law, and thus avoid these special acts? I think there is a very great propriety that that should be done instead of having our time taken up here by these special acts.

I do not know anything about the circumstances of this particular case. You pass this bill; you give to this company by the indorsement of Congress a national character, and you thus give them an opportunity by your special act to go out and have special powers of a national character all over this Union. I say give us a general law under which all persons, without an indorsement of their names in a special act, can incorporate. It is done so in the States. Why not do it here, I repeat?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator shows how little he knows about the character of this bill by saying that the corporation is endowed with a national character and empowered to transact business all over the country. If he had listened to the terms of the bill, he would have ascertained that it is confined exclusively to this District. Therefore his objection certainly has no significance.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have not said that they had such powers, but I said that this legislation had the effect of giving them a national character. It gives them an indorsement by Congress and confers on them special powers, whereas I say that should not be done.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Key, Logan, McMillan, Morton, Spencer, West, Windom, and Withers—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Hamilton, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Randolph, Sargent, Sharon, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, and Wright—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Christiancy, Conkling, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, English, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, and Saulsbury—33.

So the bill was rejected.

WAGON-ROADS IN OREGON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 536) granting the right of way through the public lands for wagon-roads over the Blue Mountains, in the State of Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that that be laid over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

SWAMP LANDS IN FLORIDA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 49) to confirm to the State of Florida the swamp and overflowed lands granted under the act of September 28, 1850.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that that lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 626) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Let that pass over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BUTLER, MILLER & CO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 627) making an appropriation to pay the claim of Butler, Miller & Co.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary commenced to read the report.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives appeared at the bar (at one o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) and their presence was announced by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers on the part of the House of Representatives are admitted and the Sergeant-at-Arms will conduct them to seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were thereupon escorted by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate to the seats assigned to them in the area in front of the Chair.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives are ready to exhibit on the part of the House articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Hear ye! hear ye! hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

Mr. Manager LORD rose and read the articles of impeachment, as follows:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the names of themselves and of all the people of the United States of America against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors while in said office.

ARTICLE I.

That William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, to wit, on the 8th day of October, 1870, had the power and authority, under the laws of the United States, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States; that said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, on the day and year aforesaid, promised to appoint one Caleb P. Marsh to maintain said trading establishment at said military post; that thereafter, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, the said Caleb P. Marsh and one John S. Evans entered into an agreement in writing substantially as follows, to wit:

"Articles of agreement made and entered into this 8th day of October, A. D. 1870, by and between John S. Evans, of Fort Sill, Indian Territory, United States of America, of the first part, and Caleb P. Marsh, of No. 51 West Thirty-fifth street, of the city, county, and State of New York, of the second part, witnesseth, namely:

"Whereas the said Caleb P. Marsh has received from General William W. Belknap, Secretary of War of the United States, the appointment of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid; and whereas the name of said John S. Evans is to be filled into the commission of appointment of said post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid by permission and at the instance and request of said Caleb P. Marsh, and for the purpose of carrying out the terms of this agreement; and whereas said John S. Evans is to hold said position of post-trader as aforesaid solely as the appointee of said Caleb P. Marsh, and for the purposes hereinafter stated:

"Now, therefore, sa d John S. Evans, in consideration of said appointment and the sum of $1 to him in hand paid by said Caleb P. Marsh, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, hereby covenants and agrees to pay to said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $12,000 annually, payable quarterly in advance, in the city of New York aforesaid; said sum to be so payable during the first year of this agreement absolutely and under all circumstances, anything hereinafter contained to the contrary notwithstanding; and thereafter said sum shall be so payable, unless increased or reduced in amount, in accordance with the subsequent provisions of this agreement.

"In consideration of the premises, it is mutually agreed between the parties aforesaid as follows, namely:

"First. This agreement is made on the basis of seven cavalry companies of the United States Army, which are now stationed at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Second. If at the end of the first year of this agreement the forces of the United States Army stationed at Fort Sill aforesaid shall be increased or diminished not to exceed one hundred men, then this agreement shall remain in full force and unchanged for the next year. If, however, the said forces shall be increased or diminished beyond the number of one hundred men, then the amount to be paid under this agreement by said John S. Evans to said Caleb P. Marsh shall be increased or reduced in accordance therewith and in proper proportion thereto. The above rule laid down for the continuation of this agreement at the close of the first year thereof shall be applied at the close of each succeeding year so long as this agreement shall remain in force and effect.

"Third. This agreement shall remain in force and effect so long as said Caleb P. Marsh shall hold or control, directly or indirectly, the appointment and position of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Fourth. This agreement shall take effect from the date and day the Secretary of War aforesaid shall sign the commission of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid, said commission to be issued to said John S. Evans at the instance and request of said Caleb P. Marsh, and solely for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this agreement.

"Fifth. Exception is hereby made in regard to the first quarterly payment under this agreement, it being agreed and understood that the same may be paid at any time within the next thirty days after the said Secretary of War shall sign the aforesaid commission of post-trader at Fort Sill.

"Sixth. Said Caleb P. Marsh is at all times, at the request of said John S. Evans, to use any proper influence he may have with said Secretary of War for the protection of said John S. Evans while in the discharge of his legitimate duties in the conduct of the business as post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Seventh. Said John S. Evans is to conduct the said business of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid solely on his own responsibility and in his own name, it being expressly agreed and understood that said Caleb P. Marsh shall assume no liability in the premises whatever.

"Eighth. And it is expressly understood and agreed that the stipulations and covenants aforesaid are to apply to and bind the heirs, executors, and administrators of the respective parties.

"In witness whereof the parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written.

"JOHN S. EVANS. [SEAL.]
"C. P. MARSH. [SEAL.]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of—
"E. T. BARTLETT."

That thereafter, to wit, on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War aforesaid, did, at the instance and request of said Marsh, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint said John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at Fort Sill, the military post aforesaid, and in consideration of said appointment of said Evans, so made by him as Secretary of War as aforesaid, the said Belknap did, on or about the 2d day of November, 1870, unlawfully and corruptly receive from said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500; and that at divers times thereafter, to wit, on or about the 17th day of January, 1871, and at or about the end of each three months during the term of one whole year, the said William W. Belknap, while still in office as Secretary of War as aforesaid, did unlawfully receive from said Caleb P. Marsh like sums of $1,500, in consideration of the appointment of the said John S. Evans by him, the said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, and in consideration of his permitting said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post during that time; whereby the said William W. Belknap, who was then Secretary of War as aforesaid, was guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE II.

That said William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, did, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on the 4th day of November, 1873, willfully, corruptly, and unlawfully take and receive from one Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500, in consideration that he would continue to permit one John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, which said establishment said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, was authorized by law to permit to be maintained at said military post, and which the said Evans had been before that time appointed by said Belknap to maintain; and that said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, for said consideration, did corruptly permit the said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post. And so the said Belknap was thereby guilty, while he was Secretary of War, of a high misdemeanor in his said office.

ARTICLE III.

That said William W. Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States of America before and during the month of October, 1870, and continued in office as such Secretary of War until the 2d day of March, 1876; that as Secretary of War as aforesaid said Belknap had authority, under the laws of the United States, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, not in the vicinity of any city or town; that on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, did, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint one John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at said military post, and that said John S. Evans, by virtue of said appointment, has since, till the 2d day of March, 1876, maintained a trading establishment at said military post, and that said Evans, on the 8th day of October, 1870, before he was so appointed to maintain said trading establishment as aforesaid, and in order to procure said appointment and to be continued therein, agreed with one Caleb P. Marsh that, in consideration that said Belknap would appoint him, the said Evans, to maintain said trading establishment at said military post, at the instance and request of said Marsh, he, the said Evans, would pay to him a large sum of money, quarterly, in advance, from the date of his said appointment by said Belknap, to wit, $12,000 during the year immediately following the 10th day of October, 1870, and other large sums of money, quarterly, during each year that he, the said Evans, should be permitted by said Belknap to maintain said trading establishment at said post; that said Evans did pay to said Marsh said sum of money quarterly during each year after his said appointment, until the month of December, 1875, when the last of said payments was made; that said Marsh, upon the receipt of each of said payments, paid one-half thereof to him, the said Belknap. Yet the said Belknap, well knowing these facts, and having the power to remove said Evans from said position at any time and to appoint some other person to maintain said trading establishment, but criminally disregarding his duty as Secretary of War and basely prostituting his high office to his lust for private gain, did unlawfully and corruptly continue said Evans in said position and permit him to maintain said establishment at said military post during all of said time, to the great injury and damage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States stationed at said post, as well as of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens of the United States, against public policy, and to the great disgrace and detriment of the public service; whereby the said William W. Belknap was, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE IV.

That said William W. Belknap, while he was in office and acting as Secretary of War of the United States of America, did, on the 10th day of October, 1870, in the exercise of the power and authority vested in him as Secretary of War as aforesaid by law, appoint one John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, and he, the said Belknap, did receive, from one Caleb P. Marsh, large sums of money for and in consideration of his having so appointed said John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at said military post, and for continuing him therein, whereby he has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in his said office.

Specification 1.—On or about the 2d day of November, 1870, said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and for continuing him therein.

Specification 2.—On or about the 17th day of January, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and for continuing him therein.

Specification 3.—On or about the 18th day of April, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 4.—On or about the 25th day of July, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 5.—On or about the 10th day of November, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 6.—On or about the 15th day of January, 1872, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 7.—On or about the 13th day of June, 1872, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 8.—On or about the 22d day of November, 1872, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 9.—On or about the 28th day of April, 1873, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,000, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 10.—On or about the 16th day of June, 1873, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,700, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 11.—On or about the 14th day of November, 1873, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 12.—On or about the 22d day of January, 1874, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 13.—On or about the 10th day of April, 1874, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 14.—On or about the 9th day of October, 1874, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 15.—On or about the 24th day of May, 1875, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 16.—On or about the 17th day of November, 1875, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 17.—On or about the 15th day of January, 1876, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $750, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

ARTICLE V.

That one John S. Evans was, on the 10th day of October, in the year 1870, appointed by the said Belknap to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post on the frontier, not in the vicinity of any city or town, and said Belknap did, from that day continuously to the 2d day of March, 1876, permit said Evans to maintain the same; and said Belknap was induced to make said appointment by the influence and request of one Caleb P. Marsh; and said Evans paid to said Marsh, in consideration of such influence and request and in consideration that he should thereby induce said Belknap to make said appointment, divers large sums of money at various times, amounting to about $12,000 a year from the date of said appointment to the 25th day of March, 1872, and to about $6,000 a year thereafter until the 2d day of March, 1876, all of which said Belknap well knew; yet said Belknap did, in consideration that he would permit said Evans to continue to maintain said trading establishment and in order that said payments might continue and be made by said Evans to said Marsh as aforesaid, corruptly receive from said Marsh, either to his, the said Belknap's, own use or to be paid over to the wife of said Belknap, divers large sums of money at various times, namely: the sum of $1,500 on or about the 2d day of November, 1870; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 17th day of January, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 18th day of April, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 25th day of July, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 10th day of November, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 15th day of January, 1872; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 13th day of June, 1872; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 22d day of November, 1872; the sum of $1,000 on or about the 28th day of April, 1873; the sum of $1,700 on or about the 16th day of June, 1873; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 4th day of November, 1873; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 22d day of January, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 10th day of April, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 9th day of October, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 24th day of May, 1875; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 17th day of November, 1875; the sum of $750 on or about the 15th day of January, 1876; all of which acts and doings were while the said Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States, as aforesaid, and were a high misdemeanor in said office.

And the House of Representatives by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles or accusation or impeachment against the said William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article, accusation, or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said William W. Belknap may be put to answer the high crimes and misdemeanors in office herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair informs the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

The managers thereupon withdrew.

G. B. TYLER AND E. H. LUCKETT—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the permission of the Senate, the Chair will lay before it a message from the President of the United States.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

For the reasons set forth in the accompanying communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, I have the honor to return herewith without my approval Senate bill No. 489, entitled "An act for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 31, 1876.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask that not only the message but the accompanying documents be read, and I shall then move their reference to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The accompanying communication will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 30, 1876.

To the President:

Referring to the letter of the 25th instant, written by your direction, transmitting Senate bill No. 489, for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, and requesting my opinion as to the propriety of its approval by you, I have to say that there are no data on file in the Department, so far as I can learn, which indicate that the amount it is proposed by this bill to refund to the assignees of Mr. Cheatham was wrongfully collected or that the amount should be refunded.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in his report to me in reference to the matter, says:

"The re-imbursement to the United States by said Cheatham of the salary paid to this store-keeper by the collector of internal revenue for the months of December, 1869, and January, 1870, was in accordance with the provisions of joint resolution of March 29, 1869, (volume 16 Statutes at Large, page 52,) and there appears to be no reason for the refunding by the United States to the assignees of said Cheatham the salary of this store-keeper that would not apply with equal force to similar payments by all other distillers who were operating their distilleries or had spirits in their warehouse at that time."

The facts above stated are considered by this Office valid and serious objections to the approval of this bill, and they would have been communicated to the congressional committees before the passage of the bill had they called the attention of this Office to the subject.

The bill is herewith returned.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the message be printed and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McCREERY. I want to make a few remarks before it is committed.

I confess my surprise at the contents of the extraordinary document which has just been read at the desk. It is probably the most remarkable State paper that ever emanated from the Executive Mansion. It is the joint production of the brain-power of this Administration. As a measure of economy it might live in the memories of a grateful people, unless its own injustice shall mark it for an early grave. The veto power was vested in the President to protect the people against the consequences of hasty and inconsiderate legislation. There is a check upon the abuse of this power in a two-third vote of each branch of Congress. The bill which has been returned with the objections of the President was neither hastily nor inconsiderately passed. It was carefully investigated by two committees and has twice passed the Senate. Under these circumstances we are led to inquire into the probable causes of its return, in order to vindicate the petitioners, the witnesses, the committees, and the Senate against the implied censure of their action in the premises. It is manifest from the phraseology of the message that it was prepared without reference to the evidence and in utter forgetfulness of the action of the Senate and of the Treasury Department in the matter. The veto itself is a hasty and ill-advised act, and should find a correction in the justice of the American Congress.

The petitioners, Drs. G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, who are my neighbors and friends, need no vindication at my hands. It is no disparagement to the Secretary of the Treasury to say that, in point of sterling integrity, they are his peers or the peers of any man here or elsewhere. They would not pollute their touch with a cent that they did not honestly and conscientiously believe to be their own. They have that sensitive honor which shrinks instinctively from the semblance of wrong. The witnesses are numbered among our best and most reliable citizens, and the tongue of the foulest calumniator would not venture to whisper a suspicion of falsehood or perjury in connection with their names. William H. Perkins, Captain John Woolfolk, and William O. Speed, the store-keeper, move in a sphere beyond the reach of slander.

What, then, are the facts? William T. Cheatham gave notice that on the 14th day of December, 1869, he would permanently discontinue his occupation, and the officer of the Government proceeded to lock his furnace-doors and to close his distillery on that day. On and before the day mentioned Cheatham had sold his entire stock of whisky, the purchasers demanding permits for its removal and tendering the tax due to the Government, the collector refusing to grant the one or receive the other. Thus was this unfortunate man, ruined in his circumstances, worn down by disease, and a burden to his friends, compelled to pay $4 a day for a store-keeper until the 26th day of the following January, almost snatching the bread from the mouths of his helpless children. The two or three hundred dollars which he was forced by the Government to pay for the worthless bauble called the Tice meter was gone, and he, too, was rapidly going; but he had two friends who stood by him until he was wrapped in his winding-sheet, and they were the petitioners. In the jaws of death he thought of them, and sought to make some small return for their kindness and for their sacrifices in his behalf; but the Executive veto is interposed, and I fear the ends of justice will be defeated.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue seems to think that any other distiller would have an equal right to make this demand, which only proves in my mind that he knows nothing at all about the merits of this application, and that the testimony relied upon by the petitioners was in the Capitol and on the files of the Senate when the Executive veto was prepared at the other end of the avenue. The suspicions of the Commissioner were evidently aroused from a belief on his part that there had been no application to his Department for the information which he would have been so ready and so willing to impart. He is aware that he is not the first man who ever filled this position, and if he had extended his researches back as far as to the days of his immediate predecessor it might have saved his official dignity from a fancied slight.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me a moment? I simply desire to ask a question. The Senator from Kentucky reflects very severely upon the Executive for vetoing this bill.

Mr. McCREERY. I have sought to make no unjust reflections.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to put this question: Whether the mistake (because I agree with the Senator fully that there is a mistake in this veto) does not attach entirely to the Treasury Department, and not to the Executive? In other words, could the Executive have done otherwise on the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury than he did? That is the point. I agree that the veto is all wrong.

Mr. McCREERY. We are told, and we believe truly, that "there were brave men before Agamemnon," and so there were Commissioners of Internal Revenue before Daniel D. Pratt was installed into that honorable position. So far from making any attempt to evade or avoid the scrutiny of the Commissioner, the papers were filed first in his Office, and his special attention was directed to them by a resolution of the Senate, and his response accompanying the papers was sent to the Committee on Claims, of which it is believed Mr. Pratt was a member at the time. If he ever had a doubt as to the merits of this claim, I never heard of its utterance in committee or on the floor of the Senate. Whenever a wrong is inflicted upon the citizen he turns trustfully and hopefully to his Government for redress; and if that redress is thwarted by unauthorized executive interference it becomes the high and the solemn duty of Congress to come to the rescue by the only means in their power, a two-thirds vote, in vindication of the right and in condemnation of the wrong. I ask that the Clerk shall read the report of the Committee on Claims.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, May 25, 1874:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of W. T. Cheatham, praying to be re-imbursed for certain moneys wrongfully paid to the Government as a distiller of whisky, in Kentucky, have had the same under consideration, and beg to submit the following report:

William T. Cheatham was engaged in the manufacture of whisky in Daviess County, Kentucky, in the year 1869; that petitioners were his bondsmen to the Government as such distiller; that on the 14th day of December, A. D. 1869, said Cheatham permanently discontinued his said distillery, and all taxes and charges then due on all liquors in bond were then tendered to the collector of internal revenue by Cheatham, having sold all said liquor to third parties; and on that day notice of such permanent discontinuance was filed in the office of the United States assessor of the second district of Kentucky, in which district said distillery was located; that the collector of said district wrongfully refused to issue permits to the purchasers of said whisky for the removal of the same from the bonded warehouse for a period of fifteen days, in December, 1869, and twenty-six days in 1870, in all, forty-one days, during which period of forty-one days said Cheatham was wrongfully assessed the salary of a store-keeper of said bonded warehouse, to wit, $4 per day, amounting in all to the sum of $164, which amount said Cheatham afterward, in December, 1870, paid to the collector of internal revenue for said district; that, in consideration of moneys advanced by petitioners to said Cheatham and for his benefit, he, Cheatham, transferred to petitioners all his right to such moneys so wrongfully collected and the right to collect the same.

Wherefore your committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. McCREERY. I ask that the Clerk shall read the resolution offered by myself January 5, 1874.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CLAIM OF W. T. CHEATHAM.

Mr McCREERY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish to the Senate the papers on file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in the case of W. T. Cheatham, distiller in the second district of Kentucky, with an opinion from said Commissioner of Internal Revenue as to the equity of a drawback of $164 alleged to have been improperly and unlawfully collected by the revenue officers of said district."

Mr. McCREERY. I ask for the reading of the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1874.

SIR: As requested in the Senate resolution of the 5th instant, I herewith transmit the papers in the case of W. T. Cheatham, distiller in the second district of Kentucky, together with an opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as to the equity of refunding to the said Cheatham the sum of $164.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

Hon. M. H. CARPENTER,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

Mr. McCREERY. I ask the Clerk to read the following letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1874.

SIR: In response to the inclosed resolution of the Senate, I herewith transmit to you the original application on form 46 of E. H. Luckett and G. B. Tyler, assignees and sureties on the distiller's bond of William T. Cheatham, of the second district of Kentucky, together with all the papers accompanying said application, asking to have refunded the sum of $164. It appears from the correspondence of this Office with Collector J. R. Rend that William T. Cheatham was in arrears for taxes due from him as distiller; but if it shall, however, be shown that all the whisky in bond had been sold to bona fide purchasers and that the taxes due thereon had been tendered to the collector prior to the 14th day of December, 1869, (the day of permanent discontinuance of said William T. Cheatham's distillery,) and, before seizure and distraint, then I am of opinion that William T. Cheatham has an equitable claim to have refunded to him the amount paid by him for store-keeper's salary after the permanent discontinuance of his distillery.

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

Hon. W. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Mr. McCREERY. I move now that the veto message and the papers be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2454) amending the laws granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and their widows; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2678) to authorize the sale of the Pawnee Indian reservation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill which was interrupted by the message.

Mr. THURMAN. The bill had been read and also the report, and the question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. THURMAN. I appeal to the Senator to let a vote be taken on this bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the bill?

Mr. THURMAN. It is a little private bill, Senate bill No. 627, making an appropriation to pay the claim of Butler, Miller & Company.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the bill read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say that this bill and the one that follows stand upon precisely the same facts. If this bill is considered now, I shall insist that the other be considered also. If the Senator from Pennsylvania gives way with his motion for an executive session at this time, I shall expect him to give way with the understanding that we shall consider both bills.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We had better have an executive session then.

Mr. WRIGHT. They turn upon precisely the same facts. If one case is decided, the other is decided also.

Mr. THURMAN. What is the other case?

Mr. WRIGHT. The bill immediately following. One is for the relief of Butler, Miller & Company, and the other is for the relief of Anderson and White, for property taken at the same time, under precisely the same circumstances. The same facts are involved in the one case as in the other.

Mr. THURMAN. Then both ought to pass.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Then I am sorry to say that I cannot give way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania insists upon his motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The question is upon that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2454) amending the laws granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and their widows was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. No. 2678) to authorize the sale of the Pawnee Indian reservation was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That the articles of impeachment presented this day by the House of Representatives be printed for the use of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 4, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 58) to pay the First National Bank of Saint Albans, in the county of Franklin, and State of Vermont, the value of certain United States Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agent of the United States and forcibly taken therefrom by raiders from Canada in October, 1864;

An act (S. No. 575) for the relief of Charles E. Hovey;

An act (S. No. 682) to suspend the sale of the jail on Judiciary Square, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 2143) for the sale of the arsenal and lot at Stonington, Connecticut; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 12) declaring the 14th day of April, 1876, a holiday.

RELIEF FOR PAWNEE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States:

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith for your information a communication from the Secretary of the Interior of this date upon the urgent necessities of the Pawnee Indians.

This tribe has recently been removed to the Indian Territory, and is without means of subsistence except as supplied by the Government. Its members have evinced a disposition to become self-supporting, and it is believed that only temporary aid will be required by them. The sums advanced by the United States for this purpose it is expected will be refunded from the proceeds of the sale of the Pawnee reservation in Nebraska.

The present destitute condition of these Indians would seem to call for immediate relief, and I recommend the subject to your early and favorable consideration.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 3, 1876.

The message and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HOLIDAY ON APRIL 14, 1876.

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the House the following communication.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 3, 1876.

SIR: On behalf of the national committee of arrangements and in the name of the colored people of the United States, I have the honor to express most grateful thanks for the passage by the House of Representatives of the joint resolution (S. No. 12) declaring the 14th day of April, 1876, a holiday, and to extend to you, and through you to the honorable House, a most cordial invitation to be present at the inauguration ceremonies of the Lincoln statue, which will be unveiled in Lincoln Park, in this city, at one o'clock p. m. on that day.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN M. LANGSTON,
Chairman of the Committee.

Hon. M. C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. HOAR, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be directed, in behalf of the House, to accept the invitation just received to be present at the unveiling of the statue of Abraham Lincoln on the 14th day of April, current.

The SPEAKER. Before taking the sense of the House on this resolution, the Chair will direct the communication from Mr. Langston to be again read.

The communication was read as above.

The question was upon adopting the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. Does that involve an adjournment of the House over that day?

Mr. HOAR. That day is declared by a joint resolution of Congress to be a legal holiday for this year; therefore there will be no business of the House on that day.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not?

Mr. HOAR. It is a legal holiday.

Mr. RANDALL. The House can sit on Sunday if it chooses.

Mr. HOAR. I do not desire to press this resolution if there is any serious objection to it. Congress having by law made the 14th of April a legal holiday for the purpose of this celebration, and as there will be no business transacted that day in any of the Departments of the Government or in any court, I supposed that there would be none done in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts indicate the hour at which this unveiling will take place?

Mr. HOAR. At one o'clock on the 14th.

Mr. RANDALL. This would involve the loss of that day.

Mr. HOAR. I think there will be no objection; but I certainly will not press the resolution against objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I will make none.

Mr. COX. I remember when this joint resolution was proposed to make the 14th day of April a legal holiday, and the idea was to make it a legal holiday for the employés of the Government and also for commercial and other purposes; but it was never intended that Congress should lose that day. We sometimes have sat here on the 22d day of February and on the 8th of January. That would be no reflection on the gentlemen who invite us. On the contrary, we have done all that we can to be courteous to them.

Mr. HOAR. This is a matter in which the entire colored people of this country take very great interest. From their little means they have contributed a considerable sum of money and have obtained a statue of Mr. Lincoln, whom they regard as one of their great benefactors, as I am sure all American citizens do, which statue is said by competent judges to be a work of art of a very high order. It is to be presented by the colored people to the nation and placed in a public park in this city. Now as Congress, in recognition of that interest, has declared that that day shall be a legal holiday, I am quite sure the House will be glad, even if it does transact business in other portions of the day, to interrupt its business at one o'clock for a short time, so that we may see the statue unveiled.

Mr. KASSON. And we can have an evening session, if necessary, on that day.

Mr. RANDALL. I admit myself that there are peculiar reasons why honor should be done to the memory of Mr. Lincoln. With this explanation, I will interpose no objection whatever to the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. HOAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FAYETTEVILLE, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. WADDELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3023) to authorize the purchase of a building at Fayetteville, North Carolina, for a post-office; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES SIGNAL SERVICE.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask unanimous consent to present the resolutions of the Vessel Owners and Captains' Association of Philadelphia. I ask that they may be read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The resolutions, which were read, are as follows:

VESSEL OWNERS AND CAPTAINS' ASSOCIATION,
Philadelphia, March 16, 1876.

At the annual meeting of the Vessel Owners and Captains' Association, held March 1, 1876, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted, and ordered to be sent to the members of Congress:

Resolved, That this association does hereby recognize the efficiency of the United States Signal Service, and the importance of the results of its observations to commerce.

Resolved, That we do hereby authorize and instruct the board of directors to at all times urge upon Congress the great importance of making liberal appropriations to the United States Signal Service, to the end that its observations may be extended in all directions, but more especially to storms approaching our coasts from the Atlantic.

Resolved, That this association recognize the importance of the work now being carried on by the hydrographic branch of the Navy Department, and that we feel the importance of continuing the same by a liberal appropriation by the Government.

Extract from the minutes.

JOHN W. EVERMAN,
President.

Attest:

CHAS. H. STEELMAN,
Secretary.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 692) to amend chapter 166 of the laws of the second session of the Forty-third Congress; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate is ready to receive the managers for the purpose of exhibiting articles of impeachment, agreeably to notice received.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 1044 OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. KNOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask the unanimous consent of the House to report back the bill (H. R. No. 2655) to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes, with the recommendation that it be immediately passed. I desire to say for the information of the House that I have had conferences with the Solicitor of the Treasury and with the Attorney-General of the United States in regard to the subject-matter of the bill, and that they are both exceedingly anxious that it shall become a law at the earliest possible moment.

The bill was read. It provides that section 1044 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

No person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offense not provided for in section 1043 or in section 1046, unless the indictment shall be found, or the information instituted, within three years after such offense has been or may be committed.

Mr. KNOTT. I send to the desk to be read for the information of the House a letter from the Attorney-General on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, April 1, 1876.

SIR: In the prosecution of various crimes against the United States the Government is likely to be embarrassed by the statute of limitations which will take effect before the evidence can be sufficiently developed to procure indictments. As the law now stands, crimes arising under the revenue laws are not barred by the statute of limitations until the expiration of five years next after the crime is committed, but in all other cases, except for a capital offense, no person can be prosecuted unless the indictment is found within two years after the offense is committed.

I respectfully suggest that there are many crimes the punishment of which is quite as much demanded by public justice as is the punishment of crimes against the revenue laws; and that the limit of two years, in a country like ours, is too short.

I respectfully suggest to the committee that the limitation of two years named in section 1044 of the Revised Statutes be repealed and the limit be made three years instead of two.

I have the honor to remain, your very obedient,

EDWARDS PIERREPONT,
Attorney-General.

Hon. J. PROCTOR KNOTT,
Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not distinctly hear the bill when read. I would like to have it reported again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. LAPHAM. I rise to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I suggest that this limitation be extended to five years instead of three, so as to make all prosecutions uniform in the Federal courts.

Mr. KNOTT. I have no objection to the gentleman's offering an amendment to that effect.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I desire to inquire of the Chair if an objection would carry this bill over?

The SPEAKER. It would do so, if made in time; but the Chair cannot hold that an objection now is in time.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. Are amendments in order?

The SPEAKER. With the consent of the gentleman who controls the floor.

Mr. LAPHAM. With the consent of the chairmain of the committee, I move to strike out the word "three" and insert "five."

Mr. KNOTT. I yield to the gentleman for the purpose of offering that amendment.

Mr. LAPHAM. This will make the law of limitation uniform in regard to all criminal offenses.

Mr. McCRARY. If that amendment should be adopted it would be necessary to remodel the entire bill. As the bill stands now it applies to all offenses except those named in two sections, to wit, section 1043 and section 1046; that is to say, as reported it applies to all except revenue cases and capital offenses. If the limitation be made five years, that limitation will apply to all except those cases. And as the law now applies that limitation to revenue cases, I apprehend that the law in relation to revenue cases might be repealed by this act if passed with this amendment.

Mr. KNOTT. I call the previous question on the bill and amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make a suggestion to the chairman of the committee and to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] also. If this bill applies to all offenses committed within the District of Columbia, and not merely offenses against the United States in general, but local offenses, for instance, libel committed in the District of Columbia, I think the extension to five years is too broad. If it is proposed to extend the limitation to five years, I think the bill should be recommitted, and some careful limitations and exceptions expressed. I do not wish to interfere with the course of the bill, but merely submit this suggestion to the discretion of the chairman. Certainly a statute of limitations much shorter than five years ought to apply to cases of libel in this District.

Mr. KNOTT. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that in yielding to the gentleman from New York in submitting his amendment I by no means concurred in the propriety of it. I think myself that the bill as reported by the committee is proper, more especially as it meets the concurrence of the Departments immediately interested in its passage, and which desire its passage at once. There is no objection at all to the limitation of three years, whereas there might be objection to extending it further, and I would not like to have the safety of the bill jeopardized by its being amended, inasmuch as it meets now the approbation of the Department.

Mr. LAPHAM. With the permission of the chairman of the committee, I will say that at the suggestion of a member of the Judiciary Committee I withdraw the amendment, as it is proposed, I understand, to consider a bill hereafter making the rule uniform in the United States courts.

Mr. KNOTT. I call the previous question.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to the question whether this bill would not apply to cases already barred. I am satisfied that it is the law that it should not apply, and it will depend on the decision of judges from whom there is no appeal. I therefore want it expressed in the statute so there may be no doubt on the subject.

Mr. KNOTT. That question was discussed in the committee, and they agreed beyond any kind of controversy that it cannot apply to any cases already barred.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am satisfied that that is the law, but why not express it?

Mr. KNOTT. I have called the previous question.

The question was on seconding the previous question; and on a division there were—ayes 71, noes 35; no quorum voting.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I feel constrained to ask for tellers.

Mr. KNOTT. If the gentleman will allow me one word of explanation he will probably withdraw the call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must suggest that debate is not in order, as the previous question is pending.

Mr. KNOTT. Very well.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KNOTT, and Mr. CALDWELL of Alabama, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 118, noes 35.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HARRISON. I rise also to a question of privilege. I find in the RECORD, in the discussion growing out of the closing of the doors late last evening, that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] asked whether the doors being closed would not be injustice to the members who could not then get in. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] remarked "they ought to have been here, and they are not entitled to that consideration." And I understand, sir, that warrants were issued for the apprehension of those not present. [Laughter.] I wish to state that since the beginning of the session I have never been out of this Hall a single day, and I have never been absent from my seat for over a few minutes at a time.

For the last three weeks I have been busy in an act of charity, endeavoring to discover the reasons of the bad ventilation of the House, for the preservation of the lives and health of the members of this House. In pursuance of these duties I was compelled to go into the air-ducts leading to this House, and was exposed to the vicissitudes of heat and cold, of a temperature sometimes at 150°, and then almost freezing. The result is, sir, that I have been attacked by a violent rheumatic affection, culminating yesterday so that I could not occupy my seat for longer than a few moments at a time. Having voted on the Kilbourn resolution, I asked my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] if I then could not go. I was told that nothing more would be done; and while the propriety of this House was being shocked by the confusion of last evening's proceeding, I was seated in an electrical chair, my nerves being shocked by the currents of lightning rushing through them.

I think, sir, under the circumstances the remarks of my friend, Mr. RANDALL, were uncalled for, and had he thought for a moment he certainly would have excused me at least.

DR. MARSHALL'S INDELIBLE INK.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be instructed to inquire into the merits of Dr. D. M. Marshall's patented indelible ink for the cancellation of postage-stamps, and also as to the policy of its adoption by the Post-Office Department to prevent the frauds now being perpetrated by the use of washed stamps; and said committee be instructed to report to the House by bill or otherwise.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object unless the gentleman allows an amendment to make the resolution of a general nature.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I cannot see what objection there can be made to it.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution is not before the House.

MILITARY OFFICERS ABSENT FROM DUTY.

Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire and report to this House under what law, in obedience to what orders, for what purpose, and at what expense to the Government Brevet Major-General Emory Upton, Brevet Brigadier-General George A. Forsythe, and Brevet-Major Joseph P. Sanger, officers of the Army of the United States, are now absent in foreign countries, how long they have been so absent, and whether they should not be ordered back to their respective commands.

SEALS, LOCKS, ETC., IN REVENUE SERVICE.

Mr. ELY. The Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department have instructed me to report back a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be requested to furnish this House with copies of all contracts and the character of any verbal contracts entered into by any person or persons for furnishing paper or glass seal locks, or other locks or seals, for their respective Departments, or any branch thereof, since the 4th of March, 1869, to the present time, and to inform this House what, if any, changes in the contracts for such locks or seals have been made, or what, if any, changes have been made in the character of the locks or seals in use, or those which have been in use, and the reasons for such changes; and to furnish all correspondence relating to contracts or to changes made in the contracts or in the character of the various locks or seals used by their respective Departments since that date for the protection of the revenues of the Government; and if any commissions have been instituted, to examine into the character of locks and seals presented to their respective Departments for adoption, the reports made by such commissions, together with the names of the persons constituting such commissions; and further to inform this House what methods are now employed in the shape of locks or seals or other implements for the purpose of protecting bonded goods in transit and goods in bonded warehouses, and the character of such locks or seals or other implements used by the Treasury Department, or that of the Internal Revenue or any of its branches, at the present time, and all expenditures in regard to the same.

The resolution was adopted.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. LORD. On behalf of the managers appointed to conduct the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, I am directed to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the managers appointed to conduct the impeachment of William W. Belknap be authorized to employ a clerk, to be paid $5 per day, and have power to send for persons and papers.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. LORD. In behalf of the managers of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, I ask permission that they may retire from the House for the purpose of presenting the articles of impeachment to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that the committee of managers on the part of the House have leave to retire to present the articles of impeachment in due form and manner to the Senate of the United States?

Mr. KASSON. I suggest that the gentleman enlarge his motion so as to give the managers leave of absence for all proceedings in the performance of their duty as managers.

Mr. LORD. I have no objection to that. But on this occasion, in accordance with the rules of proceeding adopted by the Senate, nothing will be done except the reading of the articles of impeachment. I find that it has not been customary (the case of Andrew Johnson being an exception in this respect) for the House to go over to the Senate on the presentation of articles of impeachment; but when the trial comes on it is usual for the House to go over and attend the opening of the case, and also to adjourn from day to day during the trial for the purpose of enabling members to go there as they please. I have no objection whatever to the suggestion, but I find it is not usual for the House to attend the presentation of the articles.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LORD,] with the modification suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] will be adopted.

There was no objection.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege under the rules. I ask the Clerk to read the latter part of Rule 134.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That ex-members of Congress who are not interested in any claim pending before Congress, and shall so register themselves, may also be admitted within the Hall of the House; and no person except those herein specified shall at any time be admitted to the floor of the House.

Mr. LORD. As a matter of duty, the question having been pressed upon my attention from various quarters, I request that that rule may be enforced, and that ex-members who are admitted to the floor may be required to sign the statement mentioned before they are admitted to the floor.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York also urge the enforcement of the other part of the rule, providing that no other persons than those specified in the rule shall be admitted to the floor?

Several MEMBERS. "O, no!"

The SPEAKER. If the House will so order, the Chair has no doubt that infinite good will result to the public service from such an order. With the loose manner in which the rule on this subject is now enforced, it is impossible to keep the spaces outside the seats of members clear of those not entitled to the privilege of the floor. The Chair is often importuned to give to gentlemen passes to the floor, and many times he feels it his duty not to refuse. Members are no doubt still oftener so importuned, and they often give like permissions or in other ways admit their friends. Now, if the rule is to be enforced, to which the Chair makes no objection, it will add wonderfully to the capacity of this House to proceed expeditiously and intelligently with the transaction of business.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Will the Chair allow me a remark? We have rules already with reference to this question; but they have been not only in this Congress, but within my experience during the last fifteen years, entirely disregarded. I submit whether it is worth while to have any rules at all unless they are rigidly enforced. The complaints now made are only a repetition of the same difficulty that has been experienced here for many years. Therefore I hope that any rule which we may adopt will be enforced, if in securing that end it be necessary to discharge every doorkeeper connected with this establishment.

Mr. RANDALL. During all my service here it has been the uniform practice of all Speakers, I believe, to exercise this privilege of issuing passes to the floor; I say this much in justice to the present occupant of the chair, to show that he is only following the uniform practice in this matter. In some respects the practice has good results; in others I suppose it works evil at times. But in view of the statements made, I think it had better be understood that this rule is to be enforced for the remainder of this session. I think that thereby business will be expedited, members will be more protected from interruption, and, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] suggests, ventilation will be improved.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. LORD. I rise to a question of privilege. I do not understand from the action of the House whether it is expected that the managers in the impeachment shall go to the Senate alone to present the articles of impeachment, or whether the House is to accompany them. If the House is to accompany the managers, the Senate will have to make fuller arrangements than have been made with the expectation of the managers going alone.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LORD,] in his opening statement on this subject, not to express any desire that the House, as a body, should accompany the managers on this occasion to the Senate. If, however, such is the desire of the managers, and the gentleman from New York wishes the sense of the House to be taken on the question, the Chair will submit it.

Mr. LORD. No, sir. A gentleman over here [Mr. KASSON] made, as I understood him, a suggestion of that kind, to which I replied that I had no objection. Conforming to the arrangements made by the Senate, we had supposed that the managers would go over alone and present the articles; but while the Senate of the United States can in a few minutes get ready to receive the House, they are not yet ready. Therefore I have no desire on that subject one way or the other. If the House prefers to go, notice should be sent over to the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. In the instance of the Johnson impeachment the House did go, but that was an impeachment of the President of the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. In the impeachment of Judge Humphreys, of Tennessee, during the Thirty-seventh Congress the House attended the managers to the bar of the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. Those are the only two cases.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs leave to call the attention of the House to the language of the resolution of the Senate which has just been brought here and read. It is in this limited style: That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives the Senate is ready to receive the managers for the purpose of presenting articles of impeachment.

Mr. HOAR. That resolution of the Senate is in reply to a communication from the House that the House had selected managers to present articles of impeachment; that the House did not propose to do it as a body, but by the managers it had selected.

Mr. KELLEY. In the case of the impeachment of Judge Humphreys, I remember it was stated to the House that the usage was for the House to attend the managers. I have never looked up the record myself, but I have a distinct recollection that statement was made and that the House did attend the managers.

Mr. FRYE. It was done only in those two cases.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is demanded, and the morning hour now begins at one o'clock and fifteen minutes. The call of committees for reports of a public nature is now in order, the call resting with the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND.

Mr. SWANN, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3024) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the President to pay over to the government of Japan the fund now in the custody of the Secretary of State, known as the Japanese indemnity fund, including the interest and accumulations thereof, excepting and reserving the sum of $125,000 which is claimed by certain officers and others of the United States Navy, which said sum so reserved shall remain in the custody of the Secretary of State until Congress shall otherwise direct.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order that the bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SWANN. I ask the gentleman to wait until the report I submit from the committee is read by the Clerk.

Mr. HALE. Is it reported for consideration now?

Mr. BANKS. It is not, but for the purpose of having its consideration assigned to a future day.

Mr. HALE. My point of order applies as well that the bill makes a point of order.

Mr. SWANN. I ask that the report I have submitted be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 49) submitted by Mr. MONROE, of Ohio, in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund, having had the same under consideration, have instructed me to report as a substitute therefor the accompanying bill.

The committee further recommend that the accompanying bill be read a first and second time to-day, that it be ordered to be printed, and that the further consideration of the bill be postponed and made the special order for Thursday, April 27 instant, immediately after the morning hour; and that the committee have leave to report upon the facts in connection with the Japanese indemnity fund at the time set for the consideration of the bill, by a printed report.

Mr. BANKS. This bill will necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole, but the Committee on Foreign Affairs has been engaged for some two weeks or more in an investigation of a matter referred to it, and have not had time to agree upon a report. The proposition of the chairman of the committee is, this should be referred to the Committee of the Whole and its consideration assigned for the 27th day of this month, and from day to day until disposed of; and, further, that the committee may have leave to report in print.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARGES AGAINST GEORGE F. SEWARD.

Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back a message from the President, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State in response to a resolution of the House of February 23, calling for information with regard to charges made against George F. Seward, minister to China, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department; which motion was agreed to.

J. E. ROBERTSON & CO.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 901) for the relief of J. E. Robertson & Co., of Indianapolis, Indiana, with a favorable report; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report ordered to be printed.

MINES AND MINING.

Mr. DURHAM. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. House bill No. 2284, reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining, was made the special order for a day now passed, and I would like to know whether I can call that bill up for consideration at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER in the chair.) Committees are now being called for reports of a public nature in the morning hour, and it is not in order for the gentleman to call up for consideration at this time the bill to which he refers.

SECURITY OF PROPERTY IN PATENTS.

Mr. SAMPSON, from the Committee on Patents, submitted an adverse report on a bill (H. R. No. 2492) for the better security of property in patents for metallic castings; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back a bill (S. No. 417) for continuing the work of improvement on the Capitol grounds, with an amendment.

The bill provides that for continuing the work of improvement on the Capitol grounds during the present fiscal year the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated.

The amendment of the committee is to strike out $25,000 and insert $20,000.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I make the point of order that the bill must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, as it makes an appropriation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken, and the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

COUNTY BUILDINGS IN DUBUQUE.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 169) giving the consent of the United States to the county of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, to construct county buildings in Washington Square, in the city of Dubuque, and for other purposes.

The bill was read. It gives the consent of the United States to the proper authorities of the county of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, (the consent of the proper authorities of the city of Dubuque and also of the owners of property fronting on said square or heretofore located by description on said square being first had and obtained,) to the construction of such public buildings as may be necessary for court purposes and for the public officers of said county in the public park in the city of Dubuque known as Washington Square; and whatever title the United States now has to said premises is thereby relinquished to the county of Dubuque for the purposes therein indicated, and for no other.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SECTIONS 4924 TO 4928 OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. SAMPSON. There is another bill on which I have been directed to present a report from the Committee on Patents. I ask unanimous consent that, although the call has passed that committee, I may be allowed to present the report now.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAMPSON, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1470) to repeal sections 4924, 4925, 4926, 4927, and 4928 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CUSTOM-HOUSE LOT IN ROCKLAND, MAINE.

Mr. PLAISTED, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 235) providing for the sale of part of the custom-house lot in Rockland, Maine.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey a strip of land from the easterly side of the custom-house lot in Rockland, Maine, being that part of the lot lying easterly of the proposed street running through the lot, being about 18.6 feet wide at the northerly end and running southerly 121.4 feet to a point, and containing about 1,122 square feet, at public auction or private sale; provided that said land shall be sold for not less than the original cost to the Government; and provided further that the sale of said land shall be made in one year from the approval of the act.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLAISTED moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS MORAN'S PAINTINGS.

Mr. WADDELL, from the Joint Committee on the Library, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the joint resolution (S. No. 11) to authorize the Joint Committee on the Library to send two paintings by Thomas Moran to be exhibited at the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress to permit Thomas Moran to exhibit at the international exposition at Philadelphia the two paintings executed by himself entitled "The Cañons of the Yellowstone" and the "Chasms of the Colorado;" provided the said Moran shall cause the same to be insured to the satisfaction of the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress for the benefit of the United States against loss by accident or otherwise, and shall return the same to their places in the Capitol on or before the 1st day of December next.

The question was on ordering the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The question being taken, there were ayes 52.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. COX said: I would like to hear from the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] his reason for reversing the action of the House the other day on this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is hardly in order to permit debate during a division, but the Chair will tolerate it in order to expedite the business of the House.

Mr. WADDELL. I can only say on behalf of the Library Committee, in answer to the question of the gentleman from New York, what I have already twice said in this House, that this joint resolution was before the Committee on the Library of the Senate, and it comes here as having passed unanimously the Library Committee of the Senate. The conditions on which those paintings are to be taken to the exhibition are set forth in the resolution. But if it is the pleasure of the House to refuse to allow the artist to take his pictures there under those conditions I have no objections to make, nor have the committee. The House can dispose of the matter just as they please. It is desired to take these paintings to the exhibition as specimens of American art. They will be taken there and kept in good order, and will be insured even to the extent of being reproduced if injured. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE.]

Mr. MONROE. My colleague yields to me the floor for a moment, and I am in danger of repeating something he has said, because I did not hear him very distinctly. I will state in a word what was the motive of the Joint Committee on the Library in recommending the passage of this resolution. It is all summed up in a single sentence. We do feel some interest in having a creditable art-exhibition at Philadelphia. That is all there is about it. And we do not know of any paintings about this Capitol which are more characteristic, which are more strictly national, which would be more interesting or more instructive to submit to foreigners visiting this country than those pictures of Moran.

Some members on the floor have spoken to me as if this were in some sense a private bill. It was not with that spirit that the Joint Committee on the Library considered it. Nor is it in that spirit that they have recommended its passage by the House. We have agreed upon it and recommended it in the interest of the centennial exhibition, because we wanted a great art-exhibition there. And, Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will permit me to add that we are in danger of not appearing as well as other nations have appeared in that department when these great exhibitions have been held. At the Paris exposition the British government—I want the gentleman from New York just to hear this—took thirty-five of the best paintings they had from the South Kensington Museum and sent them to Paris at the expense of the government and in charge of officers deputed by the government, in order that Great Britain might appear reputably as a country that could produce great works of art. At that exposition the same thing was done by all the great powers of Europe.

At the Vienna exposition, Great Britain appeared there in great force in this respect. Now, sir, we are to have a great centennial exposition upon our own soil, upon an occasion of great interest, just such an occasion as cannot come again for one hundred years. The Joint Committee on the Library all feel that it would not be creditable for the United States, after a growth and existence of one hundred years, to have an exposition of this kind and invite all the great powers of Europe to be present without offering something worthy the name of art; and, as it is quite in our power to contribute something from the Capitol that would help the reputation of the country in that respect, we thought that we would accede to the request of the painter, who himself offered to take charge of these works, which of course he himself is proud of and would do his best to protect, and to allow him to have these paintings conveyed to Philadelphia.

Mr. PLAISTED. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the committee would not grant the same privilege to other artists whose works are about this Capitol and thus strip the Capitol of art when the Capitol is to be exhibited?

Mr. MONROE. I would reply very frankly that I think the Joint Committee on the Library would be disposed to accede to the same request in the case of other works of art so far as they thought they would do us credit at the exhibition. That is just how I should feel about it.

We shall not be on exhibition in the Capitol. We shall be on exhibition in Philadelphia. We have not invited the world to come to Washington to see the productions of the United States, but to come to Philadelphia, and that is where they will expect to find them.

I have already stated that when an exhibition of this kind has been held on the continent of Europe the great powers have stripped their galleries and left the walls bare in order to make a creditable exhibition.

Mr. PLAISTED. In that case the exhibition was in another country.

Mr. MONROE. They send their works of art to the places where the world would see them. I want to send these works of art to Philadelphia, where those who visit us from abroad will see them and where they will do us some credit. I have no motive in this matter myself, and I think I am justified in saying for the committee that the only motive we have in the world is this: that we want the nation to appear well in this department of art in which we are not of course quite as well up as the older nations relatively to our progress in other respects.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should be very sorry if any of the paintings about this Capitol should be presented to the governments of Europe or to the artists of Europe as an indication of the advancement and progress of the people of the United States in the arts. I do not believe that any of the paintings that have recently been introduced into our Rotunda or into either House of Congress would be a fair specimen or indication of the performances and the advancement which the people of this country have made in the arts. You and I know, sir, that there have been other influences which have in recent years been introduced into the Capitol which have induced the selection and the paying for of artistical productions other than those which have applied exclusively to the merits of the productions themselves, and if the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE,] for whose opinion I have the profoundest respect and who has always been actuated in his course in this House by purely conscientious and correct motives, desires to place this proposition on the ground that we want to exhibit the paintings referred to as an indication of the progress of this great nation in the arts, I take exception. I believe there is no private gallery of paintings in New York, Philadelphia, or Boston that is not far in advance in its productions of art to anything that we have here, and therefore, upon that ground, I should be sorry to see this proposition carried out.

But, sir, the references made to the expositions of London, Paris, and Vienna do not apply to this case. Those expositions were exclusively governmental enterprises; governmental in every sense of the word; governmental in their origin, governmental in their expenditures, governmental in their surveillance and control. Individuals and the people as such had nothing to do with them except to bring their works there for exhibition for the purposes of enterprise and of sale. This is not our case; this centennial exhibition is a private enterprise, very laudable and initiated under circumstances and at a period that necessarily commanded the patriotic attention of the people of the United States, and the Government of the United States has accorded to it its countenance; nothing more, nothing less.

I had the honor to be on the Committee on Foreign Affairs to which this subject was originally referred. We considered it in that relation, and agreed to invite the nations of Europe to recognize and participate with us in this simple exhibition.

Now, sir, whatever the governments of Europe may have done in giving their works of art, as they gave their treasure, as they gave all the power and influence officially of the governments themselves toward the advancement of the exhibition and the progress of the people, not only in the arts but in industry, does not apply to this case. We are asked, after an appropriation of $1,500,000, after giving it our official sanction, after extending invitations to the governments of Europe to send contributions—we are asked to go further, and strip this Capitol of everything in the nature of art belonging to the Government of the United States. We might as well be required to take those paintings beside the Speaker's chair and send them to Philadelphia, because we may as well be asked to contribute them, which, as works of art, are better than those which have been referred to.

Why, sir, if you were to extend that principle, then, as my colleague [Mr. COX] very properly said the other day, you might transfer the Rotunda and the Dome of this Capitol to Philadelphia for the purpose of making a poverty-stricken exhibition to gratify people who have no interest or care for us as a nation or in our Government. I hope this proposition will not be adopted, that we will give nothing that belongs to us officially, in the way of paintings or works of art or anything else, to be shown there at Philadelphia. The people who come to this country from abroad will of course come to Washington; and, if we carry out the principle involved in this joint resolution, they will see that we have stripped our Capitol for the purpose of making an exhibition at Philadelphia. In my judgment that of itself would show us in a very unfavorable light.

Mr. MONROE. I am sure the gentleman from New York does not mean to make the impression that the nation is not be one of the exhibitors at Philadelphia, for all the Departments here are making preparations to exhibit there.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I do not understand that the Government of the United States as such is to be one of the exhibitors at Philadelphia; I understand that the people of the United States are to be exhibitors there.

Mr. MONROE. I am not particular what you call it.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. There is a vast distinction between the Government and the people. The Government, as such, does not appear at Philadelphia, but the people do.

Mr. COX. I did not intend to pursue the little antagonism I made against this joint rule. I simply wished to hear from the gentleman, in some esthetical way and in his own accomplished manner, what reason there was for taking these pictures of physical scenery to Philadelphia, and leaving with us so many of these historial pictures that are centennial in their character. I did not pursue my objection because of a little telegram that came to me just at that time and which made me very good-natured. The telegram reads thus:

Connecticut democratic to the core; house, senate, and State officers elected by the people.

I was so good-natured that I did not like to antagonize my friend at that particular moment. [Laughter.] However, that is a little irrelevant to the question before us.

If, for the purpose of accommodating the artist, we give up these pictures of physical scenery, why may not those other pictures also be transferred, which have more of the elements of the Centennial in them? We have many historical pictures. There is the picture of the Signing of the Declaration of Independence; there is the picture of the Surrender of Cornwallis; there is the picture of the Landing of the Pilgrims, which might be called a double centennial. Besides, I might remark here that some of these pictures could well be spared, and our statuary also, to a large extent. If anybody will look over these pictures of our continental people they will hardly be able to tell General Washington from John Hancock; they all look alike. And if you look at our statuary, there is Christopher Columbus out there playing nine-pins; we might spare him. [Laughter.]

If we go into this business let us spare the worst of these pictures, and keep, as a compliment to this artist, these very fine pictures of our western physical scenery. I am opposed, however, to beginning this work of denuding this Capitol. We want all the attractions here we can get, for the living pictures are not always as attractive as they might be, though they do excite a great deal of interest and admiration sometimes. [Laughter.]

When our visitors come here I would like to have something besides the living pictures to show that our Capitol is properly decorated. There is a piece of statuary down in one of the crypts of this Capitol sent from the West years ago. We do not know the name of the artist. It is a representation of a dying Indian, and I am sure the War Committee and the Indian Committee have not properly studied it. Why is that dying Indian left to a second death, or to an imprisonment worse than Kilbourn's, for he eats nothing? [Laughter.] There he is, low down in the crypt of the Capitol. It is the best piece of sculpture which we have, as Mr. Powers once told me. Now, if you want anything to go to the centennial exhibition, take that dying Indian; but do not commence on these works that represent our western physical scenery, that have no more to do with our Centennial and look no more like the spirit of '76 than I look like Hercules. [Laughter.]

The question was taken upon ordering the joint resolution to be read a third time; and upon a division there were—ayes 51, noes 101.

So the joint resolution was rejected.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER.) Business will be suspended to receive a report from the managers on the part of the House of the impeachment of W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The managers appointed by the House to conduct the impeachment of W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, appeared at the bar of the House, when

Mr. LORD said: Mr. Speaker, the managers of impeachment beg leave to report to the House that the articles of impeachment prepared by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, have been exhibited and read to the Senate, and the Presiding Officer of that body stated to the managers that the Senate would take order in the premises, due notice of which would be given to the House of Representatives.

TEXAS FRONTIER TROUBLES.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I am instructed by the Select Committee on the Frontier Troubles of Texas to report a joint resolution to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande, together with the testimony taken by the committee and the report accompanying the testimony. I move that the joint resolution be made the special order for Thursday, the 20th instant; and I ask that the report, without the testimony, be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) was read a first and second time.

The question was upon the motion to make the joint resolution a special order for Thursday, the 20th instant.

Mr. RANDALL. Not to interfere with the appropriation bills.

Mr. REAGAN. In view of the suggestion made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] that he desired to reserve the privilege of that committee to occupy the time for which this bill may be set, I wish to say that the matter now reported is of very considerable consequence to the whole country; it is of especial importance to the people of the frontier of Texas bordering on Mexico. In addition to the difficulties which have existed there and have threatened for some time past to involve this country and Mexico in war, there is now going on in many portions of Mexico and on that immediate border a revolution which in its effects may involve new and embarrassing complications. It is very desirable that this matter should be acted on as early as possible; and to that end I feel it a duty to ask on behalf of the Committee on Texas Border Troubles, of which I am not a member, that the question shall be considered at the earliest practicable day. If it be set for the 20th of this month, I ask that no exception be made, so that it may absolutely be considered at that time. On a question of such importance the members of the committee will doubtless wish to be heard. It is a question not of local, but of national consequence; and the action taken upon it may save considerable expense, may avoid troublesome complications, and possibly may avert war. I hope, therefore, that it may suit the convenience of the Committee on Appropriations to let the matter be fixed absolutely for the day named.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that I do not underrate the importance of this bill, nor am I desirous to be placed in an attitude of opposition to it; but I suggest that the bill be made a special order for the 20th instant, and from day to day until disposed of, adding my modification that it shall not interfere with the appropriation bills. Then if an appropriation bill should interfere with it on the 20th, it would hold its place and would be reached as soon afterward as possible.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I was about to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what would become of the bill, if when the time named arrives, it should not be taken up?

Mr. RANDALL. In the form in which the gentleman has submitted his motion, if the bill should not be disposed of on the day named, it would drop. With the modification I suggest, the bill would hold its place from day to day until disposed of. Hence with my modification the bill would occupy a more advantageous place than under the motion of the gentleman as offered.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Then I accept the gentleman's modification.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER.) Will the House agree to the motion that the bill be made a special order for the 20th instant immediately after the morning hour and from day to day until disposed of, not to interfere with the regular appropriation bills?

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The report is as follows:

The special committee who were appointed under a resolution of the House of Representatives, passed January 6, 1876, "That the portion of the President's message which refers to the inroads, robberies, and murders along the Mexican border in Texas be referred to a special committee of five members, with instructions to inquire into the causes and the nature and extent of these depredations, and the measures that might prevent their continuance, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report at as early a day as possible," beg leave to submit the following report:

Your committee, in order to obtain the most comprehensive and reliable facts connected with the subject of their investigation, collected from the War Department, from the State Department, and from the proceedings of the State government of Texas, all the important information bearing upon the subject; and also had before them witnesses from whose personal observations a true representation of the condition of the country on the Lower Rio Grande frontier could be gathered.

In the year 1872, three commissioners were appointed by the President, under authority of a joint resolution of both Houses of Congress, approved May 7, 1872, which read as follows:

"Whereas there are complaints of many depredations having been committed for several years past upon the frontiers of the State of Texas, by bands of Indians and Mexicans, who crossed the Rio Grande River into the State of Texas, murdering the inhabitants or carrying them into captivity, and destroying or carrying away the property of the citizens of said State; as also that bands of Indians have committed, and continue to commit, like depredations on the property, lives, and liberty of the citizens along the northern and northwestern frontiers of said State: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to appoint three persons to act as commissioners to inquire into the extent and character of said depredations, by whom committed, their residence or country inhabited by them, the persons murdered or carried into captivity, the character and value of the property destroyed or carried away, from what portions of said State, and to whom the same belonged.

"SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of said commissioners, or a majority of them, as soon as practicable, to proceed to the frontiers of said State and take the testimony, under oath, of such witnesses as may appear before them, after having given notice for ten days previous, by publication in the nearest newspapers, of the time and place of their meeting, of all such depredations, when, where, by and upon whom committed, and shall make up and transmit to the President full reports of their said investigations.

"SEC. 3. That said commissioners shall be entitled to and receive as compensation for their services the sum of $10 per day each, and their traveling expenses to each, for and during the time they shall be engaged in said service; and the sum of $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to pay the expenses of said investigation and said commissioners."

No action has ever been taken in regard to the report of that commission; but, saying nothing of the claims investigated, which do not come properly under the notice of your committee, the statements of facts, the accounts of the murders and robberies, must be considered as correct, and are corroborated by all that came immediately before your committee. We deemed it, therefore, unnecessary to again go over the same ground, but confined our examinations to the condition of that region since the date of the report here mentioned, only referring back occasionally so as to keep the thread of a connected history unbroken. But even for that time the documents from the War and State Departments were found so bulky, and the array of robberies and murders so long, that your committee confined themselves chiefly to the occurrences of the last year and the present condition of that country.

For the same reasons your committee excluded all matter referring to the incursions and raids of Indians, residents of Mexico, near the Upper Rio Grande, into Texas for murder and pillage, and confined themselves to the district in which the raiding is done by the Mexicans residing on the south bank of the Rio Grande, from its mouth up some distance above Laredo, altogether about three hundred to four hundred miles.

SCENE OF THE RAIDS.

The country lying between the Rio Grande (by the Mexicans called Rio Bravo del Norte) and the Nueces River, in the State of Texas, belonged, previous to the Texan war of independence, like all Texas, to Mexico; but while all the rest of Texas was united with the state of Coahuila under one state government, the government of "Coahuila and Texas," this country was a portion of the Mexican state of Tamaulipas.

When Texas achieved her independence, in 1836, the republic claimed the Rio Grande as the boundary-line, and thereby included in her territory this portion of Tamaulipas lying between the Rio Grande and Nueces Rivers. Mexico resisted that claim; and during the nine years of existence of Texas as a sovereign and separate republic, and after Texas had become one of the United States of America, by the act of annexation in 1845, that country was disputed ground. Although the independence of Texas was recognized by Mexico, it was not until after the Mexican war of 1846, and in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, in 1848, that Mexico recognized the Rio Grande as her boundary. The first battles of the war, the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, were fought on that disputed ground, the theater of the present raids.

This country is mostly prairie, about three hundred miles from the coast to its upper line and an average width of one hundred and fifty miles, covered with the most nutritious grasses, and is looked upon as among the best pasture land of all the fine pastures of Western Texas. Before the revolutionary war of Texas it contained vast herds of cattle, horses, and sheep, the owners living partly on the lands and partly in the Mexican towns west of the river. In 1835, just before the war, according to the assessment-rolls of the towns on the Rio Grande, there were over three million head of stock on these plains. (See Executive Document No. 52, Thirty-sixth Congress.) The war followed. During its progress, and after its close, nearly all the inhabitants left, either withdrawing to the south of the river by order of the Mexican generals or keeping close upon the river bank, to be ready to cross. The stock was abandoned and destroyed. None of the people remained to reside there, as they were disarmed by Mexico and treated as enemies by Texas. (See Executive Document No. 52, Thirty-sixth Congress.) The Indians commenced their devastating forays upon the defenseless country. On the early American maps that portion of Texas was marked as a "desert," inhabited only by "large droves of wild horses and cattle." It is far from being a desert, but the wild horses and cattle were there, the remnants of former wealth. For years this country was the hunting-ground of "mustang-hunters," Americans, Mexicans, and Indians alike.

After the Mexican war the Government of the United States established military posts along the frontier, and the State of Texas kept several companies of "rangers" in the field, thus affording protection from Indian incursions. The Legislature of the State, in the year 1852, also passed liberal laws confirming the titles of the old Mexican owners to their lands. The assertion made by a committee of investigation sent by the government of Mexico, that the Mexicans were deprived of their lands by legislation, (see report of Mexican commission, page 129,) is directly contrary to the facts and without foundation. The legislation of the State has been of the most liberal character, and the decisions of the courts uniformly in favor of the old titles.

In consequence of this liberal legislation the Mexican residents returned about the year 1853, and re-established their stock ranches, and in 1856, and since, Americans settled throughout the country, purchasing lands from the old owners, or acquiring the unlocated public domain under the laws of Texas. They were remarkably prosperous until the raids assumed a formidable character. From reports given to the committee it may be seen that, although agriculture is still in its infancy there, and the country still held and used alone by the herdsmen, the wealth was rapidly increasing.

In the report of the commission sent there in 1872 to investigate the raids, it is stated that, in the year 1870, the assessment-rolls in the counties of Cameron, Hidalgo, Starr, Webb, La Salle, Encinal, Duval, Zapata, and Nueces (the returns of two other counties, Live Oak and McMullen, not having been included) showed 299,193 cattle and 73,593 horses; and now, even after the enormous losses by the raids, the following estimates give an idea of the exportations of that district:

The firm of Coleman, Mathis & Fulton, of Rockford, having contracted to ship cattle by Morgan's steamboat-line, supply, per annum, 50,000 steers, at the rate of $18 per head, or	$900,000
The packing and rendering establishments at Fulton consume 50,000 head of steers, worth $15 per head	750,000
The number of cattle driven north to the Kansas market is estimated at 75,000, at $12 per head	900,000
The export of wool from Corpus Christi was last year 6,000,000 pounds, at an average price of 22 cents	1,320,000

The number of mutton-sheep is not estimated.

All the figures given mean gold values.

HISTORY OF THE RAIDS.

The history of the present raids can be said to have commenced with the Cortina war in 1859 and 1860. We will quote enough of the official account of Major Heintzelman, United States Army, dated March 1, 1860, and contained in the Executive Documents of the first session of the Thirty-sixth Congress, Document No. 84, submitted to the House of Representatives by the Secretary of War under a resolution of the House to give an outline of that war:

"Juan Nepomuceno Cortina, the leader of the banditti who have for the last five months been in arms on the Lower Rio Grande, murdering, robbing, and burning, is a ranchero, at one time claiming to be an American and at another a Mexican citizen. At the time General Taylor arrived on the banks of the Rio Grande he was a soldier in General Arista's army. He has for years been noted as a lawless, desperate man.

"Ten years ago he was indicted for murder, and the sheriff attempted to arrest him, which made him for a long period keep out of the way until the witnesses were gone. In 1854 he again began to be seen about; but no effort was made to arrest him until in the spring of 1859, when he was indicted for horse-stealing, and he has since been a fugitive from justice. When he came to town he was always well armed or had some of his friends around him, making it dangerous to interfere with him.

"On the 13th of July last he was in Brownsville with some of his ranchero friends, when a man who was formerly a servant of his was arrested by the city marshal for abusing a coffee-house keeper. Cortina attempted to rescue the man. He fired twice on the marshal, the second shot wounding him in the shoulder. He mounted his horse, took the prisoner up behind him, and with his friends around him rode off, defying the authorities to arrest him. He escaped to Matamoras, and there was treated with consideration and lauded as the defender of Mexican rights.

"Before daylight on the morning of the 28th of September, Cortina entered the city of Brownsville with a body of mounted men, variously estimated at from forty to eighty, leaving two small parties of foot outside, one near the cemetery, the other near the suburbs of Framireño. The citizens were awakened by firing and cries of 'Viva Cheno Cortina!' 'Mueran los Gringos!'—Death to Americans! 'Viva Mexico!' The city was already in his possession, with sentinels at the corners of the principal streets, and armed men riding about. He avowed his determination to kill the Americans; but assured Mexicans and foreigners that they should not be molested. Thus was a city of two thousand to three thousand inhabitants occupied by a band of armed banditti—a thing till now unheard of in these United States.

"He made his headquarters in the deserted garrison of Fort Brown, and sent mounted men through the streets hunting up their enemies. He broke open the jail, liberated the prisoners, knocked off their irons, and had them join him. He killed the jailer, Johnson, a constable named George Morris, young Neale, in his bed; and two Mexicans were after Glavecke, the wounded city marshal, and others."

We will not go further into the details of the war thus inaugurated. Cortina went to the Mexican side, and "he and his men staid about Matamoras publicly, unmolested by the authorities."

Cortina established himself subsequently on the American side of the river above Brownsville, where he collected men and arms. He repulsed an attack made on his position by a number of Americans, assisted by national guards from Matamoras, with some artillery, on the 24th of October. The governor of Texas sent out forces against Cortina. Several fights took place in the chaparral, in which Cortina maintained his position. Major Heintzelman says:

"Cortina was now a great man. He had defeated the 'Gringos,' and his position was impregnable. He had the Mexican flag flying in his camp, and numbers were flocking to his standard. When he visited Matamoras he was received as the champion of his race—as the man who would right the wrongs of the Mexicans and drive back the hated Americans to the Nueces."

Major Heintzelman arrived, in command of United States troops, on the night of the 5th of December, at Brownsville. He took command, and, with a mixed force of United States troops, Texas rangers, and volunteers, dislodged Cortina, and finally defeated him, at Rio Grande City, on the 27th of December. Cortina crossed over into Mexico and established himself there. Once more he crossed over to the American side on a raid. We close this account by another quotation from Major Heintzelman's report:

"Most of his arms, ammunition, and supplies to maintain his forces for so many months came from Mexico, and principally from Matamoras. Most of the men were 'pelados' from the towns and ranches along the Rio Grande. On the Mexican side he always found a market for his plunder. He was styled in orders 'General en Gefe,' and he went about with a body-guard.

"The whole country from Brownsville to Rio Grande City, one hundred and twenty miles, and back to the Arroyo Colorado, has been laid waste. There is not an American, or any property belonging to an American, that could be destroyed in this large tract of country. Their horses and cattle were driven across into Mexico and there sold, a cow, with a calf by her side, for a dollar."

In a letter to the Mexican general commanding on the Rio Grande, who had taken exception to the troops of Major Heintzelman following Cortina across the river into Mexican territory, Major Heintzelman maintained the right to do so, and said:

"After his (Cortina's) defeat, as above stated, he fled for safety to the Mexican side of the river, and there found it. He was received with sympathy. He was then allowed to remain and recruit his forces, arm and equip them, and watch for a favorable opportunity to make another attack. This attack he made by firing across the river, mortally wounding a man of our troops, and by firing upon the steamboat."

We have quoted fully from this official report, because, although written sixteen years ago, in describing the opening scenes of this border warfare it gives all the characteristic features of what has been enacted on that field for the last ten years.

During the civil war of the United States, and until about the year 1866, there was a period of comparative peace on that border. The reasons were various. In the first place, the Rio Grande became the only open inlet into the southern confederacy, and an immense trade was established there. The towns were full of strangers. Cotton was exported in immense quantities, and vast stores of merchandise imported. Matamoras became an important mart for the commerce of the world, and the whole population had an exceedingly remunerative employment. The roads were covered with wagon trains and travelers. Many of the Mexican merchants made large fortunes. A number of them had their business in Texas, and mutual profits and usefulness established a friendly feeling. Meanwhile the French invasion and the establishment of Maximilian's empire drove the liberal government north toward the border, and for some time the fugitive government of Juarez was at El Paso, on the American line, one foot, so to speak, on American soil and the other on Mexican. Then followed the rallying of the liberal forces. Escobedo, the chief commander of Juarez's forces, made up his army on the border and started from there on his campaign which closed with the final tragedy of Queretaro. His army and the other liberal corps operating against the forces of the empire absorbed and carried away all the loose population of that border.

But after the close of the war, and with the return of the soldiery, commenced the pillaging on the Texas border. Cortina, the old robber chief, had obtained the rank of brigadier-general in the Mexican army, and had risen to power and distinction. From that time forth he was the central figure of the robbing population which established itself on the Mexican side of the Rio Bravo. His power was despotic. The lawless men who, through him, enjoyed the advantages of organization and political power on their own soil, and unlimited license to plunder on the Texan side, supported him with enthusiastic devotion, and in turn gave him the power and position which, in such a country, naturally falls to the leader who can command the unhesitating services of a large body of warlike followers. He became individually far more powerful than any other power—national or state. It was known that he had made and unmade governors at his pleasure. (See report of Mexican commissioners, page 150.)

When we now look upon the fearful history of rapine, murder, and wholesale robbery which from that day to this present date has desolated and is still desolating our border, the robber communities that have sprung up and are constantly increasing, a whole population living on what they plunder from their neighbors, and a set of local authorities conniving at and participating in the spoils of these notorious crimes, grown to be a regular means of livelihood, we cannot wonder at this result, when we reflect on the condition of a government which had to confer rank and position on a successful robber in order to avoid his hostility.

And when we consider that it is our own people who have been the constant victims of these crimes for the last ten years and are now still more exposed to them than ever, we feel that every sentiment of manhood and of regard for the honor of our country and its most sacred obligations to defend the life and property of its citizens cry out against the criminal neglect which allowed this evil to assume its present formidable proportions. That a man like Cortina, who had left the territory of the United States, in open war with the United States troops and the troops of the State of Texas, and against whom numerous indictments for murder and other crimes are now pending in the State courts, should have been placed in high command immediately on our border was a strange act for a government professing to be friendly; and it was as strange for our Government to suffer it for so long a time. Cortina has been arrested by the Mexican government and, until lately, held in the city of Mexico. His return to the old theater of his crimes and insults against our people, some time since triumphantly announced in Matamoras, would be an act of open defiance.

We have stated that the report of the commission sent by our Government to that border in 1872 has never been acted upon by Congress. We consider it due to their labors, and valuable as filling up that portion of the history of the border, to append to this report an abstract of the outrages proved before them. A similar list, more revolting in its details, with reference to the incursions of Indians, residents of Mexico, into Texas, we omit as not belonging to the immediate subject of our investigation: the cattle-raids on the Lower Rio Grande.

But since the report of those commissioners was made to the President, the crimes on our soil near the border have been even more frequent and have assumed more formidable proportions. From the evidence before us, we append a statement of the principal crimes committed during this time.

It will be seen that the constant and immense robbery of cattle, which is the basis of this entire system of outrages, has, in these later statements, hardly been mentioned, as the murders and other crimes which have grown out of it overshadow it. The question with the people has become one of existence, not of pecuniary loss.

Since the close of this enumeration, in December, 1875, a band of Mexicans was pursued, and they crossed over into Mexico with two hundred and fifty head of cattle, the soldiers standing on one bank of the river and seeing the cattle come out on the other side, where the population of the robber village turned out to receive them. Captain McNalley, commanding a small party of about thirty-five Texas State troops, arriving soon after, followed on the trail across the river, but found that the cattle had been driven behind the village and that several hundred men had collected to oppose him. He had a fight with them in which he killed several, and, supported by United States troops on the Texas side, succeeded in recrossing the river. About sixty of the poorest cattle were returned—the first restitution, poor as it was, which has been made for years. Captain Randlett's report of the crossing will be found in the appendix, and is mentioned as the fight at Las Cuevas.

ROBBER POPULATION.

It is shown from the evidence before us that there is on the Mexican or south side of the Rio Grande a population far more numerous than that on our side, and who support themselves mainly by robbing our people. It is shown that they possess only a scanty supply of cows; that they have a few sheep and goats; that their agriculture is not enough to support but a small portion of their number, notwithstanding which they live better, dress better, are mounted and armed better than the same class elsewhere in Mexico. From their entire immunity and the great attractions of the spoils, their numbers are continually increasing. From the oldest times, and among all people, punishment of crime has always been considered necessary to prevent its increase; but here we have the strange spectacle of a community openly subsisting on crime, while there is no punishment for them. Their own nominal government is not strong enough to inflict it, while the Government of their victims—our own Government—from a highly-refined sense of international politeness, has refrained from inflicting it.

All vagrant and dangerous elements are congregating to that paradise of robbers; a new generation is springing up, knowing no means of livelihood but robbing, aptly compared by our commanding general on that border to the pirate communities which formerly resided on the northern coast of Africa. (See testimony of General E. O. C. Ord, page 42.) When the robbers return with a drove of cattle, it is stated by the witnesses, old men and young boys all turn out to help the cattle out of the miry ground of the river-bank.

This state of things is wholly due to the inactivity of our Government. A few years ago some energetic chastisement, convincing the plunderers that there was some danger connected with their trade, would certainly have checked it, but the impression that our troops dare not cross the river has made them feel at ease. When, after a hot pursuit, the robbers and their spoil reach and cross the river, and our brave troops stand helpless and overwhelmed with shame on the American side of a small river and bear the taunts and insulting gestures of the escaped robbers and their friends, our nation and its Government become in their eyes, as they do not study the subtle arts of diplomacy, an object of scorn and contempt.

As long as the cause lasts the result, the increase of the number and power of the robber clans, will continue. What a few years ago might have been suppressed with a small force will now demand a much larger one and much more energetic measures; and, unless they are taken now, delay will, day by day, increase the evil and the difficulties in the way of its suppression.

MEXICAN AUTHORITIES.

All statements agree that the authority of the national government of Mexico on the border is only nominal. If they would, they could send no troops there, as they would desert and join the thieves. They have no forces to spare, and they cannot interfere with the livelihood of the robbers without risking the danger of driving them into the ranks of some revolutionary leader. The real power is altogether local. The governors of the states and the people of the states, with their own local authorities, are the only powers with whom our people have to deal. We find that our relations with the Mexicans are far from being the same along the whole border. On the upper Rio Grande the authorities and people of the state of Chihuahua are on terms of perfect friendship with our people. General Ord, commanding in Texas, has stated in his report that Mexican troops have come over repeatedly in pursuit of Indians on the American side of the Rio Grande. He has had rations issued to them and complimented them in orders.

From Laredo to El Paso there is entire harmony and amicable intercourse between the people on the two sides of the river, only for a time disturbed by the raids of the Kickapoo and Lipan Indians, who lived in Mexico, and whose robberies were checked by a severe chastisement administered to them on the Mexican side of the river by General McKenzie. The Indians are now removed and there has been comparative peace.

There is no doubt, says the American consul at Monterey, whose letter will be found in the appendix, (appendix B, No. 1,) that the raids are entirely owing to the demoralized condition of the mass of the people of Tamaulipas, and the class of men who hold office in that State. This is substantiated by all the evidence. The officials when called upon for redress are profuse in promises never followed by performance. They find the robbery a source of profit, and if they find that they can continue this profitable state of things and the inactivity of our Government by lying and diplomatic correspondence, they will, as a matter of course, do it, and the Federal Government has no agency but theirs and acts to suit them.

To characterize these proceedings it is of interest to follow a particular case. Among the latest and boldest performances of the raiders was the Corpus Christi raid, a full account of which will be found in the evidence accompanying this report. Mr. Foster, the American embassador, made a representation of the outrage to the Mexican minister of foreign affairs. The colonel commanding the national forces at Matamoras, Colonel José L. Christo, reported officially to the minister of war, Mejia, (see appendix B, No. 3, page 156,) "that in his judgment it cannot be the case," (that Mexicans could have been engaged in the raid.) "Granting that some Mexican robbers pass from this side to Texas, as also those from that side to this, they only engage in the robbing of cattle and horses, and never attack a town. For the reason, my opinion is, that the wrongs are committed by individuals resident in Texas itself, who, in consequence of local State questions, have risen up as a kind of insurrectionists against the government of Texas." (!) This report was communicated by Mr. Mejia to Mr. Lafragua, the minister of foreign affairs. This Christo is the same colonel who, as stated in Captain McNally's evidence, (see testimony of Captain McNally, page 3,) when called upon by some personal friends from the Texas side to return stolen cattle of theirs, which were then herded near Matamoras, put them off for three days by fair promises, and in the mean time by special orders had all the cattle bearing their brand slaughtered for the Matamoras market; and after being informed that his orders had been obeyed, he went out to the remaining cattle with the duped friends, and showed them that there were no cattle of their brand there.

His official statement as above, indorsed by the minister of war, would have been the last of this affair had not an officer of less discretion and more honesty arrested eight of the raiders at Camargo, and another officer two at Mier.

General Escobedo, (appendix B, No. 2, page 154,) commanding at San Luis Potosi, reported to the minister of war that thirty armed Mexicans had crossed the Rio Grande, coming from Texas, where they had, among other acts, burned a store. That they had scattered after getting into Mexico, but that ten were arrested and sent to Saltillo, to await punishment. Mr. Lafragua at once informed the American minister, Mr. Foster, of this act of good faith, (appendix B, No. 2, page 153,) and Mr. Foster answered as follows: "I have to thank your excellency for the information contained in your note, which I will communicate to my Government, which will doubtless be gratified," &c. It seems that he was grateful for small favors, for the raiders were turned loose without any punishment whatever, and their little trip from Camargo to Saltillo was the only satisfaction given to our people for the brutal outrages they had committed. The clear proof of this is the absence of any further mention of the criminals, while any act of punishment would certainly have been communicated to our embassador with great flourish and would have elicited from him additional expressions of gratitude. In the light of this experience a sentence in the letter of Minister Lafragua to Mr. Foster appears highly significant: "In the future the same strict vigilance will continue to be exercised by every class of authorities." Of course, including Colonel Christo.

MEXICAN CHARGES.

It will be noticed that Colonel Christo indicates that the robberies are committed by robbers of both sides, and that the losses and sufferings are mutual. This is the continual charge of the Mexicans, repeated again and again with unblushing effrontery. This committee have, after diligent search, been unable to find a single case of a plundering raid from Texas into Mexico. Hon. Hamilton Fish, in his letter of May 20, 1875, to Mr. Foster, (appendix B, No. 4, page 156,) states, with full knowledge of all the facts, as follows:

"It may be regarded as frivolous to seek to justify the hostile incursions into our territory on the ground of retaliation for similar incursions from this side. There have been none such, and proof of the contrary is challenged. Indeed, the charge is improbable on the face, from the fact that Mexico, near the border, holds out no temptation to plunderers from this side, while the reverse is the case in respect to baits in Texas for Mexicans."

The proof has been challenged in vain. With the continued charges made and reiterated by the Mexicans not a single special case has ever been stated. Failing utterly in getting the material for such statements, it has become common with the Mexicans to assume a tender care for the welfare of Mexican citizens in Texas.

"Toward the close of the years 1873 and 1874," writes Mr. Mariscal to Mr. Fish, in a letter dated January, 1875, (report on Foreign Relations, 1875, part 2, page 954,) "an unusual number of crimes and outrages of all kinds were committed against Mexicans in the State of Texas by inhabitants of that State, the perpetrators thereof, in a great majority of cases, remaining unpunished, either from powerlessness on the part of the authorities of the State, or from some other cause still more to be lamented." This other cause, which he does not express, but only laments, is stated more explicitly by his witnesses, who declare that the State authorities were accomplices in the crimes. "I confined myself to counseling moderation and prudence in the midst of the excitement prevailing among the Mexican population of these regions."

Your committee is assured by the representatives of the Mexican population in Texas in this Congress that they are not in need of the sympathy thus wasted upon them. Indeed, all the witnesses declare that all those Mexican citizens of Texas who possess anything are patriotic and respected, proud of their American citizenship, and complying with every duty of citizens. Some of them have been honored members of the Legislature, others have repeatedly held military commands. Far from sympathizing with the robbers and raiders, they have often been foremost in the defense of our border and in the punishment of invaders. The brothers Benavides, in Laredo, have for many years held commands in Texas. Colonel Santos Benavides earned a high reputation for conspicuous vigilance and bravery in the protection of the border; and his brother, Captain Refugio Benavides, commanded with distinction a company of State troops in the same service, as will be referred to in another portion of this report. Their troops were all Mexican citizens of Texas, and they have more than once impressed on the invaders the lesson that the vicinity of Laredo was a bad region for the pursuit of their trade. They ask no sympathy from such quarters.

But it seems from the correspondence of the State Department that, in answer to the repeated challenges by Mr. Fish to give some substance to the repeated charges of crimes committed by Texans in Mexico by naming even one, the Mexican embassador at last produces two. Strange to say, from his statement they were both committed on Texan soil, and therefore did not meet the challenge; but it is fair to presume they came nearer meeting it than any other he could discover. One is substantiated by the oath of some Mexican witnesses that it was rumored that one Robles and one Leyva, both Mexicans who had been sojourning in Texas, were made away with. (Report on Foreign Relations, 1875, part 2, page 974.) No more need be said of this charge than to quote Mr. Fish's reply, (report on Foreign Relations, 1875, part 2, page 980:) "Your note is accompanied by the affidavits of certain persons; no one of whom, however, claims to have seen the homicides. They all speak of them as a matter of public notoriety. Even the names of the supposed culprits are not mentioned. It seems clear that testimony of this character can hardly be made the basis of any specific proceeding. It is noticed, too, that Leyva is said to have been carried to the bank of the Rio Grande by order of a judge in Texas. This statement, likewise, is so incredible on its face as to serve as its own refutation."

The other case was as follows: Toribio Lozano, a Mexican, living in Aguafria, in the state of Nueva Leon, had, since the year 1861, been grazing his sheep and goats in Texas, and continued doing so until the winter of 1873. His servants, or "peons," (peonage is forced servitude for debt, and is the common system of labor in Mexico,) were with his sheep and goats. (Foreign Relations, 1875, part 2, page 955.) Now, this fact that Mexicans, residents of Mexican states in the interior, did not hesitate to send their flocks to graze on the Texas pastures, and should, as in this case, do it for twelve years without loss, is a stronger contradiction of the charges made by the Mexican minister of the reign of violence and insecurity in that State, and against the allegation of the great fear which Mexicans are asserted to entertain from lawlessness in Texas, than any facts which could be adduced. We are informed that it is very common for citizens of Mexico to graze their stock in this manner without fear of loss; an assurance which could only have grown up by the experience of perfect safety and fair treatment from the people of Texas.

Mr. Mariscal, in his correspondence, speaks of the estates of Mr. Lozano in Texas, but Mr. Lozano, in his own statement, is silent as to estates, and it is stated, by well-informed residents of that country, that Mr. Lozano only assessed for taxation his sheep and goats, but no land. Now, it is stated that the principal subsistence of the shepherds was the cattle of the country, which during the years of the war passed unnoticed, as it did for some time after. But in 1873 a noted outlaw from Mexico, Alberto Garza, followed the business of "peeling" on a large scale in Texas; that is, he killed cattle for their hides, and took the hides to market. He is said to have had his camp close to the camp of Lozano's shepherds, and they were suspected of assisting him. No direct evidence exists of these facts, nor as to the perpetration of the crime which followed. Seven of the shepherds were found hanged. Great indignation prevailed in the surrounding country, and the grand juries of Nueces County and Live Oak County made every effort to discover the murderers, but without success. In those sparsely-settled parts of Texas we learn that it has again and again occurred that horse or cattle thieves were punished in such summary manner by owners of stock, without distinction of nationality. It seems to be difficult for the authorities to prevent or punish such acts, much as they may deplore them, as proof is very difficult of access.

Mr. Lozano charges this crime directly to the authorities of Texas, and his witnesses, in the evidence which he adduces, charge, in a formula to which they all swear, the collusion of the authorities of Texas with the criminals. (Report on Foreign Relations, 1875, part —, pages 967, 968.) On this, Mr. Mariscal bases a claim which is curious in its details. As the Mexican commission have criticised severely some of the claims established by the American commission which investigated the raids in 1872, which claims it is not now in our province to condemn or defend, it may be interesting to look into this claim. The Mexican shepherds belong to the lowest class of "pelados" in their country; they own nothing in the wide world, and they earn from six to eight dollars per month, which they receive in the necessaries of life furnished by their owner or employer at such prices as he may see proper. Their state of civilization is hardly removed from that of the Indian. They are half clad, their feet protected by raw-hide sandals fastened with raw-hide thongs. Yet, in the evidence accompanying Mr. Mariscal's letter, a number of the same kind swear that each one of the killed shepherds caused a pecuniary loss to his widow and other family of more than $50,000. (Report on Foreign Relations, 1875, part 2, pages 970, 971, 972, 973.) Comment is unnecessary. The voluminous correspondence kept up on this subject by Mr. Mariscal is sufficiently answered by Mr. Fish in one sentence:

"Mexicans in Texas and Americans in Mexico who engage in business near the border must not at present, or perhaps for some time to come, expect either government to insure them against all the risks inseparable from such enterprises."

He might even have left out "Americans in Mexico," for from what your committee can learn no American would ever be reckless enough to send his stock and herders to the Mexican side for grazing.

While no charge of a raid from Texas by robbers or lawless persons into Mexico has ever been substantiated or even specifically stated, all the evidence shows that there is no inducement for such raids, there being nothing to take. Moreover, the danger connected with any such attempt is alone sufficient to deter any party from such a venture. A robbing population, from the very nature of their occupation, are always on the alert, ready with their horses and arms. They have a perfect and efficient system of guards and patrols, which makes it impossible for any party to enter their country without at once being noticed, and confronted in a short time by a considerable force.

CONDITION OF OUR PEOPLE.

Meanwhile our people on the border are impoverished day by day, and their lives are held by a slender tenure. It is stated in the evidence before us that all the American stock-raisers, who could do so, have abandoned their ranches, and sought safety for their families in the towns. Business in the towns has almost ceased. No merchant dares to credit a country merchant or a stock-raiser, whose whole possessions are liable every day to be swept away, burned, or otherwise destroyed. Such is the insecurity of life that Captain McNally, who appeared before your committee, a man of known daring, and a bold leader in those border fights, declares upon oath that no compensation, however great, could induce him to incur the danger which every inhabitant of the country between the Rio Grande and Nueces incurs every day, and that he considers his life, as a man whose business is war, safer than that of any inhabitant of that district. Deliberately and with full conviction, as this opinion is stated by one who is familiar with that country and all the facts, as a perusal of his evidence will show, it is fearful in its weight, and should come home to the heart and mind of every American.

But it is not alone the danger incident to the life in a country overrun by robbers, which is the constant menace to our people, but there is, according to all the statements, a perfect terrorism established by the robbers. Every one who is suspected, by word or deed, to have taken part against them is doomed to death. Captain McNally says: "Many of them have not nerve enough to take an active, decided stand against it, either by giving information or by personal assistance. Still, a number of them have done it since I have been out there, and some eight or ten, probably twelve, have been killed on that account. It has been the history of those border counties that when any man, Mexican or American, has made himself prominent in hunting those raiders down, or in organizing parties to pursue them when they are carrying off cattle, he has been either forced to move from the ranch and come into town, or he has been killed. Quite a number of Americans have been killed within the last year out there, and also quite a number of Mexicans, probably twelve or fifteen, for that offense alone. The men on the other side of the river threaten to kill them, and the fact is known publicly. They say, "We will kill that man within a week," and the report is heralded over the country, and if the man does not leave they usually carry their threat into execution. (See testimony of Captain McNally, page 9.) The same statement occurs in all the evidence. While the resident Mexican population who have any property are in sympathy with our people, there is a large floating population who have come over from the other side who have no permanent abode anywhere, and who are the spies and informers of the raiders.

General Ord states that some of his informants implored him not to give their names to the public, as they would assuredly have to flee from the country or be murdered; and your committee, compelled to publish this evidence, in order to satisfy Congress and the American people of the extraordinary condition of that country, cannot refrain from saying in all earnestness that if this Congress should fail to give ample protection to that unfortunate country, this very report with the evidence annexed may deliver some of the men, our own citizens, testifying to your committee and to you, to death by the hands of the murderers.

The appeals from the State of Texas have been earnest and oft repeated. Governor Coke has again and again addressed urgent calls for relief to the Federal authorities. The Legislature of Texas and the constitutional convention memorialized Congress. They claim that they are entitled, as certainly they are, to protection by the power of the nation. The representations of Mr. Fish to the Mexican government have been earnest and persistent. But it is perfectly evident to your committee, and must be evident to anybody who reads the history of this tragedy for the last ten years, that the Mexican government is utterly powerless to prevent these evils or to check them, and that the only reliance is to be placed in the energetic and positive action of our own Government. Indeed the only explanation compatible with the theory that the national government of Mexico is on friendly terms at this moment with this nation, as it professes to be, is that it is too weak; otherwise, the fact of these continued hostile armed incursions would be stronger than all professions of amity and peace.

MANNER OF DEFENSE.

In coming to the manner in which protection can be given, we must state it as the unanimous opinion of all military men familiar with that border that protection can only be complete if the commanding officer of our troops can, whenever he finds robbers in the act of carrying off their booty, follow them up, even across the river, punish or kill them and retake the property of our citizens. They are unanimous in stating that a merely defensive policy would give imperfect protection even if a large force were maintained there at great expense. The river is skirted by a belt of from fifteen to twenty-five miles of an impenetrable thicket, crossed by narrow paths, known to the inhabitants and the robbers. The robbers can pass in a short distance from the troops without being observed, and cannot be intercepted or followed except on these paths. General Sheridan and General Ord, as well as Captain McNally, gave it as their opinion that a force of ten thousand men, without power to follow the robbers and punish them, would afford inadequate protection, while a force of twenty-five hundred or even two thousand movable cavalry, exclusive of garrisons, if permitted to follow up the raiders when caught in committing their robberies, would soon break up the raiding.

Your committee are strongly in favor of avoiding all cause of dispute with the Mexican national government, and would go as far as honor and duty to our citizens would permit in remaining entirely on the defensive, and have therefore given this subject considerable attention. We find, in examining again the official reports of the Cortina raid in 1860, that Major Heintzelman, in command of the United States forces, found it necessary to send a command of Texas rangers over to the other side of the river, as Cortina's force threatened an attack on a steamer which was coming down the river. His instructions to the commanding captain were as follows:

"It is of the utmost importance that you preserve the most rigid discipline among your troops, and that no injury that can be avoided is done to the inhabitants or their property. Confine your operations strictly to the protection of the boat."

In a letter to the Mexican general, Garcia, commanding on the line, he says: (See Executive Document No. 81, Thirty-sixth Congress, page 67.)

"I am pleased to learn, both from your note and from the gentleman who brought it, of the measures you have taken to arrest Cortina and his followers. The notorious fact that he recruited his forces, and armed and equipped them on the Mexican side of the river, from the means furnished by your people, for the purpose of crossing to this side to rob and murder, has naturally and justly exasperated our people.

"To preserve and continue the friendly relations which so happily exist between the two governments renders it necessary that the most prompt and energetic measures be used to apprehend this man, and to put a stop to these outrages.

"To show you my desire to preserve the friendly feeling, I sent an order for the immediate withdrawal of the troops to this side of the river."

In a second letter, answering a complaint made by the general, he again said: (Executive Document No. 81, Thirty-sixth Congress, page 68.)

"You are right in saying that the burning of the 'jacales' (huts) was not authorized by Captain Ford, nor done by his forces. Had the act been done by his order, it is justifiable by the law of nations." (See Vattel, book 3, chapter 7, section 133.)

"This rancho, 'La Bolsa,' was notoriously occupied for near a month, ever since his defeat at Rio Grande City, by Cortina and his band, and for the avowed object of intercepting a steamer. Only the day before, several hundred head of stolen cattle were taken from a party of his men close by this place, and seven of his men killed. The fact of the authorities of Mexico having failed to prevent these outrages, justified the crossing of our troops, and they alone must be answerable for the consequences.

"From that time to this he (Cortina) has depended on Mexican aid for men and arms, and for supplies. The whole frontier he has laid waste as far as Rio Grande City, one hundred and twenty miles, and there is not an American living, or any property belonging to an American, that could be destroyed, and but few, very few, Mexicans. Nearly all the Americans that he caught he murdered.

"Cortina is himself a Mexican, and his men are Mexican citizens; and as he has organized and armed them openly, and without opposition or interruption from the authorities, we are entitled to make reclamation for our devastated frontier and our murdered citizens.

"There are other facts which I might adduce, but it is unnecessary to enlarge discussion, as I am here with my forces for the purpose of dispersing these outlaws and defending the frontier from further outrages."

Your committee quote the last sentence with pleasure and pride. It breathes the spirit in which deceptive and insincere diplomacy should be met. There is only one act more contemptible than the use of such diplomacy, and that is to submit to being duped by it. These letters of the gallant Heintzelman were conclusive on the subject, and established peace.

We add another official letter, from R. E. Lee, brevet colonel, commanding Department of Texas, to the civil and military authorities of the city of Reynosa, Mexico, April 7, 1860: (Executive Document No. 81, Thirty-sixth Congress, page 85.)

GENTLEMEN: In pursuance of instructions received from the honorable Secretary of War of the Government of the United States, I hereby notify you that you must break up and disperse the bands of banditti within your jurisdiction engaged in committing depredations upon the persons and property of American citizens, and that I shall hold you responsible for the faithful performance of this plain duty on your part. I have been informed that there are now within your jurisdiction armed followers of Cortina who were engaged in the recent outrages committed by him on this side of the Rio Grande, prepared to make similar aggressions.

This state of things cannot longer exist, and must be put an end to.

I am,

R. E. LEE,
Brevet Colonel Commanding.

Also, in orders to Captain Brackett, he said, (Executive Document No. 81, Thirty-sixth Congress, page 88:)

I have been informed that threats have been uttered by citizens of Reynosa against residents of Edinburgh and Tobasco. I desire you to inform the authorities of Reynosa of the menaces, and give them to understand that they will be held responsible for outrages committed by their citizens on American soil. You will give protection to all citizens within the line of your operations.

R. E. LEE,
Brevet Colonel Commanding.

This had the desired effect.

General Sam. Houston, then governor of Texas, April 14, 1860, wrote to the Secretary of War in a long communication on this point, speaking of invasion of Indians from Mexico in Texas:

"They were pursued on their flight across the Rio Grande. This surely furnishes a just cause of pursuit of them into Mexico, and there punishing them; and should the Mexican authorities declare their inability to repress such outrages upon our people, it would be our duty, as well as our right under the law of nations, to hold the country until we had an assurance that similar outrages would not be inflicted." (Executive Document, Thirty-sixth Congress, No. 81, page 92.)

On January 16, 1873, Mr. Hamilton Fish wrote to Mr. Nelson, then American envoy in Mexico:

"The federal government of that republic appears to be so apathetic on this subject, or so powerless to prevent such raids, that sooner or later this Government will have no other alternative than to endeavor to secure quiet on the frontier by seeking the marauders and punishing them in their haunts wherever they may be. Of course we should prefer that this should be done with the consent, if not with the co-operation, of Mexico. It is certain, however, that if the grievances shall be persisted in, the remedy adverted to will not remain untried." (Report on Foreign Relations, 1873, No. 277, page 635.)

Governor Coke, of Texas, in the year 1874, mustered into the State service a company of mounted men at Laredo, all, or nearly all, Mexican citizens of Texas, commanded by Captain Refugio Benavides. Their service was the protection of the frontier against raiding parties. In the orders to the company the governor directed them as follows:

"Should the company be in close pursuit of thieves or marauders with their plunder, it will follow as far as possible, whether on this side of the Rio Grande or the other, having a due regard for its own safety and the prospect of recovering the stolen property."

Attorney-General Williams having called Governor Coke's attention to the doubtful propriety of this order, Governor Coke answers in a lengthy letter, (appendix C, No. 1, page 165,) from which we will quote the following:

"If these Mexican raids which this force is called out to repel were of recent date, of irregular occurrence, and of such character as to elude the efforts of an ordinarily vigilant and energetic government to suppress, and such efforts were being made in good faith by the authorities of Mexico, I grant, in that case, that to allow an armed force to pursue even robbers, for the purpose of recovering their booty, across the Rio Grande would be a violation of the rights of Mexico and of well-settled principles of international law. The right of the government of Mexico to immunity for its territory from the incursions of armed forces from Texas would then be based on a proper discharge of the duties of that government to Texas, in repressing the lawlessness of its own people, and preventing and punishing their crimes committed against the people of a neighboring state. It is because each state or nation has undertaken to restrain its people from making war on the people of its neighbors that the law of nations forbids an armed force from one entering the territory of another. The right of immunity grows out of, and depends upon, the performance of this duty, which each power owes to the other. No state has surrendered the right of defense of its people in its own way against aggressions from neighboring states or people, except upon the promise and performance of the great duty toward itself, which all nations owe each other, of so governing their people as that they shall not depredate or make war upon other nations, or any of their people or territory. I apprehend that international courtesy, comity, and amity have never been required by the law of nations, carried to the romantic extent of surrendering the great natural right of self-defense against the constant infliction of serious, permanent, and wrongful injury upon the people of one nation by those of another, although the attacks may be unauthorized by the government of the territory from which it comes."

Attorney-General Williams acquiesced in these conclusions, and the orders remained in force.

We have been thus lengthy upon the right of crossing the river, if necessary for a defense of our border, because, on the one hand, we wish to state most emphatically that we do not desire any collision with the national government of Mexico nor the acquisition of any of its territory; while, on the other hand, we are reluctantly forced to the conclusion that the only efficient defense will involve the following up and punishment of the robbers. In the case of several precedents, like the crossing of General McKenzie, Captain McNally, and Captain Randlett, the Mexican government have remonstrated, but shown their judgment and appreciation of the motives of this Government by not regarding such invasions, temporary as they were and under the strong aggravations leading to them, as a serious offense. Indeed, it would be an untenable position if they offered us the alternative of quietly submitting to outrages which they cannot prevent or incurring their displeasure. It is safe to say that no sensible nation could afford to go to extremities on such grounds. At the same time, we do not expect that the Mexican government would give such a right by treaty or formally in any manner, as the exacting pride of their people might cause them great political troubles.

The protection of our border is a supreme duty, and we must take such means as will be efficient in giving that protection. Should Congress fail in this, there may be well-grounded apprehensions that the people of Texas will rise in arms in their last despair, and themselves cross the border and wage a war of retaliation. They want no war and no more territory. We are assured that they would consider a war as destructive to their interests and that they want peace and immigration to fill up their own vast territory before they desire to see new fields opened to draw immigrants elsewhere. Their country offers them all the prosperity they desire, if they can only have peace and security for themselves, their families, and their property. But they are men and they are Americans, and there are limits to patient suffering. A war of retaliation, after what they have suffered, would not be confined to the punishment of the robbers alone, and would precipitate such complications upon this nation that we could not ignore them. A failure to act promptly may, and probably will, therefore, bring about the very thing we wish to avoid. As yet what has to be done can be done in regular order, justly, discreetly, and in proper bounds, and this Government will be able to know and direct how far to go and where to stop.

We beg leave to submit the following joint resolutions and recommend their passage:

Resolved, That for the purpose of giving efficient protection to the country between the Rio Grande and Nueces Rivers, in the State of Texas, from the cattle-thieves, robbers, and murderers from the Mexican side of the river, the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and required to station and keep on the Rio Grande River, from the mouth of that river to the northern boundary of the State of Tamaulipas, above Laredo, two regiments of cavalry, for field-service, in addition to such infantry force as may be necessary for garrison duty, and to assign recruits to said regiments so as to fill each troop to number one hundred privates, and they shall be kept up to that strength as long as they shall be required in that service.

Resolved, That, in view of the inability of the national government of Mexico to prevent the inroads of lawless parties from Mexican soil into Texas, the President is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment it shall be necessary for the protection of the rights of American citizens on the Texas frontier above described, to order the troops, when in close pursuit of the robbers with their booty, to cross the Rio Grande and use such means as they may find necessary for recovering the stolen property and checking the raids, guarding, however, in all cases against any unnecessary injury to peaceable inhabitants of Mexico.

Extracts from the evidence as to murders and violence by Mexicans.

"E. B. Barton testifies that Thompson and a companion were murdered by Mexicans near Las Olmas in 1859. (See deposition No. 42.)

"Francis M. Campbell testifies that W. P. Neall was murdered by Mexicans in 1859; also a young Mexican murdered at Brownsville, 1859; also a Mexican shot, 1859. (See deposition No. 84.)

"Victor Morel testifies that Captain N. P. Spear, William Robinson, and John Box were murdered in 1859 by Mexicans, at or near Rio Grande City. (See deposition No. 157.)

"Indictments show the following persons to have been murdered at or near Brownsville in 1859 by Mexicans:

"1. Robert Shears, wounded July 13, 1859.
"2. V. Garcia, murdered September 28, 1859.
"3. R. S. Johnson, murdered September 28, 1859.
"4. George Morris, murdered September 28, 1859.
"5. J. Montes, murdered November 25, 1859. (See document 27, current file.)

"W. D. Thomas testifies that James Dunn and Richard Rowland were murdered and the sheriff of Hidalgo County wounded at Granjero ranch by Mexicans in 1861. Leonicio Ensualdo was one of the murderers. (See deposition No. 16.)

"William Burke, lieutenant of State police, testifies that a number of United States soldiers were murdered by Mexicans in 1864 and 1865. A courier of the Fourth Wisconsin Volunteers was killed at San Martin ranch in 1864 or 1865; his body shamefully mutilated. Eben Cobb was murdered seven miles from Brownsville in 1865 or 1866. (See deposition No. 4.)

"William Burke testifies that Dr. Morse, United States Army, was murdered by Mexicans about five miles from Brownsville, and a German named Burmester, about twelve miles from the same city. (See deposition No. 4.)

"Louis Renaud testifies that J. C. Rosa and Cecilio Gomez were murdered at Sabinito Rancho, in Texas, in 1866, by armed Mexicans under Leandro Ramirez. (See deposition No. 88.)

"James F. Scott testifies that A. J. Cook was murdered on the highway, in the Nueces Valley, in 1867, by Mexicans. (See deposition No. 52.)

"William Burke, lieutenant of State police, testifies that Inspector Dupont was murdered in sight of Brownsville, by Mexicans, in 1869 or 1870. (See deposition No. 4.)

"William Kelly, justice of the peace, testifies that Inspectors Hammond and Phelps were murdered and Inspector Ryan wounded at Clarksville, on December 18, 1869, by armed Mexicans, who crossed from Bagdad for the purpose. (See deposition No. 149.)

"Mary C. Clark confirms the above. The Mexicans robbed her residence and murdered Inspector Hammond in her presence. (See deposition No. 147.)

"William Burke, lieutenant of State police, testifies that Dr. Cleveland was murdered by Mexicans seventy miles from Brownsville in 1870. (See deposition No. 4.)

"William Burke, lieutenant of State police, testifies that in 1871 John Clark and Pat Fox were murdered by Mexicans, eight and seventy-five miles, respectively, from Brownsville, as well as Inspector McLaughlin, killed in Live Oak County. (See deposition No. 4.)

"William Burke, lieutenant of State police, testifies that Inspector Miller was wounded by Mexicans at White's ranch in 1871. (See deposition No. 4.)

"Richard King testifies to the murder of Carl Specht, his traveling companion, on July 31, 1872, near Corpus Christi, Texas. It was dark when the attack on the ambulance was made. Witness believes the murderers to have been Mexicans. (See deposition No. 89.)

"Henry Simeon and Crespin Peña testify to the murder of their companion, Joseph Alexander, of Brownsville, on August 11, 1872, near Relampago ranch, by one Francisco Perez, (alias Chicon,) a sublieutenant of Cortina's forces. The murderer was mounted and stopped the ambulance, firing without the slightest provocation at Mr. Alexander, killing him instantly, and immediately escaping to Mexico. (See depositions Nos. 36 and 37.)

"Enumerations of robberies, murders, and assaults by raiders since the report of the commissioners of 1872.

"1. During the months of March and April, 1873, Alberto Garzo, a notorious outlaw from Guerrero, Mexico, with a party of cattle-thieves, crossed to this side of the Rio Grande and located himself near Piedras Pintas, in Duval County, in the neighborhood of which there are dense thickets, affording means of concealment, where he engaged regularly and systematically in killing and skinning cattle. On the 19th of April he offered two hundred hides for sale at Piedras Pintas that had just been taken from the cattle on the range. And it was not until the owners of the cattle collected in force that he retreated to Mexico.

"2. On the 8th day of June, 1873, the United States custom-house, or deputy collector's office, at Carrizo, in Zapata County, was robbed by a party of Mexicans.

"3. On the 6th of July, 1873, Dr. J. C. Crocker was murdered and robbed by an organized band of Mexicans, about fifteen miles west of Captain King's ranch in Nueces County.

"4. On the 7th of November, 1873, the store of R. Schubert, a merchant at Concepcion, in Duval County, was entered by a party of twenty or thirty armed Mexicans, who overpowered Schubert and his clerks and gutted his store, taking between $2,500 and $4,000 in money, besides arms, goods, &c., with which they recrossed into Mexico at the ranch of Las Cuevas, in the lower edge of Starr County.

"5. On November 30, 1873, Henry Grey, a son of E. N. Grey, of Concepcion, Duval County, was killed by a party of Indians and Mexicans. The same party killed in all their raid twenty-four men and wounded fifteen Mexican herdsmen, in Duval and Webb Counties, and stole between seventy-five and one hundred head of horses and scattered the sheep-stock of the country, so that the owners suffered great loss. G. W. Sank, recently killed in the Corpus Christi raid by another party of Mexicans, was wounded by this party. Don Hypolito Mendiola was killed at his ranch near Laredo. This party was pursued by Captain Refugio Benavides, of Webb County, and one of them, an old Mexican, was wounded and captured. The rest fled and found refuge in Mexico, from whence they came upon this raid.

"6. On May 5, 1874, a young man by the name of Watson, traveling with two companions, was tied up with his companions and robbed by a party of armed Mexicans about twenty-five miles from Corpus Christi, Nueces County.

"7. John Albertson, traveling from Brownsville, Texas, to Corpus Christi, was on the 3d of February, 1874, tied up with the members of his family and robbed, in the upper part of Cameron County, by a party of armed Mexicans, and his wife was subjected to the most horrible outrage by members of this band of robbers.

"8. On May 5, 1874, a Frenchman named Martinet was tied and robbed of about $1,800 by a party of armed Mexicans between the Olmito and Lampasitos ranches, about seventy-five miles southwest of Corpus Christi.

"9. On May 9, 1874, a party of twenty-five to thirty armed Mexicans appeared at the ranch of Peñescal, near the line of Nueces and Cameron Counties, and not very far distant from the scene of the preceding case, No. 8, where they attacked the people, brutally murdering John F. Morton, Michael Morton, P. F. M. Coakley, and Herman Tilgner, and robbed their store of its contents. One of these raiders was afterward caught, tried, and hung at Corpus Christi. From his confession, several parties became known, and it was established that they were all Mexicans from Mexico.

"10. On the 7th of June, 1874, a party of five armed Mexicans attacked the house of Mr. Thaddeus Swift, of Refugio County, and brutally murdered Mr. Swift and his wife, both of them being cut to pieces and horribly mutilated with knives, the object being robbery. For the terrible details of this tragedy we refer to the annexed affidavit of Mr. F. M. Swift. Three of the assassins were hunted down and hung by the outraged neighbors. Two of them escaped to Mexico. One of these is Juan Juares or Juan Flores, as he called himself. This man had claimed to be an American citizen and had registered himself as a voter. He was arrested in Guerrero, Mexico, and a demand made for his extradition under our treaty with Mexico. He confessed his guilt with cold assurance, but claimed to be a Mexican citizen and not subject to rendition. His case was transferred to the Mexican federal court at Matamoras, where, upon his examination, he again confessed his guilt. We refer to the copy of his confession, herewith attached, taken from the record of his case. He has been finally delivered to our authorities, not in accordance with the treaty, but upon the payment of a large reward (or bribe) paid in money by the relatives and friends of the murdered Swift family.

"11. On August 2, 1874, an attempt was made by a party of marauders to murder Mr. Roach, living about thirty-five miles from San Diego, in Duval County, and to rob his store, but being prepared for the danger, he made a successful defense.

"12. On November 3, 1874, the store of Mr. George E. Blaine at the Los Olmos ranch, near the line of Nueces and Hidalgo Counties, was robbed by a large party of armed Mexicans, the loss being $500 to $600 in money and about $2,500 in goods. No lives were lost on this occasion, Blaine making no resistance to the robbery. The thieves had declared their intention to kill Blaine, and he was only spared by the timely arrival of a party of twelve Americans who happened to be encamped in the vicinity, and who rushed to the rescue in time to save Blaine's life, they having been advised by a courier of what was transpiring.

THE CORPUS CHRISTI RAID.

"13. The success that had attended the robberies of stores in the scattered outsettlements emboldened the robbers to make a more daring attempt and a more general pillage, and on the 26th of March, 1875, began what is generally called 'the Corpus Christi raid,' from the fact that it was supposed that an attempt would be made by the raiders to sack Corpus Christi. We present the following brief account of the raid, taken from the Valley Times:

" 'From all the information we can glean from those who were present and eyewitnesses of the recent Mexican raid, we give the following:

" 'From Mr. Doddridge we learn that rumors of the gathering of a party were conveyed to him about a week ago, but nothing was thought of it more than that of any other idle assemblage.

" 'Their first overt act appears to have been the demand made upon Campbell, near Tule Lake, for horses, as narrated yesterday.

" 'Procuring a few animals, which were ridden by the captors without saddles or bridles, the crowd went to Page's, nine miles from Corpus. Here they made a clean sweep of everything valuable. Two ladies in the house betook themselves to the chaparral, while Mr. Page was carried off.

" 'The next placed visited was Frank's store, at the Juan Sais ranch. There were eighteen or twenty of them here. Three or four, presenting pistols at Frank's head, demanded all his valuables. Of course no resistance was made, Frank yielding them everything. Overhauling his stock they took everything they wanted, exchanged their old clothes for new, and even stripped Frank to his underclothing.

" 'They stopped at this store for some time, supplying themselves with horses, saddles, &c., from the travelers passing either way. As soon as a vehicle or horseman would arrive, he was immediately surrounded, a score of pistols and guns levcled, and the demand for surrender made. In this manner was Mrs. Sidbury, Mrs. Savage, Miss Laura Allen, Messrs. H. A. Gilpin, Jos. Saunders, S. G. Borden, George Reynolds, Joe Howell, with Mr. W. W. Wright's team and wagon, the driver of Gilpin's team, W. A. Ball, Mr. Reynold's little daughter, Frank Page and son, and a number of Mexican women and children captured, and all their valuables appropriated, some of the ladies having part of their clothing taken from them. The miscreants attempted to disrobe Mr. Reynolds, but one of their number interfered and prevented it by the threat of a pistol.

" 'It was at Frank's the first killing was done. One of the robbers asked a Mexican to join the party in their raid. He refused, when a pistol was placed to his head, the trigger pulled, and his soul sent to eternity. It was a terribly cold-blooded deed.

" 'After leaving Frank's, the Mexicans, driving their prisoners before them like sheep, started for the Motts. Their first effort there was against the store of Mr. Thomas Noakes, which they found closed.

" 'Opening the door the first man who presented himself was shot twice by Mr. Noakes. Immediately afterward a man named Smith, in the store at the time, rushed out the front door, was met by the party, and shot down, mortally wounded. Aggravated, it is supposed, by the unexpected resistance, the store was fired. Noakes took refuge under the counter, and afterward got out of the building and into a place of safety. The destruction of his property was so complete that the calves in the pen were roasted. His loss is at least $10,000.

" 'At the Motts the women prisoners were liberated and allowed to go to their homes. After staying here an hour, the party started off toward Peñitas. In the neighborhood of Mr. Hunter's house they were brought to a stop by Pat Whelan and his party of ten, who charged the devils at once. Received by a volley—in which poor Swanks lost his life, he being shot through the stomach—it was returned with vigor. Thirty-five to ten were heavy odds to fight, and after exhausting his ammunition fruitlessly Whelan was obliged to give up the contest and return to the Motts for ammunition and re-enforcements. Receiving these, pursuit was resumed almost immediately.

" 'The Mexicans had with them two wagons, piled with plunder, which were on ahead under an escort. One of them belonged to Reynolds.

" 'The following, to a great extent identifying the party, was received here by a lady yesterday from Piedras Pintas, and is reliable:

" 'Alberto Garza passed through Piedras Pintas March 25. He shot one of Silverio Salinas's vaqueros three times because he would not give him his horse. He was thought to have twenty-five men with him and on his way to San Diego."

" 'Friday night Mr. Lee Riggs, R. W. Archer, and two others coming from Lagartaville were shot at near a creek. Camping six miles this side of the place, and about fifteen miles above Nuecestown, about three o'clock in the morning, a party of between twenty and thirty armed Mexicans passed them. But for being concealed in a little hollow, suggested by the attempt spoken of, they would have undoubtedly lost their lives.'

"The raiders, having sacked the country in the neighborhood of Corpus Christi, turned their course toward the Rio Grande. On the night of April 2 they surrounded the town of Roma, in Starr County, on the Rio Grande, and were prepared to sack that town and rob the custom-house, a deputy collector of customs being located there, but were prevented from doing so by the presence of a company of United States troops stationed at the place. They then withdrew from before the place and crossed the river into Mexico in the immediate vicinity. These facts are shown by the deputy collector of customs, herewith attached.

"This raid having attracted universal attention on this frontier, the Mexican authorities of Mier and Camargo, in which jurisdictions the raiders crossed into Mexico, took action in the case and arrested eight of the raiders. These prisoners were started for Matamoras, and the judge of the district court of this district was notified of the fact by the United States consul at Matamoras and advised to be prepared by the time of the arrival of the prisoners at Matamoras. Judge Dougherty immediately telegraphed to Corpus Christi to procure witnesses to identify the criminals, and was answered that plenty of witnesses would be ready to attend at Matamoras. But while the prisoners were en route to Matamoras an order was received from General Escobedo, from San Luis, Mexico, that the prisoners should be sent to Monterey, about two hundred miles into the interior, and not to Matamoras. For the particulars of these facts we refer to the letters of the United States consul to Judge Dougherty, herewith attached.

"It is claimed that this order of Escobedo was issued in good faith, in order to keep the prisoners from being subject on their arrival at Matamoras to the influence of Cortina, and to keep them beyond his protection. But it appears to us that this is a flimsy pretext to send them where there would be no possibility of their being confronted with the necessary testimony to convict. The allegation, however, although it may prove the punic faith of the Mexican authorities, also proves the character of Cortina with his own government.

"During this raid Miss Lizzie Joy arrived at Corpus Christi from Laredo, and made affidavit that she had left Laredo on the 20th, and on the 26th saw the dead bodies of two Americans near the roadside hacked to pieces with knives, and their horses hitched near and in a famishing condition. Miss Joy was traveling with a train of carts, and the cartmen buried the dead bodies. The next day two other bodies were discovered hanging near the road-side; these latter bodies were Mexicans. As there was no other party out except the Mexican raiders upon Corpus Christi, these four additional deaths to those already recounted are attributable to them. We annex the published account and the affidavit of Miss Joy in this case.

"14. On the 16th day of March, 1874, Vidal la Haille, a Frenchman, traveling from Corpus Christi to this place, was killed and robbed by Ricardo Flores and a party of armed Mexicans in this county, near Olmos, the line between this and Nueces County. Flores is a registered voter of this county. He was arrested, and, upon investigation before a magistrate, was committed to jail to answer for the murder before the district court; but broke jail and fled to Mexico. He is now in Matamoras, Mexico, where he has been since his escape. A requisition has been made under the treaty with Mexico for his rendition, but without success, Flores being under the all-powerful protection of General Cortina.

"15. On the 27th day of February, 1875, a party of armed Mexicans, seven in number, crossed the Rio Grande from near Reynosa, Mexico, and went to El Sauz, in Hidalgo County, where there is a post-office, and they entered the store of Mr. J. L. Fulton, the postmaster, when they made an assault upon him and his clerk, Mauricio Villanueva, a young Spaniard, in which both these parties were killed. The object was to plunder the store of Fulton, but the neighbors, having become alarmed by the shots, assembled and sent to Edinburgh, about seven miles distant, for assistance, which the robbers perceiving, they fled across the Rio Grande without accomplishing their purpose of robbery. Mr. Fulton was an officer of the Thirty-sixth Regiment of United States Colored Troops, and had settled here after the close of the war. He was an industrious, law-abiding, peaceable, and useful citizen.

"16. On the 23d day of March, 1875, Alexander Morel, a citizen of Hidalgo County, was killed by a party of Mexican cattle-thieves from Reynosa Vieja, in Mexico, who had crossed the river to ply their vocation. The details of his death are given in the annexed letter of his brother, Victor Morel. The body of the deceased was not found until the thieves sent word to his brother Victor where he would find it buried

"17. On the 16th day of April, 1875, George Hill, a resident of Tio Cano ranch, in Cameron County, was killed by a party of Mexican cattle-thieves, who had crossed the Rio Grande to pursue their nefarious traffic. Hill was out hunting stock, and came upon the party unexpectedly, and was evidently killed to prevent discovery. The evening after his death the thieves crossed their plunder to Mexico, near Santa Maria, which fact came to the knowledge of and was reported by the customs inspectors stationed at Santa Maria. Mr. Hill was a hard-laboring farmer and stock-raiser, who had settled here after the close of the war, in which he served as a member of the Fourth Wisconsin Cavalry, and he has left a large and helpless family of small children thus robbed and deprived of the protection of their father.

"18. On the 19th of April, 1875, a party of twelve armed Mexicans crossed the Rio Grande from Guerrero, Mexico, and appeared at Carrizo, Zapata County, where there is a post-office, and where a deputy collector of customs and two mounted inspectors are stationed. The raiders entered the store of Dr. D. D. Lovell and murdered him in cold blood. They then robbed his store of several thousand dollars in money and goods. They then proceeded to the office of the deputy collector of customs, robbed the place of all the property in the office except the money, which was in a large iron safe, which they could not break open, but broke off the knobs, leaving it useless. The deputy collector was absent and the inspectors fled, being two only against the twelve robbers. Dr. Lovell was the postmaster at Carrizo, and the post-office, as well as the store, was gutted of its contents. Dr. Lovell was an intelligent and enterprising citizen, who had built up a considerable trade at Carrizo, where he had settled at the close of our late war, in which he had served honorably as a volunteer in the Fourth Wisconsin Cavalry, which regiment, within two days lost two of its members, Dr. Lovell and George Hill. These deaths occurring at distant points from each other, but at nearly the same period of time, prove the thorough organization and understanding between the Mexican thieves scattered all along the Mexican border of the Rio Grande. The sheriff of Zapata County, writing to Judge Ware, states the loss of Dr. Lovell at $4,000, and that he lost $1,000 taxes collected, that was on deposit with Dr. Lovell.

"19. On the 1st day of December, 1874, a large party of Mexican cattle-thieves encamped near the ranch of Carlos Danache, of Cameron County, about fourteen miles from Brownsville, and they sent word to Mr. Danache, who had been active in the pursuit of these caballeros, that they were encamped near his place and would be pleased to see him. Mr. Danache gathered a party of friends and went to their camp next morning, but found it abandoned. And at their camp he found a Mexican hung, and the dead body so badly mutilated that it could not be identified, but supposed to be some honest man who had made himself obnoxious, like Danache, to the thieves. We refer to the affidavit of Mr. Danache in this case, herewith annexed.

"20. On the 18th day of January, 1875, Albert Dean and Joseph Dunn, mounted inspectors of customs, stationed at Rio Grande City, Starr County, were attacked by a party of five Mexicans, armed with Winchester carbines, who had just crossed from Mexico and whose outfit was undergoing examination by the inspectors, and their outfit, consisting of raw-hide ropes and other paraphernalia of the cattle-thief, indicated the object of their visit. This was about two leagues below Rio Grande City.

"In the same neighborhood, G. W. Lowe, another mounted inspector of customs, accompanied by Joseph Dunn, was ambushed and fired upon from the chaparral on the 22d day of April, 1875, the ball cutting through his clothing across the breast, which indicated the intention of the assassin. For particulars in these cases we submit copies of the official reports in relation thereto.

"21. On the 26th day of January, 1875, a fight occurred between a party of United States soldiers and a party of Mexicans at the rancho Solises, in Starr County, about eighteen miles below Rio Grande City, in which two soldiers and one Mexican were killed and two other Mexicans were wounded."

The fight of Captain McNally near the old battle-field of Palo Alto in June, 1875, and the fight at Las Cuevas in December, 1875, will be found mentioned in the appendix.

Since the appointment of your committee, in January, 1876, a Mexican citizen of Texas, Dionysio Garza, who kept a store in the county of Zapata, was murdered by Mexican raiders, together with his family, and his store robbed.

This is an account, so far as we could get it, of murders and outrages which were known. A full account cannot be made, as men often disappear without their fate being known or their bodies found.

The enormous number of cattle continually being stolen we have not attempted to ascertain, except in a general way, as may be gathered from the evidence.

PAYMENT OF SPECIAL COUNSEL BY DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. DURHAM, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, a bill (H. R. No. 2822) repealing section 363 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the substitution of another section in lieu thereof.

The bill was read. It provides that section 363 of the Revised Statutes be repealed, and the following enacted in lieu thereof:

SEC. 363. In cases where large amounts are involved, in which the United States may be a party in interest, and in cases of the United States against individuals for high crimes or misdemeanors, where the judge of the district or circuit where said cases are pending shall state, in writing, to the Attorney-General of the United States that in his opinion the public interest requires that the district attorney of the United States should have assistance in the prosecution or defense of said cases, then the Attorney-General may, with the consent of the head of the Department which may have control of the subject-matter in litigation, employ and retain, in the service of the United States, attorneys and counselors at law to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties; but in no instance shall he employ more than one attorney or firm of attorneys in any one case, and said attorney shall make out and swear to an account of the nature and value of the services rendered by him, and file the same in the court where such services were rendered, and send a copy of the same to the Attorney-General, and the said judge before whom said cause or causes may be tried shall certify to the Attorney-General that said attorney has rendered the services set out in the account, and his approval of the amount charged; but the Attorney-General and the said head of the Department shall fix the amount of the compensation for said service.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief explanation of the objects and purpose of the bill. It grows out of a resolution introduced by one of my colleagues [Mr. PARSONS] as to the number of special counsel employed by the Attorney-General, and the amount of compensation paid, in cases where the Government of the United States is a party. Accompanying this bill is a report setting out all the facts as called for by the resolution.

The committee were of opinion that in all probability too many counsel had been employed to assist in these prosecutions for some kinds of offenses. It appears by the report that within the last three or four years the large sum of $220,000, and more, has been paid to these special counsel. It also appears that extra compensation to the amount of $53,000 has been paid to the regular United States attorneys, in addition to their regular fees.

It is proper I should state that the present Attorney-General of the United States informs us that no adjustment has been made of special counsel fees in the various whisky prosecutions which have been going on within the last few months. We all know the importance of those prosecutions; but I suppose I shall be pardoned when I state the fact (without giving the name) that in one of those special cases one gentleman alone claims the enormous sum of $26,000 as fees for assisting in those prosecutions when he has not been engaged more than three months.

Now all this responsibility devolves upon the Attorney-General himself without any recommendation on the part of the district judge as to whether or not it is necessary to employ special counsel. In order that the House may see exactly what the present statute is, I ask the Clerk to read from the Revised Statutes, section 363.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 363. The Attorney-General shall, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires it, employ and retain, in the name of the United States, such attorneys and counselors at law as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties, and shall stipulate with such assistant attorneys and counsel the amount of compensation, and shall have supervision of their conduct and proceedings.

Mr. DURHAM. In many instances, Mr. Speaker, two and three counsel have been employed. With an able district attorney one lawyer is sufficient, and we therefore so provide in the bill; and further, that no attorney shall be employed to assist the United States district attorney unless upon the certificate of the judge himself that assistance is needed.

It undertakes to throw around that section of the Revised Statutes all the safeguards necessary, and I am sure the Attorney-General himself will not object to having some checks, if I may say so, placed upon him, or at least there shall be some counsel in regard to this matter. In addition to that the assistant attorney is required to make out and swear to the value of his service, which shall be certified to the Attorney-General, who then, in connection with the head of the Department out of which the litigation springs, shall determine what is fair and right as compensation to the assistant counsel.

In some instances men have been employed and paid $10,000 in one single case. Assistant counsel have been employed and paid more for three months' service than has been paid to the Attorney-General for one whole year's salary.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the last provision in his bill. It does not limit the power of the Attorney-General or the head of the Department out of which the litigation grows in fixing the salary, notwithstanding the opinion of the judge.

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, the Attorney-General and the head of the Department out of which the litigation springs are to determine what is a fair compensation. That is to say, if it grows out of customs, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General; if out of any matter of state, the Secretary of State and the Attorney-General; and if out of any matter of war, the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General.

Mr. HURLBUT. The bill provides that the judge shall certify to the fact that the service has been rendered and his opinion as to the charge made, and then it goes on to say that the Attorney-General and the head of the Department having charge of the subject-matter are to fix the compensation. It does not say it shall be within or above the amount specified.

Mr. DURHAM. It does not; for I take it for granted they will not allow a man more than he asks. They generally ask as much as they are entitled to. The assistant attorney has to swear to his account and the value of his service. That has to be certified to, and then the Attorney-General and the head of the Department out of which the litigation may spring may cut down the bill, or, in their judgment, I admit, raise it as suggested.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the purport of the bill reported, and unless some gentleman desires to say something in regard to it I will demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Accounts, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed to investigate the real-estate pool and Jay Cooke indebtedness be, and are hereby, authorized to employ a clerk for the further term of one month from the 15th of March, and said clerk be paid the sum of $4 a day for his services.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state it was my intention on Thursday of this week to call up for the action of the House the reports of the Committee of Elections in the contested-election cases of Bromberg and Haralson, and Finley and Walls, but on account of the absence of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] I now give notice I shall postpone the calling up of those cases until Tuesday of the next week, after the reading of the Journal, so gentlemen interested may prepare themselves.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WADDELL,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all from and including the words "Chief Clerk," in line 126, down to and including the word "session," in line 155; and in lieu thereof insert the following:

Chief Clerk and journal clerk, $3,000 each; two reading clerks and tally clerk, $2,700 each; disbursing clerk, file clerk, printing and bill clerk, enrolling clerk, and index clerk, $2,332.80 each; assistant to Chief Clerk, two enrolling clerks, resolution and petition clerk, stationery clerk, and newspaper clerk, $1,944 each; doorkeeper in stationery-room, distributing clerk, assistant index clerk, superintendent of document-room, assistant to clerk, $1,620; six assistant clerks, $1,300 each; six messengers, at $1,300 each; engineer, at $1,620; three assistant engineers at $1,300 each; five firemen, at $1,090 each; one laborer, at $820; six laborers, at $720; one upholsterer and locksmith, at $1,300; one telegraph operator during the session, at $100 per month; one telegraph messenger and page, at $2.50 each, to be paid during the session.

Mr. WADDELL. I desire to make a statement. Since I introduced that amendment, Mr. Chairman, about which I have not changed my opinion in the least, the Clerk of this House has intimated to me he has been put into a false position in regard to this matter, and suggested the propriety of withdrawing it. As I have no personal interest in the matter one way or other, and as it seems to be the wish of the Clerk, I will not antagonize the gentleman's bill, but will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Before we leave this paragraph, I desire to have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for one moment. I find in line 135 provision for the hire of a horse and carriage for the use of the Clerk of this House. While in the same proposition for the Senate the gentleman has reported for the hire and use of a wagon. I call the gentleman's attention to it for the purpose of inquiring why he makes this invidious distinction of a wagon for the Senate and a carriage for the House? [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. I am obliged to the gentleman. No invidious distinction was intended. Heretofore the Clerk of the House has been allowed three horses, and we have restricted him to one horse. I will accept the gentleman's amendment to strike out the word "carriage" and insert "wagon."

Mr. CONGER. I thought the question of carriages had been made so often by the democracy that perhaps they would not like to have it in this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I have a prejudice myself against employés riding in carriages at the expense of the Government. They can do as I do, ride in a car.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman would not wish to have a greater privilege accorded to the Clerk of this House than to the Secretary of the Senate?

Mr. RANDALL. Of course not. It is suggested also there is another mode of locomotion, and that is on foot. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan will be adopted.

Mr. CONGER. I made no motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman had no right to hold the floor.

Mr. CONGER. I take back all that I said. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out "carriage" and insert "wagon."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the item in lines 164 and 165—

Private secretary to the Speaker, $1,500.

I desire to ask the chairman to admit an amendment to strike out "$1,500" and insert instead thereof "$1,800." My reason for offering this amendment I can state in a moment.

The corresponding officer in the Senate, the secretary to the Vice-President, is allowed by this bill $1,800; and there is certainly no difference, either in the importance of their respective duties or the amount of labor performed, which should require a higher salary to be given to the secretary of the Vice-President than to the secretary of the Speaker. On the contrary, the labor imposed on the private secretary of the Speaker in this House is greater than the labor imposed on the private secretary of the Vice-President. I feel sure the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or the committee will not resist the amendment. There ought not to be an invidious distinction made between officers of the same class in the two branches.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. In the statement of the pay of the different officers connected with the Senate, considered in consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, the salary of the secretary of the Vice-President was put down at $1,800. Hitherto the secretary of the Speaker of this House was receiving the same as the secretary of the Vice-President, $2,120. I see no impropriety in placing the secretary of the Speaker on the same footing as the secretary of the Vice-President, with a salary of $1,800.

Mr. RANDALL. It will be borne in mind, however, that the Vice-President of the United States, the President of the Senate, has but one secretary, while the Speaker of this House has a clerk and a secretary.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. One of them stands here at the desk while the House is in session and does not do any business outside of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to agreeing to the amendment on behalf of the committee.

Mr. HALE. I think the two officers ought to be put on the same basis.

Mr. RANDALL. That is right; let the amendment be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. To make the sum-total in lines 203 and 204 correspond with the paragraph as amended, I move to strike out "$173,120" and to insert "$173,860."

Mr. WALLING. I ask the gentleman to withhold that amendment until I offer another amendment to this paragraph. I offer the following amendment:

In line 168, strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,250;" so that it will read, "clerk to Sergeant-at-Arms, $2,250."

This amendment has reference to the pay of the clerk of the Sergeant-at-Arms, known as his cashier, who holds as responsible a position, perhaps, as that of any clerk in this House or of any officer connected with it, since he has charge of the accounts of all the members and has to give bonds for the faithful performance of his duties.

The tally-clerk at the desk by this bill receives $2,250. That is what this amendment proposes to give the clerk to the Sergeant-at-Arms. I think by the printed statement in the report of the committee that they intended to give him this salary. It is there stated at $2,250. His present pay is $2,500. The bill will reduce the salary of this clerk 20 per cent., while other officers are reduced only 5 per cent.

I am satisfied the House will see the propriety of leaving the pay of this clerk at least equal to that of the tally-clerk at the desk. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WELLS,] a member of the committee, informed me that he supposed that this officer's salary was fixed at that amount. I hope the amendment will prevail. The position is one of great importance, and the pay at $2,250 will be small enough.

Mr. SINGLETON. I rise to oppose the amendment.

This debate, to my mind, has been somewhat remarkable both on account of the character of the objections that have been made to the provisions of the bill and the class of gentlemen who have made them. It has been objected that the salaries of the clerks, officers, and employés of this House are about to be reduced unwarrantably and unconscionably. Now, sir, I venture to assert that you might take these gentlemen, clever as they are, and possessing eminent qualifications for the positions they occupy, and put them in any other position in a city or in a rural district, where the same duties were to be performed, and not one of them will get the amount of salary the United States is now paying them. I know the impression has obtained, and has been too extensively carried out in practice, that everything that is done for the Government should have a higher price paid for it than for that which is done for individuals. I ask you if there is any soundness in this practice? I ask if there is any justice in giving any class of men for Government services higher wages than they could get in any other like pursuits or employments in life?

Every one of those gentlemen holding offices in this House knew, when members of Congress came here, that every man of us, especially on this side of the House, was pledged to retrenchment, and they accepted these offices upon condition, implied if not expressed, that they would submit to whatever reduction Congress might think proper to make. They knew as well then as they know at this time that one of the most potent agencies employed in changing the political complexion of this House was a promise upon our part to reform the abuses in the use of public funds which had brought the republican party under condemnation. And yet, sir, when it is proposed to touch their salaries, at once a clamor is raised against it all over the country, and you cannot get into a street-car or go to one of the hotels without having somebody hanging to you and protesting against the provisions of this bill.

Now, sir, have we reduced the salaries improperly? Gentlemen have said on this floor that these salaries were raised some years ago and have remained at the figures then fixed up to the present time. I hold in my hand a carefully prepared statement taken from the laws passed on this subject, and I propose to show gentlemen how salaries have been increased from year to year extravagantly, recklessly, and the necessity now of bringing them back again to the old standard. Let me take the year 1866, if you please. I find that then the Clerk of the House received $3,600; in 1867 it was raised to $4,320; in 1873 it was still $4,320, and in addition to that an act was passed giving him $576 as disbursing clerk of a particular fund; making the whole salary $4,896.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that under a former law the Clerk had large fees paid him, which made his salary a good deal more than he got after those fees were abolished.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope that the gentleman will not interrupt me, for I have but a few minutes in which to discuss this question. We find the Clerk received $4,320, and also received $576 as disbursing clerk. Then he had the use of three horses and wagons, for the use of which appropriations were made of $912.50 each, making $2,737.50 in the aggregate, thus increasing his pay by these perquisites to $7,637.50. It must be borne in mind that the Government furnished stables and everything necessary to the taking care of the teams except feed. Allow him now $300 for taking care of the three horses, the salary will still be $7,337.50; and yet gentlemen tell us with serious faces that there ought not to be any retrenchment in this direction.

Again, they say that these salaries ought not to be reduced because they are inadequate to the support of our clerks and employés. These parties are not compelled to remain here if the salaries are inadequate. All they have to do is to please themselves by retiring, and please a like number of men who will come here and take their places for the salaries offered.

Mr. BLOUNT obtained the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I think there need be no further discussion on this question, as I understand the gentleman from Ohio is willing to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WALLING. I withdraw it if there is any objection to it.

Mr. SINGLETON. I desire to say a few words more on this subject.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SINGLETON. I was going on to say further that there is no responsibility attaching to the officers and employés of this House. If they can get their salaries doubled or quadrupled and coolly pocket them, no responsibility whatever attaches to them. No wonder, therefore, that they lobby to have their salaries increased. But we, as the representatives of the people, are responsible for what is done in this House, and gentlemen on this side of the House are responsible especially, because we constitute the majority in this House.

One of the gentlemen who addressed the House the other night said that we should not cut down salaries, but reduce the number of employés; yet as soon as that question was touched the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] rose and informed us that the Clerk of the House had notified him that if the force was materially reduced he could not perform the labors devolved upon him. Sir, it is his duty, with the force allowed him by Congress, to perform to the best of his ability the duties attaching to his position, and then if he does not meet them, as he says he cannot, we can remedy the evil. But, sir, the time has come when we should take the responsibility of meeting this question for ourselves, and not allow any clerk or employé of the House, no matter how high or important his position may be, to obtrude his opinion upon us and dictate what shall be done in the way of fixing the salaries. I hope the time has come when this thing will be stopped.

Why, sir, it has been bruited all over the country that if we cut down these salaries we shall ruin these men. Petitions have come in on the subject and we constantly get letters concerning it. Outside influences are brought to bear in order to prevent us from carrying out our views of retrenchment. I hope that we shall disregard these things and go forward in the discharge of our duty like men.

Some other gentlemen propose to apply the 10 per cent. rule inflexibly and invariably. Now, I want the gentlemen who have advocated this proposition to say whether they are in earnest. Your President receives a salary of $50,000 a year. Are you willing to apply that rule and leave his salary at $45,000? If you are, you throw yourselves in antagonism to the republican Senate, for they have already said in a bill this day sent to us that the President's salary shall be reduced to $25,000. Again, are you willing to apply that principle to those employés in the Treasury and other Departments of the Government who receive $900 a year, women who are faithfully discharging the duties heretofore performed by men receiving $1,400, $1,600, and $1,800 a year? Do you want the inexorable rule of 10 per cent. applied to them, so that their salaries shall be cut down to $810 a year? I want gentlemen who desire that to be done to rise up and so declare. When, therefore, you put yourselves behind these pretended objections to be used as a masked battery from which to fight the action of the Committee on Appropriations, I say that you are not acting in good faith.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WALLING] is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. It is withdrawn.

Mr. DURHAM. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 190 and 191 strike out the words "document file-clerk, $1,200," and insert in lieu thereof the words "document file-clerk, $1,500."

I desire to say a word or two, not in regard to this proposed amendment, but in reply to what has fallen from the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.] I desire to say that my position is not inconsistent, as stated by himself. My position in regard to all these offices is that there are supernumeraries in the various Departments, and that the true policy is to give fair salaries to those who are retained. I stated, too, the other evening that the Clerk of the House had informed me that the reduction proposed to be made by this committee in his force was so great that he could not carry on the business of his office, but that he had to submit to a certain amount of reduction in his force.

That reduction should be had; beyond that I contend, on the statement of the Clerk himself, this House ought not to go, provided it would retard the public service here. I stand by and maintain that position. I say that, in the real philosophy, the real genius of our institutions, those who come here and perform public service should have fair and reasonable salaries, and they should not be required to work for a compensation less than their services demand.

Now one word in regard to the amendment I have offered. As was said the other night, the injustice that seems to be done—mark you, I desire to exculpate the Committee on Appropriations; I desire to again declare that I believe they have acted honestly and conscientiously in this matter. But here is the document file-clerk, who under this bill will receive but $1,200 a year when he now receives $1,800, thus cutting his compensation down 50 per cent. He is required to be here from one end of the year to the other; his duties require him to be here all the time, as I understand from him. Now I suggest to the committee and to the House that a salary of $1,200 a year for an employé of this House, who is required to be here the entire year, is really not enough, considering the cost of living in the city of Washington. I have therefore moved to reduce his salary only $300 a year instead of $600, as proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DURHAM. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman is correct in saying that $1,200 a year is not enough in the case of a clerk employed by this House, what does the gentleman propose to do with the clerks in the Departments, all of whose salaries above $1,200 are cut down by this bill?

Mr. DURHAM. The proportion is not the same, mark you. For instance, you take a fourteen-hundred-dollar clerk, and cut his salary down 10 per cent. But here you have taken a man whose services are acknowledged to be worth $1,800 a year, by your own bill brought in here a year ago, and cut down his compensation 50 per cent., or from $1,800 to $1,200.

Mr. HALE. I understood the gentleman to say—perhaps I did not understand him correctly—that he thought $1,200 a year was not enough for a clerk to live upon here in Washington. Perhaps the gentleman did not say that.

Mr. DURHAM. I meant for such a clerk as this one. I will say in this connection that, while I am in favor of all necessary economy, I will resist to the utmost the cutting down of the compensation of the poorly-paid officers who come here and labor as hard as I do. That is my position all the way through.

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not wish to vex the ear of this House by any remarks I may make; but I wish to respond a little further to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM.] The gentleman talks about the reduction of the salaries below what they should be. I will refer a little more in detail to the statement I have in my hand.

The Chief Clerk to this House appointed by the Clerk elected in 1866 received an annual salary of $2,160. In 1867 it was raised to $2,592; in 1870 it was put up to $3,000, and in 1873 it was further raised to $3,600. You can see from this statement how these salaries have been increased for favorites, for particular persons who hold places here. They have been increased from year to year, and gentlemen can very well see the necessity of bringing them back again to a reasonable compensation for such services.

I find by this statement that the journal clerk in 1866 received $2,160 a year; in 1867 his salary was raised to $2,592; in 1870, to $3,000, and in 1873, to $3,600. Thus it has been going from bad to worse every year, until it has reached this enormous amount. In 1866 the reading clerk received $1,800 a year; in 1867, $2,160; in 1870, $2,592, and in 1873, $3,000.

With these facts staring them in the face gentlemen tell us that for years past the salaries of our clerks have not been increased—have been at these figures since the day of democratic rule. This list shows the matter differently; it demonstrates that these salaries have been increased year after year because individual favorites held the positions, and they have grown until they have become disproportionate to the amount of labor they have to perform. I might go through the list and show the same thing in reference to all parties employed about this House, but I will not dwell upon it further.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] says that he did announce here, as I remember he did, that the Clerk had interposed his objection to this reduction. I repeat, that the Clerk ought to have remained silent; his voice should not have been heard in this matter. He had no right to interfere with the action of this House by getting his Representative to rise and tell us that he cannot perform the duties of his office with the force we propose to give him. If he cannot perform the duties required of him, then let him get out of the way and take his whole force with him, and we will see that those are appointed who can and will perform the duties. I have no unkind feeling toward the Clerk and his appointees; they have all been courteous and attentive to me. But I have a duty to perform, and I will perform it regardless of the consequences to them or myself.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to state that my attention has been called to the fact that I said the compensation of this document file-clerk has been reduced 50 per cent.; I should have said 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think any portion of this bill received more consideration from the Committee on Appropriations than the portion relating to the salaries of the employés of this House. We have fixed them at what we deemed to be adequate and equitable, compared with the salaries paid for like services in the Departments.

Take the case of the reading clerk of this House, at a salary of $2,250 a year, as fixed by this bill. That reading clerk will receive that salary from the 1st of July next, and for seventeen months following that date he will be engaged in the performance of his duties here but three months. What his duties are you all see and hear? The moment he is through with his duties at that desk, he can put on his hat and go away. And the very moment your session is closed, he can pack his trunk and leave the city by the next train. Yet the reading clerk for the three months' service receives absolutely $1,000 a month.

Now, in considering these questions, (and I believe we have done no injustice whatever,) we have taken them up just like a matter of our own business; just as I. acting as a merchant, would fix for my clerk a salary liberal and at the same time just. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to make a single remark in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] In the main I agree perfectly with what he has said; but I would not have the new members of the House misunderstand the steps by which we have arrived at the salaries which this bill now proposes to reduce. New members ought to be informed that these exceptionally high salaries upon which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] has just been commenting—those of the reading clerks, journal clerk, &c.—were forced up last year against the efforts of the Committee on Appropriations. Four conference committees between the Senate and the House broke down, and only the fifth succeeded in settling the disagreement. At that time, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I again and again used the argument which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has to-day used and which I fully indorse, but was met again and again by the indignant answer of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] the present chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that I was attempting to "save at the spigot;" that these very officers required higher salaries because of the importance of the work that they did. The Committee on Appropriations and I, as their chairman, were beaten on that question; and those salaries were raised as the result of the unprecedented struggle I have mentioned.

I simply wish that the House, and especially members who are here this session for the first time, may know that the high figures at which the salaries under discussion have been heretofore fixed cannot be charged upon the recent administration of affairs in this House. Those salaries were put up by persistent effort under the leadership of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who now takes precisely the view which the Committee on Appropriations took a year ago.

Mr. RANDALL. If I have in the past committed any error, I have the courage to stand up here and correct it.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no objection to that.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, as to the remark quoted by the gentleman as having been made by me in regard to "saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung-hole," the gentleman will recollect that that related to the sundry civil bill of last year, upon which I refused to sign the conference report, if I remember rightly, because the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] caviled at these salaries of the clerks at our desk, while the conference committee and the Committee on Appropriations inserted upon the bill appropriations to the amount of millions of dollars which should not have been there.

Mr. GARFIELD. Where?

Mr. RANDALL. Why, sir, the sundry civil bill, as made up last year, embraced appropriations to the amount of $23,000,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman knows that salaries of officers of this House are not contained in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I say to-day that I believe appropriations to the amount of many millions contained in that bill had no more right in that bill than I have to put my hand in the pocket of the gentleman and take his pocket-book.

Mr. GARFIELD. When we come to the sundry civil service bill I shall be very glad to discuss all those items with the gentleman. This is another bill that we are now discussing.

Mr. WHITE. I move as an amendment to the amendment to strike out "$2,250" as the salary of the Chief Clerk, journal clerk, two reading clerks, and tally clerk, and insert "$1,800." I offer this amendment because, as I have before stated, none of these men, if they should lose their places here and be thrown upon their own resources, can make as much money as we now pay them. That to my mind is a sufficient reason why we should reduce these salaries. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] that it is our duty to reduce them to something like consistency with the salaries received for similar work in the private affairs of life.

There is one other remark I wish to make. I find here a good many messengers at $125 a month. Every man on this floor must know that none of these messengers do work anything like so hard as that of the conductors and drivers of our street cars; yet the latter, working from ten to sixteen hours every day, receive but $56 a month; while these men, who lie around and do almost nothing, get $125 a month. There is ample room here for a great reduction; and the country demands it of us. The only question is whether we have the courage to make these reductions. When I have the opportunity I shall move a reduction in the pay of these messengers.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] will not be adopted. I think we have equalized the pay properly.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is not properly an amendment to that of his colleague, [Mr. DURHAM.] However, the Chair will put it to a vote.

The amendment of Mr. WHITE was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. For the purpose of saying what I desire to say I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] that this bill and these reductions have been framed on business principles, and that the salaries proposed to be paid to the employés of the Government have been regulated by the prices which business men are paying to their employés for like services. As I said the other day, I am in favor of that principle. But, Mr. Chairman, I regret that the majority on the other side of the House have not been able to agree upon their financial policy before calling upon us to meet and finally settle this question of a reduction of salaries; for, sir, the practicability and permanency of any reduction of salaries must, in my opinion, depend wholly upon the early return to specie payments.

As I said the other day, I am in favor of reducing those salaries which have been raised by reason of the inflation of the currency, and I am in favor of doing this because I believe in the republican doctrine of an early resumption of specie payment, and because I believe the people at the next election will indorse that doctrine. I do not believe we can have any permanent reduction of salaries on any other policy than this, and I believe any attempt to have such reduction on any other policy will prove a delusion which will deceive nobody but ourselves.

The present value of a dollar greenback is about eighty-eight cents, and if its value shall be raised to one hundred cents, we could reduce the salaries of our clerks and employés 10 per cent. without any loss to any officer or employé. But, sir, will it be right and just to reduce salaries, and then supplement that action by legislation which will inflate prices and increase the cost of every necessary of life? Can our officers and employés live between the upper and nether millstones of reduced salaries and an inflated currency? I now ask my distinguished friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] because I know he is an honest man and I believe he will meet this question fairly, if he shall induce us to unite with him in reducing salaries, whether he will then turn round and insist on the repeal of the specie-resumption act and oppose legislation which will lead to the funding of the greenback—legislation which is absolutely necessary to any return to specie payments?

Mr. KELLEY rose.

Mr. MILLER. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to let the gentleman from Indiana answer my question.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to promptly, instantly, correct a mistake the gentleman has fallen into. Does he not know that a dollar greenback will buy twice as much wheat as it would two or three years ago? Does he not know it will buy more silver than it would six months ago? Does he not know it will buy more yards of cotton goods of the same texture and of woolen and worsted goods than it would six months ago, one year ago, or two years ago? Does he not know, I ask, that it will buy more silver, more cotton goods, more woolen goods, more wheat, more wheat flour, than a gold dollar would before the war? Why does he call it depreciated? Why does he say you cannot measure values by it?

There is but one commodity in the world which it will not buy so much of as it did, and that is one the value of which has been fictitiously enhanced by our legislation and by the action of foreign governments, and that is gold. It is the only commodity. By demonetizing silver in foreign nations, by demonetizing paper here, by insisting that there is and can be but one standard of value in the world, gold, we have run it up to a fictitious value. But the gentleman forgets he does not eat gold, does not wear gold, does not sleep in a golden house, does not feed his cattle and horses on gold, does not travel in golden carriages; and yet he tells us that the greenback is depreciated, and we cannot reduce salaries until we get rid of it! The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] asks whether we can feed on paper——

Mr. GARFIELD. Whether we can feed horses and cattle on paper?

Mr. KELLEY. That same gentleman, when some years ago I spoke of the value of an inexportable currency, said we had other articles which were unexportable, rancid butter, moldy cheese, addled eggs, and wanted to know whether the country was richer because they were not exportable. He had not studied the question of currency and money sufficiently to know that the value and power in use of money depend on the fact that it is legal tender, and this nation had never made rancid butter, addled eggs, or moldy cheese a legal tender, [laughter,] and that therefore——

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. KELLEY. Not in a five-minute speech. And that, while to export our money was to derange values and contract production, to combine rancid butter, moldy cheese, and addled eggs might make an invaluable manure that would stimulate the growth of exportable articles the next year. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit the point of order; this is not a bill to resume specie payment.

Mr. KELLEY. I did not introduce the subject.

Mr. RANDALL. Therefore I shall object hereafter to any debate not pertinent to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot rule on the point of order, as no one now holds the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There are some points made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania altogether correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I renew it.

I wish to call to the attention of my friend from Pennsylvania, that the reason why the greenback will buy more wheat is not from anything intrinsically in the greenback itself, but from the fact that our industries have been prostrated, our people have not been earning money, and have not been able to buy as much wheat as if they had been earning money. They have not been able really to buy as much as when they were at work of that most costly of our cereals. There are some commodities raised here, the value of which is determined by gold in foreign countries, which the greenback will not buy as much of as it would last year, and one of them is pork, the foreign demand for which has raised its price, so that the assertion of the gentleman that the greenback will buy more of all the necessities of life is not quite correct. The greenback will not buy as much pork, simply because we do not fix the value of pork.

Mr. KELLEY. If wheat has gone down and pork gone up, does it not prove that the volume of the currency does not regulate the value of both, and send one up kiting and the other down a precipice?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Pork is wanted where there is gold to pay for it. No increase in the volume of our currency would help a laborer without a demand for his labor to buy anything.

Mr. KELLEY. Pork is wanted where they can get it by paying a high price for it. Demand and supply and not the volume of currency regulate prices.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is wanted where it will be paid for in gold, and we send it there. But people are not so able to buy wheat on account of want of work through which to get money. There having been a shorter crop than formerly has not raised the price, because our workmen could not buy.

But let me say one word on the pending amendments to this paragraph of the bill. The majority of this House have come to the spot where if they do not stand together they may just as well abandon their bill, unless the minority go to their assistance. And I wish to assert what I consider a truism, that economists are not of a party; economical men of both parties effect economy. If, Mr. Chairman, the economy proposed to be carried out by this Congress is to be carried out, now is the time, when the majority is disorganized on a proposition, that the economists on the minority side must go to their support, as we did when we had obnoxious legislation proposed on finance.

I cannot tell, individually, whether all the amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations are correct or not. I do not belong to any of the committees that get up those bills. My labors are elsewhere. But all through the last Congress, when we cut down the appropriations of this Government $30,000,000, I stood by our Committee on Appropriations, because I knew they had investigated the subject and were honestly trying to bring about a reform in expenditures.

Now, sir, I do not acknowledge party feeling in this question. I am not aware that any exists. I am going to stand by the Committee on Appropriations on every proposition looking to retrenchment where it is not evident that the service will be crippled. If they make any mistake, they are responsible to the country for their mistakes. I have no means of getting information as to what is right in regard to particular salaries and other expenditures of the Government except through the legitimate committees of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I am very much obliged, indeed, to the gentleman from Iowa, and I believe I speak the mind of the Committee on Appropriations in saying so. I do not think that when we have got through he will find that his confidence in us has been misplaced.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. DURHAM'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. FORT. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "engineers," in line 148, add these words:

"And all engineers and others who are engaged in heating and ventilating the House shall be subject to the orders of and in all respects be under the direction of the Doorkeeper."

I have no desire whatever to interfere with the organization of the officers of this House. But it does seem to me proper that whereas the Doorkeeper has charge of the Hall he ought also to have control of all the persons who are connected with the ventilation and heating of the Hall. I am told, sir, that just now this is not the case. Perhaps if it were, things might go better; they certainly could not go worse. There is no possibility of their going worse than the ventilation has been in this Hall for the past few weeks. Therefore we have nothing at all to lose, and perhaps might gain some comfort by adopting this amendment.

The Doorkeeper, as we all know, and by the way he is a very gentlemanly and accommodating man, is about with us on the floor all the time. His duties are here, and so far as I have observed he has in all respects tried to accommodate the members and others who have business in the Hall. He tells the House, or at least he has told me, that he has no control over the engineer; that the engineer will not obey his order; and that when he takes to him requests coming from this House, he receives an answer that intimates that he is not at all responsible to him for what he does.

It seems to me that the Clerk of the House, who I understand appoints the engineer, not having charge of the Hall, is really not the proper person to control the engineers and the persons having charge of the ventilation. Let me say that I have no fault in the world to find with the Clerk; but he is not here among us all the time as is the Doorkeeper. His duties take him elsewhere. His are clerical duties, while those of the Doorkeeper, it does seem to me, are more fit and proper to be coupled with the control of the engineer department and the ventilation of the House.

It is well known that the night before last the gas was let on and was running all night, which made the Hall the next day very disagreeable, with an unwholesome odor about it. We cannot blame the Doorkeeper if we come here and find things wrong in that way. He says he has no control. If peradventure a spark of lightning had struck the building an explosion of the gas might have resulted and the Dome of this beautiful Capitol might have been carried off. It does appear to me, unless I hear some reason to the contrary, that this appointment to this position should be in the hands of the Doorkeeper. There can be no political feeling in the matter. My amendment neither raises nor lowers any salary, and I think it should be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I admit there is great force and propriety in the statement of the gentleman from Illinois. And on a subject which touches so closely the comfort of all the members, I have no hesitation in permitting an unbiased vote of the House without a word from the committee. The reason why no change was made in this particular in the bill was that our attention was not called to it; and perhaps if it had been we should not have made the change, because we should have felt reluctant to transfer from one officer of the House of Representatives to another officer of the House the patronage which belonged to him. But I am entirely content, and the members of the committee, to whom I have immediate access, are quite willing that this amendment should be voted on without any expression of opinion on their part.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to occupy the remaining few minutes of his time?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I simply wish to say that if this measure is to be adopted it seems to me it should be by a rule of the House. I suppose we have the right to control the matter by a rule, but if it goes in the appropriation bill it will not bind anybody until the bill has gone through the Senate, then gone through a conference committee, and been signed by the President. The result would be that it would be utterly inoperative for this session, for it would not take effect until about the time we would adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I take it that the matter is regulated by law.

Mr. HOAR. No; the offices may be created by law, but certainly the House has the right to control the duties of its officers. I do not wish to interfere with a vote on the amendment, but it seems to me that if this vote should indicate an opinion in the House in favor of the proposition, which I think it will, then the chairman of the committee should bring forward a rule on the subject.

Mr. RANDALL. That the change be made immediate?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I move to amend by striking out the last word, simply for the purpose of making some explanation in regard to this department. As to putting the charge of the lighting and heating of the Hall under the control of the Doorkeeper, I see no impropriety in that; but it will be borne in mind that the Clerk furnishes the coal and oil and all the other matters connected with the heating-apparatus. It is done by contract. All the material used by the House, such as carpeting, desks, and furniture connected with the House, goes through the Clerk's office, under contract made by him or employés of his. The Doorkeeper of the House has the expenditure of no money and keeps no account of it. I can see no impropriety, however, in giving the control of the heating and the lighting of the Hall to the Doorkeeper.

Another matter connected with the heating-apparatus, the employing of hands, &c., should be still under the control of the Clerk.

I think the matter would be as well arranged by a resolution as by a clause in the appropriation bill, and I suggest, therefore, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] that he prepare a resolution defining the duties of the Doorkeeper and Clerk in connection with the heating and lighting department of the House.

Mr. FORT. I cannot see that the reason that the Clerk purchases the fuel should interfere with reference to this matter more than it does with the stationery. The Clerk purchases the stationery by contract very properly, and the fuel and oil also, and he can turn it over to the engineer.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The stationery department is under the Clerk, the document-room is under the Doorkeeper, and these matters have been so changed about that it is difficult to understand where any of them belong.

Mr. FORT. I can see no difficulty here.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. There is a difficulty.

Mr. FORT. I should like an expression of the feeling of the House in regard to the amendment. It can certainly do no harm, and if the sense of the House is in favor of it, we can apply it immediately by a resolution and see if we cannot place the custody of this Hall and its ventilation and heating in the charge of a man who is in it at all times and about and among us and knows what we need.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] the fact that the question of the jurisdiction of the employés of the House or the different departments of the House should be decided and determined, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] has suggested, by resolution, from the fact that the Senate has nothing in the world to do with the employment of the servants of the House, and it would be very improper to incorporate this in an appropriation bill. This question can be very readily determined by an independent resolution offered at another time. But the fact that it is a good thing in itself and that it would be proper to divest the Clerk of this duty and impose it on the Doorkeeper is no good reason why it should be adopted here in this appropriation bill.

I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] that he withdraw his amendment, and at the proper time in the House offer it as a resolution, and it would no doubt meet with the concurrence of both sides of the House.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I withdraw my formal amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. FORT's amendment; and on a division there were ayes 98, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. In line 204 I move to strike out the word "1" and insert "8," and to strike out "20" and insert "60;" so that it will read, "making in all the sum of $173,860."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to amend the section by striking out in lines 105, 106, 107, and 108 the following:

Twelve messengers, during the session, at $125 per month each, and two at $1,200 each.

And inserting in lieu thereof as follows:

Fourteen messengers, at $1,200 each per annum.

We all know what duties these messengers have to perform, commencing at early dawn and lasting until eight, nine, or ten o'clock at night. I believe they earn the salaries proposed by the amendment. The amount paid now is $18,200 a year; the amount proposed by my amendment will be, at $1,200 each, $16,800, making a saving of over $2,100, or a little over 11 per cent. I believe the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire that it shall be understood precisely that the result of that amendment is to add about $13,600, which is really a gratuity, and there is no occasion whatever for it. Two messengers during the year are quite sufficient. We examined this subject very carefully, and I repeat that this is nothing more or less than a gratuity to these men. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman is mistaken in calling this a gratuity.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. PRATT. I was about to propose this amendment when it was proposed by the gentleman from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL.] I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations this question: Whether the messengers of the House are not really entitled to the same compensation that is provided in this bill for the messengers of the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer the gentleman, and I am very much obliged to him for calling my attention to that matter. There is a mistaken impression prevailing in this House in reference to the messengers of the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee of Ways and Means. The messenger for the Committee of Ways and Means, I think—I know that the messenger for the Committee on Appropriations is assigned by the Doorkeeper. The messenger for that committee is in fact an assistant clerk; he keeps the docket and performs all the clerical work which the time of the chief clerk of the committee will not permit him to perform. The gentleman will see that the salary is only $1,200 a year, and when we compare it with the salaries of others around this House it is very low.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to ask the gentleman further if these messengers of the committees——

Mr. RANDALL. And they are here during the recess also.

Mr, PRATT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that these committee-messengers have to remain here during the recess?

Mr. RANDALL. Before the short session of Congress the Committee on Appropriations always meet here a month or six weeks before the beginning of the session. Gentlemen will recollect that the short session is only three months, and this meeting of the Committee on Appropriations previous to the beginning of the session is necessary for the preparation of the appropriation bills which have to be passed at the short session. In addition to his other duties the messenger of the committee has to remain here at the close of the session. In fact, although he is called a messenger, he is not really a messenger at all, but a clerk at the modest salary of $1,200 a year.

Mr. PRATT. I do not suppose that these committee messengers are needed here very much of the time when the committees are not here. But under this bill these committee messengers get just double what the messengers of the House will get. During a Congress the two sessions will not ordinarily exceed ten months. That would give the messengers of the House for the two years but $1,250, while the messengers of the committees would get for the same time $2,400. It seems to me that that is unequal, and that either the pay of the messengers of the House should be increased or the pay of the messengers of the committees should be decreased. Certainly the messengers of the House ought to have a compensation equal to that given to the messengers of the committees of the House. I therefore shall favor the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. In reply to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRATT,] allow me to suggest that the messengers of the committees of whom he speaks are in no sense messengers. They are clerks; they perform clerical duty and nothing else. The messengers for these committees are assigned by the Doorkeeper. I have served on both the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations, and therefore I am able to make this explanation. I know that in both cases these so-called messengers have been as hard-worked clerks as any about this House.

Mr. BUCKNER. Can the gentleman give any reason why the one messenger should be paid by the month and the other by the year?

Mr. FOSTER. The clerks of the leading committees are paid by the year, and I presume that is the reason why these assistant clerks are paid by the year. They have always been designated as messengers, and the Committee on Appropriations this time chose to continue that designation; but they are really assistant clerks.

Mr. RICE. Are these two committees entitled to two clerks each?

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman knew all the work imposed upon the clerk, he would say at once that it is a wonder that he should get along at all. The fact is that the members of the committees are all clerks; they have absolutely had to discharge the duties of clerks.

Mr. RUSK. Then let them draw the pay of a clerk. [Laughter.]

The amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HUNTON. I renew the amendment to the amendment for the purpose of correcting a mistake made by my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. RANDALL.] He says that the difference between the bill as reported by the committee and the bill as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] would be $13,000. I have made a calculation and find that he is mistaken by the small sum of $5,000. The difference between the bill and the amendment is $8,400.

Mr. RANDALL. I say that the gentleman is mistaken, as I will show him.

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir; "the gentleman" is not mistaken, and I will show him I am not. I will make the comparison so that my friend can follow me in my calculation. According to the bill there are twelve messengers at $500 a year, that is $125 a month for four months, which makes $500 each; that amounts to $6,000. Then there are two messengers at $1,200 each, making $2,400 a year. These two sums added together aggregate $8,400.

According to the amendment, the messengers of the post-office would cost as follows: fourteen messengers at $1,200 each, making $16,800; and subtracting $8,400 from $16,800 leaves the amount $8,400, which I suggested.

Mr. RANDALL. Now I will show the gentleman how he is mistaken. We have in this bill twelve messengers at $500 for the session; we need not mix up these with the two officers who are employed during the year.

Mr. HUNTON. That is $6,000.

Mr. RANDALL. That is $6,000. The amendment of the gentleman from California proposes that these messengers shall receive a salary of $1,500 per annum.

Mr. HUNTON. O, no.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNTON. Twelve hundred dollars.

Mr. RANDALL. One hundred and twenty-five dollars a month.

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir; $100 a month. I knew my friend did not calculate upon a proper basis or he would not have criticised my arithmetic.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, even upon the figures as now stated by the gentleman, it would still be a large gratuity.

Mr. HUNTON. Still the amount is exactly what I stated, the difference being $8,400 instead of $13,000. It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that to run the post-office of this House properly requires this number of messengers. I, with my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] am a sincere advocate for reform and economy; and I think this amendment carries out that idea. Reductions have been made upon salaries; and they have been decided reductions. Under the present law the Postmaster gets $2,592; under the bill as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from California he will get $2,200. His first assistant gets under the present law $2,088; under the bill as proposed to be amended he will get $1,800. Under the present law seven of the messengers receive $1,500 and seven $1,200. The aggregate under the present law is $23,580; while under the bill as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from California the aggregate would be $20,800; a reduction of over 10 per cent., which is the average reduction proposed by the committee in the expenses of this House.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. The Committee on Appropriations found that we had sixteen men—the Postmaster, the assistant postmaster, and fourteen messengers—to do the post-office business of this House of less than three hundred men. Now, no village or town in the United States with a population of three thousand people has over five men in its post-office to discharge the whole duty.

Mr. HUNTON. Is there any village in the United States where the postmaster delivers the mail in a cart three times a day?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I am going to explain that. The committee in making their appropriations for the post-office of the House have been governed by precisely the same considerations as in dealing with other branches of the House service. We propose that the Postmaster, the assistant postmaster, and two messengers shall receive pay during the whole year, whether Congress is in session or not; but we could not see any reason why fourteen messengers should be employed in that post-office during the vacation of Congress. At that time there is nothing for them to do except to receive their salaries and spend their time with their families. We do not propose to deduct one employé in that office; its efficiency will not be affected in the least; while there will be a saving of $8,400 a year in the salaries of messengers alone, saying nothing about the Postmaster and the assistant postmaster, in whose salaries we have made a reduction of $800.

If the amendment now proposed be adopted it will be equivalent to re-instating the messengers of this House and the Senate in regard to whom, as I showed a few evenings since, we propose a reduction of upward of $50,000 a year. If the amendment of the gentleman from California should be adopted, the same reasoning would restore the messengers of the Senate and the House on the footing of the old law. For that reason, if for no other, I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move to make it $1,500 instead of $1,200.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the difficulty I have about this bill is in the discrimination made in favor of clerks and against messengers. It does seem to me the same rule applied to one should be applied to the other, and there is no more propriety in fixing yearly compensation for any of these clerks than there is for fixing a yearly compensation for messengers, doorkeepers, and other employés. There are a great many officers who remain no longer on duty than do these messengers. Take for instance the reading clerk of the House. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, what has he to do after Congress adjourns? And yet he is paid by the year. In the very next section we find that the doorkeepers are paid by the month. I cannot understand it. In my judgment there is no good reason for it. On the contrary, it seems to me when you attempt to limit the pay of these messengers to four or five months you necessarily exclude from appointment to such offices any person coming from remote districts in the country, and confine the appointments to such places to persons living in this District or in the surrounding States. I protest against it. I hold these officers should be all paid alike, either by the month or by the year, and if we pay clerks by the year, I do not see any good reason why we should not pay messengers by the year.

I object to this bill on another ground, and I suggest to gentlemen of the House whether we ought to confine the session of Congress necessarily to three months. I hold that the Congress of this country should sit six months in every year, and that instead of adjourning on the 4th of March next we should meet earlier in the year and sit in the spring at the beginning of every Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. Some people think we sit here too long already.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then on the same ground we ought not to sit here at all. I do not know but it is right we should adjourn at once and the whole concern ought to be abolished. If we have a Congress at all it ought to sit long enough to attend to the duties intrusted to it.

I see the difficulties which the Committee on Appropriations labor under. They have had a large amount of work to do within a very short time. This Congress should have met, instead of on the first Monday in December, much earlier. Practically it did not meet until January. This Congress ought to have met immediately after the 4th of March or on the 1st of April last year, for the purpose of organization if for no other purpose, and these men ought to be paid on that theory, that Congress instead of sitting for only three months in one year should sit six months. As it is now during the short session of Congress nothing is done except to run through the appropriation bills. Our time is absolutely wasted except in passing appropriation bills for the purpose of running the Government. None of the practical legislation which it is our duty to enact in behalf of the people is gotten through with at all. Therefore as it is now the short session practically amounts to nothing.

Mr. EDEN. If we are not here but three months in the year, is that any good reason why we should pay these officers for a whole year?

Mr. BUCKNER. I hold we ought to provide by law that each Congress should begin early in April, and not on the following first Monday in December.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have a single word to say in regard to an amendment proposed by the gentleman from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL.] If the argument of the gentleman who has just taken his seat is good for anything, then whoever is employed by this House for one month should be voted a year's salary. I cannot for my life imagine anything more preposterous than to employ a messenger, or twelve messengers, for this House while in session and propose to vote them yearly salaries. Sir, all talk of reform is a farce, or that is preposterous. Are we, the representatives of the people, bold enough to go to the people voting away their money in this way? And if we do, what will the people in charge of the chief custom-houses and chief post-offices of the country, who have not money to light their gas to-night, say? I ask gentlemen here to look at this thing from a reasonable point of view. Are we not informed to-day that through lack of attention to our business the custom-houses and post-offices of the chief cities of the Union are obliged to cut off their water and gas? And shall we stand here in this House to discuss a question whether men employed for four months, in light, easy service, shall be paid for a full year? As knowing something of the feeling of the country in regard to the time wasted on such questions, I implore, with all due respect, that gentlemen will cease to discuss so preposterous and inadmissible a proposition.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this paragraph. That will not cut off amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I move when the committee resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill that all debate on the pending paragraph be closed in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to ask a question of the Chair. When the Clerk was reading, the Clerk passed the paragraph for mileage, $100,000, when I was on the floor ready to move an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot settle any question arising in the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHITE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has one minute in which to debate the pending paragraph.

Mr. WHITE. I ask unanimous consent to go back to the previous paragraph at line 130.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be done except by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL.]

The amendment was rejected—ayes 44, noes 83; no further count being asked for.

Mr. TUCKER. I offer the following amendment:

In line 200 strike out the words "Henry Douglass."

Mr. RANDALL. If you do that it will break a man's heart.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I thought I was entitled to one minute under the order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The minute allowed by the House has already been occupied.

Mr. TUCKER. I wish to make a single remark.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed by order of the House.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. May I have the privilege of asking a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is out of order.

The question being taken on Mr. TUCKER'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. POPPLETON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 178 strike out the words "Chaplain of the House, $900."

I believe I have one minute to debate this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed.

Mr. POPPLETON. I wish it to be understood that I am not opposed to praying——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JAMES B. REILLY. I offer the following amendment:

In line 191 strike out "thirty-two" and insert "eighteen;" and in line 194 strike out the words "of whom shall be" and insert "messengers," and after the word "roll" add the words "at the rate of $3.60 per day."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOOKER. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 180, 181, and 182 strike out "$4,500," and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000."

I desire to say simply a word in regard to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. All debate on this paragraph has been closed by order of the House.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MACKEY, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following amendment:

In line 193 strike out "$500" and insert "$600."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, namely:
For twenty-one clerks to committees, at $5 per day during the session, $12,600.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if the twenty-one clerks to committees, at $5 per day during the session, includes the clerk of the two Committees on the Pacific Railroad, and on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812?

Mr. RANDALL. They include all the clerks except such as are enumerated in the prior pages of the bill; four in the bill as reported, with one subsequently added.

Mr. HUNTON. I think the Committee of Accounts have reported in favor of the two committees I have named having a clerk from the 1st of March last.

Mr. RANDALL. The appropriation in this bill applies for the short session of this Congress. Of course any action of this Congress as to the employment of clerks for the current session must either come out of the existing appropriation, or if that be not sufficient out of the contingent fund of the House. Where the House have ordered the employment of clerks they will see to it that they are paid in some way, and if the contingent fund is not sufficient, then it will be provided for as a deficiency.

Mr. FOSTER. At the request of some of my friends I wish to inquire how many clerks of committees are employed now?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I think there must be at least thirty, including the five specially provided for in a previous paragraph of this bill.

Mr. HOSKINS. Nearly every committee of the House has a clerk. The number is much greater than it has ever been before while I have been in Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. We will have the number cut down for the next session.

Mr. HOSKINS. The number is much larger, though the pay is less.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For materials for folding books, $8,000.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I give notice that I have an amendment to offer to this and the two following paragraphs. I will wait until they are read before offering my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. After the paragraphs have been read you cannot go back unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Then I send my amendment to the desk. But before it is reached I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that it is for the purpose of striking out the three paragraphs from line 210 to line 219, and inserting the words contained in my amendment.

The Clerk read Mr. O'BRIEN's amendment, as follows:

Strike out from line 210 to line 219 inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

For folding documents, including pay of folders in the folding-room and materials, $20,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in paying more than fifteen folders.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The amendment which I have offered is an amendment in the line of retrenchment. It does not antagonize in any sense the bill which is before the committee, except as regards the manner and form in which the work contemplated is to be done. In fact I am informed by the Doorkeeper of the House, who has jurisdiction over this matter, that it will be a saving of expense; that is to say, while the committee's bill recommends $15,000 and a further sum to be paid without stating the amount, depending upon the terms of the contract. This contract is given out with the object of having the speeches, pamphlets, and documents folded, and the amount with the appropriation of $15,000 will be over the sum named in the amendment I have offered; that is to say, the sum of $20,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a considerable risk in this innovation which is proposed by the committee's bill. They propose to do this work by contract; that is to say, that whatever profit may be derived from this employment, and necessarily there will be some profit, shall go into the pocket of some one individual who has capital and influence enough to get the contract; whereas, upon the other hand, my amendment is in favor of the rights of the people, in favor of the rights of those poor men who need labor and are willing to perform it at the ordinary salary.

The amendment does not constitute any officers or employés, whether by the month or by the year, excepting those that will come within the line of the amendment; that is to say, fifteen employés. The salary of these, together with the material that will be required, will be covered by a sum not over $20,000.

Now, the amount appropriated last year was $25,000, and I understand from the Doorkeeper that there is a deficiency in his department which will make the amount $40,000, if not over $40,000.

Mr. FOSTER. About $60,000.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, I learn from an investigation into this matter that the service which I propose to pay with $20,000 for amounted during the last year to the sum of $126,000, and that at no time within the past four years has the same service which I propose to have performed for the insignificant sum of $20,000 cost less than $100,000.

I think therefore that it would be better, not only in the line of retrenchment but in the line of carrying out the views of the officer who has charge of this work and is supposed to know better than any other individual how it can be performed economically and in the best interest of the service, that it should not be provided for in the manner set forth in the bill of the committee. The amount the committee propose to provide is $15,000 for material and the labor to be given out by contract. The amount provided by my amendment is $20,000 to cover all expenses and to pay fifteen employés of the House to be employed as now in the folding-room. I trust that the committee will accept the amendment, because that it is not only in the interest of retrenchment but that it is an amendment which has the concurrence of the Doorkeeper.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not doubt that.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I believe that the committee have the right and I lay it down as a rule that they are bound to a certain extent to be governed by the opinions and judgment of the officers of this House within the domain of their duty. We have reposed confidence in them, and it is reasonable to expect that their experience in the line of their service is worthy of consideration and respect.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Of all Departments of the Government and subdepartments I suppose the folding-room of the House has been more loose than any other Department. It cost the United States during the Forty-third Congress for labor alone and clerical force $89,191.59. Frequently you find on the pay-rolls of that folding-room from eighty to ninety-five men all at one time.

The plan laid down by the committee is a very great and radical change, and one probably that the House will not understand without some explanation. I am afraid that the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] cannot be carried out satisfactorily. The committee in organizing the folding-room have provided for all the clerical force necessary, for one superintendent and three clerks and four laborers to handle the books and to do the work of packing and shipping them and all that sort of labor necessary outside the actual folding. The committee found that prior to the Thirty-sixth Congress folding was done by the piece. The price paid was for quarto volumes eighty cents for one hundred volumes and for octavo volumes forty cents for one hundred volumes. The committee propose to pay fifty cents a hundred volumes for quarto volumes and one cent per volume for octavo volumes. In making up their estimates they were governed by the number of books received from the Government Printing Office during the Forty-third Congress, which was 225,477 quarto volumes and 79,833 octavo volumes. They also base the force necessary for doing the folding, including the number of speeches to be folded, being governed by the number paid for in the Forty-third Congress. We felt that this is the only way to carry out this new system in order to save this large amount of money to the Treasury.

The plan proposed by the gentleman from Maryland would leave the door open for the Doorkeeper to hire men by the piece, or, if he chose, by the day, and in all probability by the day. So far from its being any advantage to the laboring man, under the system of the committee any man can go to the Doorkeeper and propose to make a contract for one hundred, five hundred, or fifty thousand volumes; in other words, it leaves persons who are expert and competent to do the business rapidly an opportunity to secure work. We have had men in the folding-room who never folded a book in their lives, and scarcely ever read one, and whom it has taken a whole day to fold a hundred books, while another man would go in and fold five hundred books in a day.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What would the plan of the committee cost? Have you made any calculation?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. We are saving $70,968.37 this Congress, taking it on the basis of the work done in the Forty-third Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSTER. I move to strike out the last word. The statement made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] relates entirely to the Forty-third Congress. I feel that it is due that this House should know, though I favor this proposition, that the same abuse that is charged on the Forty-third Congress continues in the Forty-fourth Congress, and that to-day we are asked for a deficiency of $35,000 in addition to the appropriation made for it last year.

Mr. RANDALL. That is true; and that is what we want to root out. The amendment of the gentleman will fasten upon this very abuse, which is the worst that we have found about this building.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. The criticism I made the other evening upon the clauses of this bill relating to the organization of the force about this House were directed wholly to the amount of the force needed. I ought to have said, and would have said if time had permitted me, that I regard the method of arranging the force about this House proposed in this bill as a great improvement; that is, to get down to specific duties, to assign a person to a specific duty for a specific amount of compensation. The principal proposition under discussion, that of paying so much a thousand for folding documents, is manifestly a wise business improvement, and one that I am glad to see made.

The only criticism I made at all was whether we had not so cut down the whole force as to cripple the necessary amount of official duties that ought to be performed. The method adopted by the committee, in my judgment, is a great improvement on anything we have had in recent years. But if it is found that the price proposed to be paid for folding is not high enough, as it may turn out to be—I do not know how that is—of course it can be corrected. The method adopted here is a first-rate method.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I renew it.

Mr. FORT. I understood the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] to say that these folders now employed cannot read a book.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I do not know how that is; but I know that men have been appointed who do not know the way to the folding-room and who could not find it to-day if told to go there.

Mr. O'BRIEN. In offering the amendment I had two motives in view. The first was to indicate by what I wished to say upon the question the opinion of the present officer who has jurisdiction of this matter, so that, if it should turn out that the plan adopted by the committee was a more costly one than the other, he would have the benefit of that expression of opinion. Secondly, I desired to show the character and the extent of the reform proposed by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in incorporating this plan in the appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I am entitled to no credit for this; the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] are entitled to it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I proposed to give the credit to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] until I was better informed. I now give it to those who are entitled to it. My object was to show by contrast the extent of that reform. The committee tell us that this work can be done for perhaps less than $20,000. My distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is willing to chime in with that plan now as not only economical but as right and proper and judicious. Why was it not a good plan when he was at the head of the Committee on Appropriations? Why did he not inaugurate this reform? In the judgment which he now pronounces in regard to the merit of this bill he eulogizes, as he should, the distinguished gentlemen on this side of the House who compose the Committee on Appropriations and at the same time condemns his past course as unjust and improper.

Mr. RANDALL. He is now converted.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Very well; it is a late conversion for the gentlemen on the other side. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] also favors this proposition of the committee. It is better that he and his colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] should be converted now than that they should never see the light and follow it. If there is any propriety in this rule in regard to the Doorkeeper's department, the credit for it does not belong to that side of the House, for they never inaugurated it; it belongs here. And it gives me great pleasure to give all honor and credit to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the present committee, where it properly belongs.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to say that I take meekly the punishment I have received from the powerful gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN.] I receive it in all meekness.

Mr. RANDALL. I am glad to receive the co-operation of gentlemen on that side of the House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For hire of horses and mail-wagons for carrying the mails, $4,000; and the Postmaster of the House of Representatives is hereby directed to advertise in one of the daily papers in Washington, District of Columbia, for one week for proposals for furnishing horses and wagons for carrying the mails, books, and other documents between the city post-office and the House post-office and document-room and the Departments and residences of members; said proposals to include for the carrying of said mails, books, and documents the use of not more than seven horses and wagons during the session of Congress, two of which shall be in use during the year; and he shall contract with the lowest responsible bidder for such service for the term of one year.

Mr. RANDALL. I have an amendment to the phraseology of the paragraph just read. I move to amend by inserting after the words "the House post-office" the words "and folding-room;" also after the word "books" the word "boxes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM. I move to strike out the paragraph just read as amended, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

For hire of seven horses and seven wagons for carrying the mails, books, and other documents between the city post-office and the House post-office and document-room and the Departments and residences of members, the sum of $4,000, and at least three of said horses and wagons shall be in use during the whole year.

I desire to state the reason for my amendment. In the first place I doubt very much the propriety of saying to the present employé of the House, who is discharging this duty, that his services shall terminate on the 30th of June next. He has entered into a contract in one sense of the word with the present Doorkeeper of the House for the whole of this Congress in the same manner that the principal officers of the House have entered into such a contract, except that they have been elected. He is employed for the whole year.

That is one objection I have to the proposition. Another is this: While I think that in most instances it is better to provide for giving out work of this kind by contract to the lowest bidder, still I do not think the necessary restrictions to secure the efficiency of the service are provided by this proposition. For instance, a responsible man in the city of Washington may undertake to deliver these mails; he may have a good one-horse cart and a first rate mule, and he will deliver the mails—when? Not at eight o'clock in the morning, as the person now employed does, the latter being subject to the order of the Postmaster, so that if he fails to do his duty he may be turned out and another man put in his place. The man who undertakes to do this business by contract may take until twelve o'clock to deliver the mails; and still he may be regarded as a responsible bidder. That is the objection I have to the proposition.

I believe that this matter ought to be left precisely as it is now. Let the amount of compensation be fixed and let the postmaster be responsible that his employé shall deliver the mails with promptness and dispatch, which I think would not be secured by this proposition to let out the work to the lowest responsible bidder. Besides, there is no economy in the proposition. The Committee on Appropriations cannot say that I propose any increase of cost. The amount fixed in my amendment is the price which has been fixed by the Committee on Appropriations—$4,000. Let the postmaster be held responsible, as he now is, for the employment of good messengers, good wagons, good horses, and that the mails shall be delivered with promptitude at the residences of the various members. For these reasons I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Before taking my seat I wish to modify my amendment by putting in "folding-room," as it was in the original.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Under the present system the Postmaster uses the Government wagons, the horses are kept at the Government stable, taken care of by Government employés, and are driven of course by the officers of the Government. This amendment changes the law so as to authorize the Postmaster to advertise for these wagons and horses, which are to be driven by the messengers of the post-office. The wagons and horses are to be brought to the Capitol at such times as the Postmaster may direct. They are to be at all times under his control.

During the last year we have been paying for six wagons $5,472, or $912 a year for each wagon. Now we propose to make an appropriation to pay for the use of seven horses and wagons for three months. We provide for seven instead of six, in order to make up for a deficiency in the number of wagons heretofore allowed by the Clerk for this purpose. We propose that during nine months of the next year there shall be only five wagons in use, they being necessary only for carrying documents to the post-office and the different Departments, and such other work as may be required outside of the delivery of mails to members in this city. I believe that under this system the service will be as efficiently rendered as under the present system. We shall certainly have the same drivers; and there is no reason why they should not be able to deliver the mails at the same hours as heretofore.

Mr. DURHAM. What control would you have over a man who might get this contract as the lowest bidder to require him to deliver the mail promptly?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The man from whom we hire the horses and wagons will not deliver the mails. The mails are to be delivered by the messengers of the House post-office. The man with whom we contract agrees only to furnish seven wagons and seven horses. This is now done by the Postmaster himself, and he to-day is making $4,000 or $5,000 a year out of this business. We propose that this money, which now goes into the pocket of the Postmaster, increasing his perquisites, shall be put into the Treasury of the United States.

The $4,000 which we name is merely the limit of the appropriation. The work may actually be done for $2,000 or $3,000. Whatever part of the $4,000 may not be expended will be covered into the Treasury. I think the work can be done for $2,500. I think men can be found who will agree to furnish for that amount the required number of horses and wagons, especially as the Government has a stable here that they can occupy.

All I ask is that members shall take up this book of expenditures issued annually by the Clerk of the House, and see by going through the items the amount of money which is now thrown away—which goes into the pockets of men elected as officers of this House. Any one making this examination will be convinced that it is time we should put a limit in our appropriation bills upon this kind of expenditure.

Mr. HOSKINS. If I understood the gentleman from Missouri correctly he stated that the Postmaster in former Congresses had been in the habit of making $4,000 or $5,000 a year out of contracts of this kind.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOSKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman in what way the Postmaster could make $4,000 or $5,000, when the horses and wagons were provided by contract and the pay for them was drawn from that fund?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. They have never been furnished by contract.

Mr. HOSKINS. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. They have been furnished in that way in a former Congress to my certain knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out the last word. If I understand the object of the gentleman from Kentucky, it is to continue after the 1st of July the contract now said to be existing between the Postmaster of this House and some gentleman for carrying our mails. After the 1st of July, that contract having expired, we ought to have the benefit of the lowest bid. I therefore hope the amendment will be voted down.

I see that the time has nearly arrived when we are to take a recess, and I therefore move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 258) to amend the charter of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company;

A bill (S. No. 598) to authorize Spencer F. Baird, assistant secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, to receive from the King of Sweden a diploma and decoration, constituting him a member of the royal Norwegian order of St. Olaf, the same being a literary and scientific order; and

A bill (S. No. 608) to enable Harvey Lull, of Hoboken, New Jersey, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of letters-patent for a self-locking shutter-hinge.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1488) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railroad Company;

A bill (H. R. No. 1580) granting pension to Almon P. Graves; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2305) granting a pension to Melville H. Hudson.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. PACKER for one week; to Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, for two weeks on account of a death in his family; to Mr. LEAVENWORTH for ten days; to Mr. FAULKNER for two days; and to Mr. HEWITT, of New York, for one week.

The SPEAKER. The hour has arrived for taking a recess. On the House re-assembling this evening the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will take the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

And then, pursuant to a previous order of the House, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House re-assembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. SPRINGER, as Speaker pro tempore.

BUILDING LAW FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be directed to inquire whether the building laws and regulations for the District of Columbia have been violated; whether any part of the avenues or streets of Washington have been appropriated to private use, and if so, by whom, and to what extent; and whether in the erection of dwellings or other houses in blocks or separately the laws and regulations to protect life and property have been observed; with power to send for persons and papers, employ an expert, and report at any time.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Is that resolution in order?

Mr. COX. It cannot be done even by unanimous consent, according to the ruling of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution will be received.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It cannot be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the resolution be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the resolution, but I do not think it can be received, even by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the ruling made at a former sitting, the Chair was inclined to accept it, no objection being made.

Mr. COX. There is no objection; but as this evening session has been set apart for a special purpose under a suspension of the rules, I doubt very much whether we can receive anything by unanimous consent that does not relate to the purpose for which the session has been fixed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the circumstances, the Chair must rule that the resolution cannot be received.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to strike out from line 221 to line 226, and in lieu thereof to insert what the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For hire of seven horses and seven wagons for carrying the mails, books, and other documents between the city post-office and the House post-office, folding-room, and document-room, and the Departments and residences of members, the sum of $4,000; and at least three of said horses and wagons shall be in use during the whole year.

Mr. HOSKINS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. HOSKINS. I move to strike out the two last words in order to give me an opportunity to say a single word in reference to this matter of horses and wagons for the use of the House post-office. I take it for granted that my distinguished friend from Missouri would not intentionally misstate or misrepresent this matter, although it should be in relation to a person who did not agree with him in politics. I regard him as one of the fairest members of the House. I was struck, however, with the remark he made before the recess, in which he stated this bill proposed to save three or four thousand dollars which had fallen in some way into the hands of the Postmaster of the House of Representatives previous to this session of Congress. Now in the last session of Congress when Mr. Sherwood was Postmaster of the House, I had occasion to examine this question of horses and wagons used in the transportation of the mails from the post-office of this House to the residences of members. I ascertained these horses and wagons were provided under a contract made many years ago, running back as far I think as 1842. The Postmaster of the House was then authorized to contract for carrying the mails from the city post-office to the post-office of the House and from the post office of the House to the residences of members. A contract was made by the last Postmaster of the House with one Jacob Murtz, who was to furnish a certain number of horses and wagons and harness at $2.50 per day for each horse and wagon. The Committee of Accounts, whose duty it was to see that no money was paid out contrary to law, determined the number of horses necessary to carry on this business for the convenience of the members of the House. They determined the contractor should be paid for five horses and five wagons at the rate of $2.50 per day. The contractor himself had to provide for the horses, pay for their keep and all other expenses, the wear and tear of the wagon and the wear and tear of the harness. And whenever the monthly accounts were presented to the Committee of Accounts they allowed this contractor at the rate of $2.50 per day for each horse and wagon furnished. That is the only compensation the contractor for this service received from the last Congress.

How it was possible that, under that contract, the Postmaster of this House could get $2,000 or $3,000 into his own pocket, I cannot conceive. Every one knows, who lives in a city like this, that $2.50 per day for the use of a horse and wagon and harness and for keeping the horse is not an extravagant price. And I may say while I am up that this contractor furnished not only the five horses that were paid for by the Government, but absolutely furnished six horses; for he said to me frequently that the five horses were compelled to work too hard, and he preferred to keep a sixth, although he got no compensation for it.

I do not believe the last Postmaster of this House ever received one dollar, directly or indirectly, by the contract made with this man for carrying the mails. If the contract price is too large, that is a question for the House to consider; but my judgment is that the contract price of $2.50 is not too large.

But I rose for the purpose of saying that I do not believe, on such an examination of this matter as I have been able to make—and it came particularly under my personal attention from my being on the Committee of Accounts—that the Postmaster of the House in the Forty-third Congress received one single dollar from this contract; and how this bill is to take four or five thousand dollars or two or three thousand dollars out of his pocket or prevent that sum going into the pocket of the Postmaster I do not understand.

Mr. DURHAM. During the recess of the House this evening, the present Postmaster of the House stated to me that so far as he was concerned—and I make the statement for his benefit—he denies most distinctly the assertion that he makes one single dollar out of this contract. He says that whatever is allowed for the purpose of carrying the mails is turned over to the gentleman who has the contract for carrying the mails. So far as past Postmasters and their operations are concerned in this matter, I know nothing about them; and I know nothing of the operations of the present Postmaster except what he stated to me during the recess.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a grave matter. The effect of it is to allow $4,000 for this service beyond the time allowed in the contract now existing, while the proposition of the committee, as prepared by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WELLS,] gives an opportunity to have the contract given to the lowest bidder; and, as a matter of experience, the gentleman from Missouri believes the work can be done for $2,500. I am in favor of the effort to have the work done for $2,500, instead of $4,000.

Mr. DURHAM. I simply desire to say to the chairman of the committee that I took his own estimate of the amount necessary for this work when I put it at $4,000.

Mr. RANDALL. We have put the amount in the bill at the outside figure, but we provide that the contract shall be let to the lowest bidder; and, as stated by the gentleman from Missouri, we are inclined to believe that the work can be done for $2,500. Of course, the difference will go into the Treasury.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I move to strike out the last word.

I was glad to hear my friend from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] make so satisfactory an explanation to the House. I was credibly informed that the contractor for these horses and wagons was a mere sham, a partner of the Postmaster himself, and I had reason to believe that to be the case. The Clerk of the House and other officers of the House, as the Doorkeeper and the Sergeant-at-Arms, have been in the habit of being allowed $900 for a horse and wagon, while we are in possession of information to show that the keeping of these horses should not exceed $200 each per annum.

It must be borne in mind that the Government furnishes the stable, furnishes the man to take care of the horses, furnishes the driver to drive them, and that there have to be provided simply the bare feed of the horses and the cost of shoeing them and the repairs of the wagons. It appears, therefore, that $700 was clear profit.

Mr. DURHAM. I understand Mr. Latham, who carries the mails now, to say that he furnishes the man to take care of the horses, and that that expense is not provided out of the public money.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. That has not been the custom heretofore. It has not been so understood by the committee.

Mr. HOSKINS. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to make one remark? I think the gentleman from Missouri is entirely mistaken in saying that a person has not been paid by the contractor himself to take care of these horses. No one has been employed by the Government to do so. The contractor himself takes care of his own horses.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. They are kept at the Government stables, are they not?

Mr. HOSKINS. The Government owns some sheds, and they are kept there by the contractor, who does all the service at the stables.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Well, I am differently informed.

Mr. HOSKINS. I know that to be true.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I am informed by the Clerk, who makes up the account, that these horses have been paid for by the Government; not only the Clerk's horses, the Sergeant-at-Arms's horses, the Doorkeeper's horses, but also the horses employed by the Postmaster of the House.

Now, what are we providing for in this bill? For carrying the mails for three months during the next session and for two wagons and two horses for the purpose of carrying documents from the Departments to the folding-room and from the folding-room to the post-office backward and forward. For the balance of the year after the three months the horses will be at pasture and doing no service to the Government, and still we are to pay $2.50 a day for them. The bill proposes to make a contract for this purpose, and provides $4,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, to pay the expenses.

Mr. DUNNELL. I understand that there is a subsisting contract between the Postmaster of the House and other parties, a contract which runs beyond the 1st day of July next, and it would be embarrassing to interfere with the existing contract which the Postmaster of this House had a right to enter into.

Mr. RANDALL. I am informed that the contract does not run over the present fiscal year; but if it did, the Postmaster had no right to bind the House beyond the appropriations made for the year.

Mr. DURHAM. Allow me just one moment to answer an inquiry made here. I learn from Mr. Latham himself that he is entitled to this contract until the expiration of the Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the Postmaster had no authority to enter into that contract whatever, and the sooner we break it up the better; there is no law for it.

Mr. HOSKINS. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying just one word. As I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he says that there is no law for this contract.

Mr. RANDALL. I say that there is no money appropriated to pay the contractor beyond the 1st of July next.

Mr. HOSKINS. I will explain what I understand is the fact. I understand that a resolution was passed by this House many years ago and that the several Postmasters from that time to this have had authority under that resolution to contract for this service for the Congress, and that resolution is in force to-day.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a law which prevents any one under this Government from making contracts beyond the appropriations.

Mr. HOSKINS. I am not discussing that point, but the Postmasters of the House in the past have not acted certainly without authority of law, and they have pursued this same course. Of course appropriations have been made year by year for this service and to these payments must have been made out of that fund. The Clerk of the House had no authority to trespass on any other fund, and the amount appropriated for this purpose has never been exhausted and there never has been any deficiency. Each Congress has made a direct appropriation to pay this very expense, and out of that fund, and no other, the service has been paid for.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will understand that the effort in this bill is to make everything show item for item that is appropriated, just as you do in your private business.

Mr. HOSKINS. Let me say in answer to the gentleman that I have not risen to oppose this bill. I agree with the Committee on Appropriations in its effort to reduce expenses where they can be reduced at any time. My remarks were in answer to those made by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WELLS,] and not in opposition to the bill: my only object is to disembarrass the House and the Postmaster and to place this matter on the proper grounds.

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite willing for the gentleman to do that.

The question was taken on Mr. DURHAM's amendment; and, on a division there were ayes 9, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following amendment:

In line 232, strike out the words "not more than;" so that it will read, "the use of seven horses and wagons during the session of Congress," &c.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For miscellaneous items, $20,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend that clause by striking out "$20,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$15,000."

I would like to have the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations state the items which make up this appropriation. It seems to me that almost everything has been already appropriated for.

Mr. RANDALL. Last year the appropriation for this item was $28,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. Very well; that makes no difference. I would like to know what the items are.

Mr. RANDALL. I refer the gentleman to the executive document which contains the contingent expenses of the House. As I have said, last year the appropriation for this purpose was $28,000. We deemed that too much, and have reduced the amount to $20,000, which is a reduction of $8,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. Well, the chairman of the committee can give the information better than I can find it out for myself.

Mr. RANDALL. It would take me half an hour to read it; and if the gentleman will send for the document he will find all the items there down to a tooth-brush, a package of soap, or a paper of pins, and he can examine in his idle moments each article that it is proposed to appropriate for.

Mr. DUNNELL. Then I understand that the report of the proper officer shows where that money went?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; the whole of it. It shows everything, and is made in obedience to law. Does the gentleman think we can do this on $15,000? If so, we will try it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For newspapers and stationery for members of the House of Representatives, officers of the House, and committees of the House, including $6,000 for stationery for the use of the committees and officers of the House, $43,370.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to ask my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, for some explanation of the second word in this paragraph, "newspapers." I did not know that we were furnished with newspapers; if there are none furnished to us, then there is no occasion for an appropriation for that purpose, and this would be a deception.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not a deception at all.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I did not say it was a deception on the part of the Committee on Appropriations, but it is a deception upon members who expect to get newspapers and do not get them.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The law allows each member of this House $125 for newspapers and stationery. Multiply that sum by 301 and the amount will be $37,750. The other $6,000 appropriated by this paragraph is for stationery furnished to committees and officers of this House, making in all $43,750.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move to amend by striking out the words "newspapers and;" so that it will read, "for stationery for members," &c. There are no newspapers furnished members; I never heard of any.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Each member is allowed $125, and he can take it out in newspapers, stationery, pocket-books, knives, or anything else, just as he pleases, or in money. By looking over the statement which is furnished us it will be found that some members draw a great deal of stationery, others draw very little and are paid the balance in money. At the end of the session there is found due members, beyond the amount of stationery they have taken, various sums, $110, $90, $60, and so on down. The difference between those sums and the $125 allowed to each member is the amount of stationery and newspapers they have taken. We keep a clerk on purpose to send for newspapers, and if members do not send for them he will have very little to do. You will find in the list of clerks a newspaper clerk.

Mr. RANDALL. At the end of each session, as the old members will recollect, a statement is furnished them in which the stationery and newspapers they have taken are charged against this $125. If they do not take all the amount in stationery and newspapers, then they obtain the balance in money.

Mr. FORT. Buy postage-stamps with it.

Mr. RANDALL. No, it is given them in money. They can buy postage-stamps with it or anything else.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I propose to withdraw the amendment after saying a single word further. I desired an explanation of this paragraph. Although I have been here for three years I did not before know that we could get newspapers by subscribing for them at the stationery-room. Of course I read the newspapers, as we all do, but I bought them outside.

Mr. RANDALL. Do you not at the end of the session have a clerk come to you with an account showing what stationery you have got, and how much is left of the $125; and if anything is left do you not get the money?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do; but I did not know that we had the convenience of obtaining newspapers from the stationery office. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I move to strike out all of this paragraph except the words "for stationery for the use of the committees and officers of the House, $6,000." I do that for this reason: As I understand this paragraph, it is simply adding $125 a year to our salaries, which by another paragraph in this bill we have cut down $500 a year. It seems to me that is a fraud and deception practiced upon the country. If we are going to take $4,625, let us take it; if we are going to take but $4,500 salary, let us not add $125 for newspapers, stationery, and other traps. Let us be candid and honest before the country, and if $4,500 a year is not enough let us take what will be enough.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope this will not be stricken out. This is no new thing at all; it has existed since 1866 at the present amount and away back of that to some amount, I do not recollect how much, but I think largely more than this. This limit of $125 in 1866 was really a reduction.

Mr. HALE. This amount was really fixed as a matter of economy, was it not, to prevent a much larger amount being drawn by members, as stationery and newspapers?

Mr. RANDALL. It was formerly without limit.

Mr. HALE. And greatly exceded this amount.

Mr. RANDALL. It did.

Mr. HALE. And this was in the line of economy, was it not?

Mr. RANDALL. It was.

Mr. WHITE. Whatever members draw for this purpose, whether $125 or $225, cannot that be deducted from their salaries?

A MEMBER. No!

Mr. RANDALL. This is in conformity with law. Those who do not want it need not take it.

The amendment of Mr. WHITE was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC PRINTING.

For compensation of the Congressional Printer, $3,500; and three clerks of class 4, one clerk of class 2, one clerk of class 1, and one messenger at $720, in his office; in all, $11,520.

For contingent expenses of his office, namely: For stationery, postage, advertising, horse and wagon, and miscellaneous items, $2,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out both these paragraphs. The Public Printing Office is now undergoing an investigation which is likely to lead to great improvements in the administration of the office. We are advised by the Committee on Printing that they desire for the present that these appropriations shall be stricken out and that whatever appropriations may be necessary for running the Government Printing Office during the next fiscal year shall be inserted in the sundry civil bill, which seems to be a more appropriate place at any rate.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] a question in reference to the provision for twenty-eight pages of the House in the paragraph last under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to go back.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I was searching for information when the clause was passed. I find that there is a distinction made between the pages in the House and those in the Senate. I want to know whether that is intended.

Mr. RANDALL. This is for pages of the House.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I find by referring to the provision with reference to pages in the Senate that it is provided that they shall be paid while actually employed, while as to the House pages there is no such provision. Are we to understand that it is intended to make a discrimination between the pages of the House and those of the Senate?

Mr. RANDALL. The pages of the House and the pages of the Senate are each to receive $2.50 per day.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. But in the Senate provision I find the words "while actually employed."

Mr. RANDALL. We only pay the pages of the House during the session.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Why make a discrimination?

Mr. HALE. It is an additional clause put in for security, which by oversight dropped out in the House provision.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Then why not put it in?

The CHAIRMAN. This debate is not in order. The paragraph referred to has been passed.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to inserting the words "while actually employed."

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I would either propose to strike them out in the Senate provision or put them in here.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, put them in here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to strike out lines 254 to 265.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to insert an amendment in reference to the pages, so as to put them on the same footing with those of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. It is impossible to go back except by unanimous consent. The pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania must first be disposed of.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I am now willing and desirous that the words suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi should be inserted in the paragraph next to the last.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the amendment?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I propose that the pages of the Senate and of the House shall be put on the same footing.

Mr. RANDALL. To insert the words "while actually employed" in the paragraph embraced in lines 251 to 253.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I was opposed to the insertion of the words in the Senate provision because I think these pages should be paid for the whole time; but since it has been inserted there I think it should be inserted with reference to the House pages.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to inserting "while actually employed" in reference to the pages?

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to amend by striking out $500 after the words "for hire of horses" in line 252. I make this motion in order to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] to explain how it costs $500 for the hire of a horse during the session of Congress, when according to my information a horse can be purchased and fed during the session for less than $500.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that it is impossible to go back.

Mr. RANDALL. We consent to going back in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent it can be done.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Heretofore the Doorkeeper of the House has kept one horse during the year at $912.50; the Sergeant-at-Arms has also had a horse at the same expense; and the Clerk has had three horses, costing $2,737.50. The committee in the bill have provided for giving each one of these officers a horse at an expense not exceeding $500 a year. The Doorkeeper of the House probably requires a horse, for the riding pages and for his own use, more than either of the other officers. We allow the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Doorkeeper each $500 for a horse; and there is no reason why we should not make the same allowance to the Doorkeeper. We propose a reduction of $412.50 on each horse.

Mr. HUNTON. But my friend does not understand ——

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I understand that the Doorkeeper requires two horses most of the time.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman does not understand my point. This provision is for the hire of one horse——

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. That is for the Doorkeeper; the Doorkeeper is allowed $500 for the hire of a horse.

Mr. HUNTON. But my point is that you cannot make the hire of a horse cost $500 for a session.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The Doorkeeper claims that he needs a horse frequently during the recess as well as during the sessions.

Mr. HUNTON. It seems to me that this $500 is simply an addition to the salary.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. He has to have a horse. The riding pages are continually going.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to strike out $500 and insert $300.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being ayes 24, noes not counted.

Mr. WHITE. I move that instead of saying for "twenty-eight pages" it shall read "for twenty-eight fatherless pages" or "orphan pages." [Laughter.] And I do it for this reason: there are pages on this floor who are neither fatherless nor motherless, and there are other pages who have no father.

A MEMBER. And there are pages who have several fathers. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. Now I have observed those pages whose mothers are dependent upon them for a living, and who give their mothers a living from their salaries. As pages, they are much more efficient than those who are the sons of subordinates who lie around this establishment.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I move further to amend "that this establishment shall be known as an orphan asylum." [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be compelled to rule that amendment as frivolous and therefore out of order.

Mr. WHITE's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I move to amend in line 252 by making it read "horses" instead of "horse;" so that if more than one horse is needed they can provide for more than one out of this $500.

Mr. HALE. That has all been stricken out.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I think not.

Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

For compensation of the Librarian, $3,600; and for thirteen assistant librarians, three at $2,250 each, two at $1,600 each, two at $1,450 each, two at $1,300 each, two at $1,200 each, one at $1,000, and one at $960 per annum; in all, $23,410.

Mr. WADDELL. I move to strike out, in line 266, "two" and insert "three," in line 267 to strike out "two" and insert "three," and in line 268 to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to give three assistant librarians in each case, instead of two, at the salaries indicated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the best and briefest statement I can make for offering this amendment is that which was made by the Librarian of Congress before the committee, March 4, 1876, and which is embodied in the report of the Committee on Appropriations accompanying the present bill.

The Library of Congress has been allowed sixteen assistants, besides the Librarian, by existing laws; and this bill, if I understand it correctly, cuts it down to thirteen and reduces the salaries on a scale of 10 per cent. I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether I am not correct in that statement.

Mr. RANDALL After the gentleman gets through I will answer him.

Mr. WADDELL. It reduces the force from sixteen to thirteen, while at the same time it reduces the salaries 10 per cent.

The Library of Congress contains now about three hundred thousand volumes, and as I have stated a moment ago it has been allowed sixteen assistants besides the Librarian by existing laws, and this bill cuts it down to thirteen, while at the same time it reduces salaries at the rate of 10 per cent.

The Boston Public Library, with 225,000 volumes, employs seventy assistants for its very large catalogue and circulation business. The British Museum Library, with nine hundred thousand volumes, and no circulation, employs eighty-six officers; the Patent-Office about three hundred and fifty.

Among the labors which have to be performed in the Library of Congress are the recording and issuing certificates of copyright to the number of fourteen thousand five hundred a year, (average,) with the receipt and filing away of, first, fourteen to fifteen thousand title-pages; second, twenty-eight to thirty thousand (two copies of each publication) of books, periodicals, musical compositions, engravings, maps, photographs, &c., all of which have to be filed and preserved.

The copyright department involves as many letters to be written for the patent business, the number of patents and of copyrights being about equal. It is now conducted on the principle of answering every letter on the day of its receipt, and registering all copyrights, legally applied for, the same day. This promptitude cannot be kept up, but this important business, placed by law in exclusive charge of the Librarian of Congress, will fall into arrear, as it will be impossible to keep it up during the sitting of Congress with a smaller force.

The Librarian further states that the business involves the adding to the Library of about fifteen thousand volumes every year, all of which must be carefully and correctly catalogued, collated, (to see if the copies are perfect,) stamped, labeled, and distributed to their proper places in the Library.

The purchases abroad and at home involve a large correspondence, orders from all prominent auction sales, and constant search of literary periodicals and catalogues to avoid duplication, and at the same time to select the best books to enrich the Library.

The accounts connected with all this business as well as the accounts of the Botanic Garden and greenhouses have all to be kept in the Library, besides the accounts of the Librarian as register of copyrights and disbursing officer for salaries.

The catalogue system of the Library (and a great library is useless, as the Librarian tells us, without a catalogue) must be kept constantly up to date, the books being entered on receipt. This absolutely requires men not only of thorough education and knowledge of both ancient and modern languages, but of thorough practical training in the work. There were last year written in the Library over twenty-five thousand titles in careful detail; and a catalogue of new books, arranged both by names of authors and subjects, is now nearly printed, while the material for a new and complete catalogue of the Library, up to 1876, is all prepared for the printer.

The foreign exchanges of the Library demand the whole time of one assistant, as fifty copies of everything printed by Congress or by Government Bureaus are exchanged for foreign publications of great extent and value.

Another important thing is this: An index to the documents, debates, and laws of Congress, complete in a single alphabet, was undertaken by the Librarian, and two assistants granted by Congress in 1874 to begin the work. About three hundred and fifty volumes are already indexed; but the work must necessarily be stopped if the workers on it are removed.

It may be added that the Library force is necessarily worked the year round eight hours per day, while other officers of Congress are employed during the session only. I hope, therefore, the amendment I have offered will be agreed to; for I think it is necessary to the public service the Librarian of Congress should be allowed sixteen assistants instead of thirteen assistants. I have left the salary as it has been reported by the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. They all state the one thing, that they cannot do the work if reduction in force is made. The cry from this Bureau is the same which comes from all the others. We had this statement made by the Librarian before the committee. The committee originally reduced the number by four, but at the urgent request of the Librarian we gave him an additional assistant, making the reduction only three. After the fullest consideration we deemed that force quite adequate.

In 1860 the salary of the Librarian was $2,160, and it was kept so in 1867 and up to 1870, when it was raised to $4,000. It ran up $1,840 that year. Now in 1867 the force in the Library embraced only seven assistants, four laborers, and one messenger. The amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, in the judgment of the committee, should not be adopted. We have examined, as I have already stated, the subject fully, and the committee are convinced that this is a place where a reduction can be properly made without any injury to anybody. The demand for books from the Library during the session, perhaps, is large; but it is not so during the recess of Congress. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. WADDELL. I wish to say just one word more. Part of this force is required to be not merely practical men, but men acquainted with other languages, ancient and modern. Another fact is that they are bound to stay here the whole year round.

Mr. RANDALL. We are aware of all that. We gave nearly the whole of a morning session to the discussion of this question.

The question being taken on Mr. WADDELL's amendment, there were —ayes 55, noes 87; no quorum voting.

No further count being demanded, the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For pay of superintendent, $1,440; assistants in Botanic Garden and green-houses, and two additional laborers under the direction of the Library Committee of Congress; in all, $6,440; and said superintendent shall have charge of all the public gardens in the District of Columbia that are supported by specific appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations have directed me to offer the following amendment:

In line 291 strike out "$6,440" and insert "$7,440."

On an appeal from the chairman of the Committee on the Library we have agreed that this appropriation shall be increased $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For a foreman and laborers employed in the public grounds, $13,256.

In line 305 strike out "$13,256" and insert in lieu thereof "$20,000."

Mr. Chairman, this appropriation is for the maintenance of the public parks and public gardens of the city belonging to the United States. The whole of this expenditure is for labor, and the work is now fixed by law under the charge of Mr. Smith, the efficient manager of the Botanic Gardens. I feel that in these times of distress it is cruel to cut down this appropriation for labor in this city. We have these parks. They are here. They need to be maintained. The people of this country will not complain if we beautify them and thus give employment to the poor laboring people of this city. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the committee ought to vote in this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for a vote. I will merely say that the amendment recommended by the committee is a reduction on former expenditures and a reduction which we think is perfectly proper. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I neglected to state that the amount recommended for this purpose was twenty-one thousand and some odd hundred dollars; the amount I believe that has been usually appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. The truth of the matter is that there has been a great waste of money in connection with these public grounds, hothouses, greenhouses, botanic gardens, and everything else of that kind; and there is no place where the public are more willing to have the expenditures upon rose-buds cut down than here.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to say that this is not the appropriation for the Botanic Gardens, but the appropriation for the public grounds of the city. As I have said, they are placed under the charge of Mr. Smith, the efficient superintendent of the public gardens, who the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not say is extravagant or wasteful. He is an economical Scotchman.

The amendment was disagreed to—ayes 25, noes not counted.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For furnace-keeper in charge of heating-apparatus under the old Hall of the House of Representatives, $864.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following amendment:

After line 311, as a new paragraph, insert as follows:

For the person in charge of the heating-apparatus of the Library of Congress and other steam heating-apparatus in the central building, $864.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For the following employés at the Executive Mansion, namely: For furnace-keeper, $864; two night-watchmen, at $840 each; two watchmen, at $840 each; and two doorkeepers, at $900 each; in all, $6,024.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 314 and 315 strike out the words "two night watchmen, at $840 each" and insert in lieu thereof "two policemen, at $1,200 each."

Under the present law and appropriations there are two policemen for the Executive Mansion who are paid $2,640, or $1,320 each. Now, this is a thing that is ours, is the people's, is the nation's. It has nothing to do with the establishment of the President. The Mansion is ours. The people go there. It is public property. There should be policemen there to guard it and to be present at times of receptions and on occasions of public state.

I think I may be justified in saying, and perhaps the chairman of the committee will bear me out, that this reduction in the bill is too much. If you reduce these policemen from $1,300 to $1,200 we have them down to the rate that we have fixed in other reductions. We leave them as policemen, and I do not believe that there is anybody here in this House who upon this little matter of a saving of two or three hundred dollars will care to especially strike at this establishlishment, which is our establishment; and I hope, therefore, that nobody will oppose this amendment. I have fixed the salary at $1,200, cutting off $140 from each salary.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I think there is no objection to that.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we agreed in committee that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] was to prepare an amendment on this subject.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I can explain what the committee intended to do but did not do. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] should come in in line 315. In the Book of Estimates you will find a provision for a night watchman and night usher. These two night watchmen provided for here were to cover the night watchman and the night usher. I think we agreed in committee to restore the salaries of these two persons to what they are now, $900 and $1,200, and to substitute the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] for that portion of the paragraph as it now stands.

Mr. RANDALL. How would it then read?

Mr. FOSTER. It would read, if amended as I tried to have the committee agree, "two night watchmen, one at $900 and one at $1,200; two policemen, at $1,200 each; two doorkeepers, at $1,200 each."

Mr. RANDALL. My recollection is that the agreement of $1,200 only applied to the doorkeepers. The reason given was that they are there in the day-time and that they are necessary to receive visitors at the door, and of course have to be tidy in their dress and gentlemanly in their deportment.

Mr. FOSTER. That is so with all these gentlemen.

Mr. HALE. They have to be there longer than the watchmen and doorkeepers do in any other department.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe that is true.

Mr. HALE. They cannot go off duty at four o'clock. They have to remain on until late in the evening, when they are relieved by the night watchmen.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that we fix the salaries of the watchmen at $1,000 and the doorkeepers at $1,200.

Mr. HALE. Why reduce the watchmen below $1,200? We have not touched that class of salaries.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, we have; the Capitol police have been reduced to $1,000.

Mr. HALE. But the Capitol policemen have not exactly the same kind of duties to perform that these men have. They have reliefs and they divide the day up into a period of eight hours each, while these men have to be there all the time ten or twelve hours, for there are but two of them.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

Two watchmen, $1,000 each; two doorkeepers, $1,200 each.

I think that is reasonable and quite high enough, and I hope gentlemen on the other side will accept it.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I shall not object, although I think the salary for the "watchmen" is too low.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to put the "watchmen" above the Capitol police in point of pay.

Mr. FOSTER. Two of these men are practiced messengers.

Mr. RANDALL. Those are the two we give $1,200 a year to.

Mr. HALE. You had better call two of these men policemen, had you not? They are so at present.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not care what they are called.

Mr. HALE. Then call two of them "policemen."

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that my amendment be now read in the form in which I offered it. I move to strike out from line 314 to the end of the clause as follows:

Two night-watchmen, at $840 each; two watchmen, at $840 each: and two doorkeepers, at $900 each.

And to insert in lieu thereof the words "two night watchmen, at $1,000 each; two watchmen, at $1,000 each; and two doorkeepers, at $1,200 each."

Mr. HALE. I now move to amend, so as to make the "two watchmen" "two policemen."

Mr. FOSTER. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that of the two night watchmen at present one receives $900 and the other $1,200.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I want to equalize them.

Mr. HALE'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL'S amendment, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend line 317 by inserting in lieu of $6,024 $7,264, so that it will read "in all $7,264."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For compensation of the President of the United States $33,611.11; and on and after the 4th day of March, 1877, the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum.

Mr. RANDALL. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment to that clause:

After the word "States," in line 331, insert "up to the 4th of March, 1877, at the rate of $50,000 per annum."

And after the word "cents," in line 332, insert the words "and from said day to the 30th day of June, 1877, both days inclusive, at the rate of $25,000 per annum, $835; in all, $41,746.11.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "cents," as follows:

And on and after the 4th day of March, 1877, the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum.

That amendment is to strike out all that part of the clause which refers to the President's salary after the 4th of March next.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment. Those in favor——

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to speak upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not know that I shall speak one minute. I do not propose to discuss at all the question of what should be the President's salary. I am not going to say whether, at what I consider a proper time, I would or would not vote to reduce the salary of the President to $25,000. I will only say that I think it improper to cut it down in an appropriation bill. There is a bill now on the Speaker's table, I understand, that has come over from the Senate, which meets this question squarely and fairly; and I would rather postpone my vote upon the question until that bill comes up.

Mr. RANDALL. That bill might be passed by both Houses of Congress and yet not receive the executive approval. I do not think there are two opinions concerning the judgment of the people of this country upon this question of the salary of the President, that it should go back to the old amount; and by this provision in this bill we secure its going back to the old amount. If the other bill is passed by Congress and signed by the President, well and good.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am willing to test the President upon that very question. I am not at all afraid he will not sign it; certainly if he would sign an appropriation bill containing it, he would sign the bill containing it alone. I propose to put this test to him fairly and squarely.

Mr. EDEN. Did the gentleman think it right to increase the salary of the President by a provision in an appropriation bill?

Mr. O'BRIEN. No, I do not think that was right. I am opposed to covering an appropriation bill all over, as it were, with outside matters. I prefer to meet such matters in a fair, open, and candid manner, as I will this question of the President's salary when it comes properly before the House. I am not going to say now whether I am in favor of a salary of $50,000 or $25,000 for the President. But I do express the opinion that this is not the proper place to decide that question. If the precedent has heretofore been set of raising salaries in an appropriation bill, it is time to do away with such a precedent as bad and not favorable to reform.

Mr. RANDALL. In obedience to the will of the people, that will that filled these seats with democrats, wherever we can reduce expenditures we mean to do it.

Mr. HALE. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] if he believes the seats in this House were filled by democrats on account of his exertions in the last Congress to reduce salaries?

Mr. RANDALL. I believe this, that I am placed where I am by the confidence of my party, and I will in no manner by my action weaken the confidence which has been reposed in me.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the amendment to the amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I will withdraw my amendment to the amendment if the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] will renew it.

Mr. HALE. I will renew it simply for the purpose of saying that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is taking a different course in this Congress in reference to the indorsement of his constituents from what he did in the last Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. I have said all I want to say.

Mr. HALE. So have I.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to oppose the amendment to the amendment for the purpose of entering my protest against the doctrine which has been advanced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] I do not believe that the people of the United States will approve this reckless fashion of accomplishing any result that any particular gentleman happens to wish to accomplish, without any regard to the constitutional principles, the constitutional methods, as the example established in the precedents of legislation.

The Constitution of the United States provides that all laws to be valid shall receive the assent of both Houses of Congress and are to be submitted to the President for his approval; and that they shall not take effect unless the President, the only officer who represents the whole people of the United States as a unit, gives them his assent, except two-thirds of the two branches of Congress shall re-enact them after his disapproval. Now here is a measure having nothing to do with the current expenses of the Government for the next year, or very little to do with them. It is a matter of permanent public policy, not to go into effect until the 4th of March next. It seems to me it is an utterly unconstitutional doctrine, fraught with evil and peril in our legislation, to say that we will not deal with such a measure by a separate bill, but will put it on an appropriation bill, because thereby the Government must stop or the President be constrained against his judgment to give his assent to a bill he does not approve.

Mr. RANDALL. This salary was increased in an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. And this proposition is to do the same sort of bad and evil thing over again. The President of the United States is bound to protect the dignity, the authority, and the interest of the office which he holds under the Constitution against infringement from any quarter whatever; and he is entitled to have his constitutional judgment consulted and recognized in regard to a law which affects, not him, but his successor in the high office which he holds; and this attempt to put a constraint upon the President by saying that we will put into an appropriation bill, and if the President defeats it the Government must stop, a particular piece of legislation which we may conceive to be desirable—such an attempt as that, in my judgment, is utterly repugnant to the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. HALE. I will withdraw the amendment offered originally by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will renew it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to add that almost all the evil and corrupt legislation which we have had has grown up in this way.

Mr. RANDALL. But we have changed the rule so that you cannot get evil and corrupt legislation on appropriation bills, that only economy shall prevail on them.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be admitted that Congress would act very unjustly toward the Executive of the nation by incorporating into a bill which had to pass, or some important branch of the Government be stopped, a provision which otherwise would not receive his sanction. If it were done for that purpose I think such an act upon the part of the legislative branch of the Government would be highly improper, although it is easy to foresee that emergencies might occur again in the history of the Government, as they have occurred in the past, where such on act on the part of the legislative body would be at least excusable.

But, Mr. Chairman, the proposition now before the House reducing the salary of the President of the United States to $25,000 is not of that character. It is not presumed that upon the mere question of what should be the salary of the Executive the President of the United States would interpose his veto. It is not one of those measures about which gentlemen might hesitate. To fix the salaries of officers of this Government is a legislative measure. This is not a case in which the President of the United States might hesitate on the score of high public policy or upon the ground of constitutional objection. There is no trouble here in that respect.

But, sir, I do not agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that these legislative provisions are improper on appropriation bills; and the whole history of this Government is against his proposition. It is a fact that legislative provisions which are germane to legislative appropriations are so kindred in character that practically it is absolutely impossible to carry on this Government under ordinary circumstances for any considerable period of years without this practice prevailing to a greater or less extent. Why, sir, scarcely in any instance from 1853 to 1860, and rarely from 1860 down to the present time, has there been an office created in any of the civil branches of the Government, or a salary increased, except upon an appropriation bill. The most important reforms that you have effected in your Post-Office Department have been through legislative enactments on such bills within a comparatively few years. Some of the most important legislative provisions in your revised code were gathered from appropriation bills, the necessity of them having been indicated by the appropriations required to be made—not the result of the spur of the moment, but of legislative necessity.

The suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which is an echo from another branch of this Capitol, that at this particular time the incorporation of legislative provisions upon appropriation bills germane to them, in the interest of retrenchment and purity of Government, ought to be resisted, comes to us, it seems to me, with a very poor grace when through all these years office after office has been created upon appropriation bills. Not an appropriation bill has passed this House within ten years without creating some new office. Salary after salary has been increased up to the very last hour of the last session of Congress through every successive appropriation bill. Your entire diplomatic system was changed by an appropriation bill in the last Congress. The salary of every important functionary in the Treasury Department was increased during last session of Congress on an appropriation bill. The whole re-arrangement of the Treasury system was upon an appropriation bill; and I heard no objection from the gentleman from Massachusetts; I heard no echo from the other branch of the Government.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman must be mistaken——

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir. Now when this same power is to be exercised properly and in the interest of the people, in the interest of pure, honest government, now it is discovered that it is perilous to good government that legislative provisions should be ingrafted upon appropriation bills.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is mistaken about the re-organization of the Treasury Department. That was in a separate bill, reported from the Committee on Civil-Service Reform.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly it was reported by a committee, and was incorporated upon an appropriation bill in the House. The same thing occurred in regard to the whole diplomatic system. You cannot mention a single important branch of the Government that has not been remodeled within the last twelve years through appropriation bills; and I never heard any protest from the other side until now.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, ever since I have been in the House, and when my own party was in power, I have denounced this villainous practice. It is the judgment of all intelligent observers, more unanimous than in regard to almost any other public question, that this habit of putting legislation upon the appropriation bills, which must go through or the Government stops and therefore obliging men to vote for a particular measure whether they like it or not, is fraught with evil in a thousand ways. In the first place, it overthrows the constitutional right of this House, in substance, to have the yeas and nays called on every particular measure. You put on in Committee of the Whole a piece of vicious legislation; and it is in the power of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations alone to say whether there shall be any record made of the opinion of the members of this House upon that piece of evil legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend knows certainly that when it comes into the House——

Mr. HOAR. No; you can have but one vote on the whole bill; and thus at the end of the session members vote under constraint, the alternative being that they must have an extra session or the Government must stop if the bill should not pass with all the evil which it contains. You cannot have a vote on particular questions by yeas and nays. Mr. Chairman, this one thing has tended more than any other to overthrow and degrade the position of this House in relation to the other branch of the Government.

The constitutional equivalent for the equality of States in our Constitution was the right to originate appropriation bills. The Constitution said there might be amendments proposed to those appropriation bills as in other cases, but it was the intent of the framers to limit those amendments made in the Senate to amendments to the substance of the bill in regard to the particular matter it dealt with, that is, to enlarge or diminish the sum of money granted. Now the Senate has usurped the power of ingrafting on our appropriation bills any matter of independent legislation they choose, whether germane or not.

What is the result? An appropriation bill comes back to us and we non-concur in one hundred Senate amendments in the lump and the matter then goes to a conference committee, at midnight, at the close of a session. The result is that the legislation of this Government is not by President, Senate, and House of Representatives, but it is by Senate and three or four members of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, the rest of us being practically excluded from our constitutional functions in the Government.

When my colleague, Mr. DAWES, was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I charged him in this very matter with being untrue to the constitutional privileges and dignity of the body of which he was leader, because the result of this was to put all the powers of legislation into the hands of three or four members of the Appropriation Committee. And my friend from Pennsylvania has acquired early the old Appropriation Committee slang when he stands up and declares he is willing to have independent legislation put on an appropriation bill and force the Senate to pass it, because he knows by adopting this practice they take away from the majority of the House and put into their own hands practically the power of legislation. And, sir, new-comers, whether they believe what I say now, will every one agree with me when we adjourn in midsummer at the end of the session.

It is no new doctrine, Mr. Chairman, and we shall never have any practical part in the constitutional legislation under this Government until we put an end to and burn out as with red-hot iron this vicious and pernicious practice.

I did not rise to say anything about this particular measure of the President's salary. I am not discussing that or dealing with it. It is a wholly independent question. I rose to express my protest against the doctrine, the unconstitutional and most pernicious doctrine, avowed in this House by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew it. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a very simple question. There are two sides to it, it is true, one being the republican side, if you will, and the other the democratic side.

Several MEMBERS on the republican side of the House. "O, no!"

Mr. RANDALL. With honorable exceptions.

Fourteen years of experience has shown me that side of the House have adopted this means of legislation uniformly to increase the expenditures of this Government. Now, when we come here, (and I avow it boldly,) we found there was no other way to prevent these extravagant expenditures or to do away with that vicious practice than by changing the rules. We did change the rule, and we stopped the practice, which for fourteen years had been indulged in by the republican party, of incorporating into appropriation bills extravagant expenditures which ought not to have been embraced in general appropriation bills, or indeed anywhere else.

I wish to say a word to the country on this matter. I have no concealments to make; I do not go behind the door in any respect. It was absolutely necessary, in order to relieve the people from the onerous burden of taxation, that the expenditures of this Government should be reduced $30,000,000 or $40,000,000. I mean to stand here erect in advocacy of any rule or any number of rules necessary to reach that end, in spite of what may be done by an extravagant co-ordinate body, and in spite of the taunts of gentlemen on the other side of this House.

We have come here to put an end to extravagance of appropriation, to retrench and reform, to secure if possible honest administration. When you find we are not properly performing that duty, when in the least we produce friction in the running of this Government, call our attention to it, and for one if I can agree with you I will do so. I know as well as I know I have life that the expenditures of this Government, if you will only co-operate with us, can at this very session of Congress be reduced from $30,000,000 to $35,000,000. I believe that is one of the sure roads to specie resumption. We must have economy, and the people all over the land harmonize with this democratic sentiment. It finds utterance on the part of the majority of this House. You find it in every municipality, in every city, in every State. The people are rising up and demanding economy of administration of their respective governments and consequent reduction of taxation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is our sole purpose here. We have no desire to interfere in the least degree with the Government. Your Secretary of the Treasury has told you that unless frugality is enforced in the administration of the Government it will soon be bankrupt. The honorable gentleman from Ohio, late chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has told this House he believes that a democratic House can cut down the expenditures, when they could not do so on that side with the same facility. I mean to be encouraged by his words, and this side mean if possible to secure a reduction of expenditure to the extent at least of $30,000,000 during this session of Congress. The object is a worthy one and must commend itself to the approval of the country in whose behalf the effort is made.

Mr. HALE. I rise to oppose the amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Chairman, need not arrogate to himself or to his party the position of being exclusively reformers and retrenchers in cutting off the expenditures of the Government. He is an old member here, and he knows that for four years the Committee on Appropriations under the late republican management and with a majority of republican members cut down the expenditures of the Government to a figure that, when the books are made up and the records compared, not of speeches and of promises, but of actual attainments, will compare well with all that he claims can be done.

Neither need the gentleman claim that the practice of putting legislation upon all sorts of subjects on appropriation bills is a republican practice; it is one that comes down from democratic times. It is a practice that in democratic days struck at the liberties of the people. If the gentleman goes far enough back, he will find that legislation, not simply upon dollars and cents, but upon matters that treat of higher and deeper things than those, were put by democratic Houses on legislative appropriation bills, and by the whip and spur of an intolerant party in its waning and decadent and disgraceful days were put there only to be sent back by an indignant country in a voice of protest and denunciation.

The gentleman will find that in the last days of the last of the democratic administrations that he has ever seen or will see, some of the most pernicious legislation was crowded, and whipped, and driven through both Houses of Congress upon appropriation bills. And I for one will not sit here and hear it claimed that this, which in itself is outside of party and beyond party, this, which has been so well characterized by the gentleman from Massachusetts as a pernicious and evil-fraught system of legislation, belongs to the party of which I am a humble member. And more, sir, I say—and I agree there with the gentleman from Massachusetts—that the day will come, and it will not be far distant, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania and other gentlemen who have sought to throw the legislation of Congress into the appropriation bills, will regret it. The day will come when not even he, striving for economy, can control what will be done under this practice. I predict that if the gentleman and his wiser colleagues, as wise as he, have controlled certain elemental forces in his party into a line of prudence in view of the coming election, in the next session of Congress he will witness a carnival of legislation in the interests of extravagance and in the trampling down of economy, before which he will be as powerless as a child before the storm, and he will call on the rocks and the mountains to hide him, if he is as honest in the interests of economy as he claims to be, and as I believe he is.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew it for a moment. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has repeated a remark which was made in a somewhat magnified form by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in regard to the work of retrenchment that has been going on for the last four years. I want the gentleman from Maine to bear one fact in mind. I hope he will not forget the fact that the highest point of expenditures that has been reached since the year 1866, I mean of the ordinary expenditures of the Government, was $194,000,000, and that the appropriations for the present current year are $179,000,000. The gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Ohio, when they talk about vast reductions of the expenditures of the Government, will bear in mind the fact that the highest point of expenditures reached was $194,000,000, and that you appropriated for this present fiscal year $179,000,000, which is many millions more than you appropriated in the years 1867, 1868, and 1869.

Now one word, Mr. Chairman, on another point. What does the gentleman from Maine mean by pernicious legislation? I trust he will be a little more careful in the use of his terms. What does he mean by talking about pernicious legislation and about whipping measures through?

Mr. HOAR. He had reference to the salary bill of the Forty-second Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. Who found it necessary in the progress of the legislation of the House of Representatives to call for the reading of bills in full at the Clerk's desk, or to reserve points of order? There are now on the floor of the House comparatively young men who saw that system inaugurated and who saw the necessity arise for it; for after a bill had gone to the Committee of the Whole it was beyond the reach of your points of order unless they were reserved. That has been inaugurated within the last fifteen years.

Mr. KELLEY. I believe it was E. B. Washburne, of Illinois, who originated that system.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was within the last fifteen years that points of order were first reserved on an appropriation bill. And why? Because it was so uncommon for a bill to come into the House, prior to fifteen years ago, loaded down with measures not germane to the subjects of appropriation that no member deemed it necessary either to call for the reading of bills in order to point out objections or to reserve points of order. The first point of order made on an appropriation bill in Congress was in 1863. I will not dispute with the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to who made the point of order. The gentleman named by him made it over and over again, but he was not the first on the floor of this House to do so.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman's words do not fall to the ground; they are heard with great respect by the House and the country; and will he now allow me to ask him before he sits down to state whether he thinks the practice of putting these things on an appropriation bill is a good one?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not hesitate on that subject; it is one of the questions on which I entertain no doubt whatever, and no doubt has been entertained all along in our history by men infinitely wiser and more competent to express a judgment on that subject than I can pretend to be. If the measure be germane, if it tends to reform an abuse in the Government, if it tends to reduce the expenditures of the Government, it is highly proper in an appropriation bill. But, sir, I did not hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] or the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] although he says he has been protesting against this legislation, denounce that vast body of amendments that went upon an appropriation bill the Congress before the last by which the expenditures of the Government were increased millions. I did not hear the protest. I would like to look through the Congressional Globe and find one very mild protest from the gentleman from Maine or any other gentleman on that side of the House against that monstrous, that pernicious system of legislation.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman will find fifty such protests from me.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to find one very mild protest.

Mr. HALE. I have always opposed that kind of legislation both in the House and in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then it has been communicated to gentlemen around you no doubt, but it has not fallen upon the ears of gentlemen who sit so far from him as we do on this side of the House.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman has not done me the honor to listen to me.

Mr. HOLMAN. Sir, the rule of the House which requires that a measure offered as an amendment to an appropriation bill shall be germane to the bill and that it shall retrench expenditures is a saving and wise measure in legislation, and so long as it shall be adhered to—and it will be adhered to and it must be adhered to—there is no danger of the pernicious legislation which used to take place under the old order of things.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] speaks about the younger members who have come into the House seeing the pernicious effect—of what? Why, not of legislative provisions going upon appropriation bills, but of bills being withheld until the last hours of the session and then going into a committee of conference composed of six members, thus dwarfing the legislation of the country. Why, that is the evil resulting from an appropriation bill, whether its provisions be strictly appropriations or not. It does not merely relate to legislative questions, and gentlemen cannot say that even during the last ten years the evil has been that measures of legislation have crept into appropriation bills through these conferences and that that has been the evil, for it has not been. The evil has been that under this system appropriations such as were allowed by the rules of the House and by the rules of the Senate have crept into the reports of the conference committees at the last moment and have perniciously increased the expenditures of the Government; but the gentleman fails to show to this House any bad consequence from ingrafting proper legislative provisions on such bills.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that we might work together in the interest of a fair, reasonable economy without an ever-recurring attack from the majority of this House upon the immediate past of our legislation; but it appears that every man must come into this House armed and equipped for the defense of even the nearest historical facts of his own career.

I am amazed to witness the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations, rising from his seat and saying that the appropriations for the last year were $179,000,000, and that that was only about $20,000,000 less that the highest amount which has been appropriated since the war. I do not know where the gentleman keeps his eyes, nor where he directs them when he reads. The official facts certified through the Departments to the Treasury stand out in bold relief. Here is a statement of the appropriations for all purposes for the last three fiscal years. What were they? These were not permanent appropriations, but the annual appropriations that Congress votes, and they were as follows: For the year ending June 30, 1874, $172,000,000 in round number; for the year ending June 30, 1875, $155,000,000; for the year ending the last of next June, (the appropriation made last session,) $147,000,000. There are the figures, which this House consented to and passed. The appropriations in three years were reduced from $172,000,000 to $147,000,000 for the current year, a matter of over $30,000,000 reduction in the annual bills granted by Congress.

Now what can the gentleman from Indiana mean by flinging back over the career of his history and ours together a statement of this sort to go out to men who do not know the facts? If you want us to join you in helping you in all worthy things, treat us fairly, be true to the truth, and let the history of the case speak for itself. Dispraise us wherever we have deserved it; lay faults at our doors wherever we have committed them, but in the name of fair dealing and common honesty state the truth about what we have done. Sir, no man can have been on this floor during the last four years and not know that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, aided by almost every member of that committee without regard to party, arrested to the extent of the power of the committee the vicious practice of legislating generally on appropriation bills; but that committee were frequently overruled, and overruled to the detriment of good order in a way that I will always help the present committee from being overruled, to the extent of my voice and vote. I remember very well that we were overruled in the matter of the salaries of members of Congress known as the "salary-grab."

Another committee, organized not to regard appropriations but to regard salaries, forced upon us, over the heads of the Committee on Appropriations, a bill to increase not the salary of the President alone, but the salaries of all the members of Congress, our salaries being increased to $7,500 a year. And after fighting to the extent of our power as a committee, overwhelmed in nineteen different votes taken upon the question, fighting it inch by inch, as a captain would fight his ship in a naval battle, overpowered, boarded by those who took the other view, we were overborne in nineteen different votes and in conference committees, until at last the nefarious measure was passed, and the majority of the votes in its favor were from the other side of the House; more democrats voted for it than republicans. And the leadership of that measure was divided between the late member from Massachusetts, General Butler, and the present chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Many a man has been left at home for the part he took in that business. I am here to vindicate the career of the Committee on Appropriations for the last four years from the charge that we have allowed extraneous and unwise legislation to come in upon appropriation bills.

The amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew the amendment to the amendment. On this question of the measure of the expenditures of the Government, which has been introduced into this debate——

Mr. GARFIELD. Not expenditures, but appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I take the data just as I find them furnished by the gentleman's authority and mine; I take them just as they are. I take the ordinary expenditures of the Government for the very years the gentleman has mentioned, and there will be found a margin of over $40,000,000 between the statement of the gentleman and the statement which I hold in my hand. From that statement it appears that the expenditures for 1874 were $194,000,000 in round numbers; I omit the odd thousands. That was the highest point of expenditures reached. In 1875 the expenditures were, in round numbers, $171,000,000.

Now, the gentleman may tell me that I cannot go later than that, because we have no report upon that point from the Treasury Department. I will take the next best evidence. By the law the Clerk of this House is required to publish, after the adjournment of Congress, the amount of appropriations made by that Congress for the next fiscal year. And what does he report upon that point? The gentleman certainly has this report or some such report before him. I do not know what document he read from. I find no such work as he seems to have among the public documents. According to the published report of the Clerk of this House, the total appropriations for the present fiscal year are $179,166,209.90. I will incorporate into my remarks the whole of this table, showing the items of the total appropriations for the present fiscal year.

Now, if this document is true, if this published statement is true, published by authority of law and by the Clerk of this House—and, as a friend near me suggests, a republican Clerk, which of course would neither add nor detract from his reliability as a public officer—if this statement is true, then the $147,000,000, which the gentleman says is the amount for this year, should be made $179,166,209.90. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the reports which I have upon this subject. The finance report gives us the amounts down to last year; and to that we have added a report required by law, to be made by the Clerk of this House, of the appropriations made by the last Congress. Now, if the gentleman has a document there which I have not seen—and he seems to be reading from some document—if he has before him a public record, some document importing verity, which contradicts this which I hold, I will yield to the gentleman to produce that document.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will produce it at the proper time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Until then, I hold up to him a report of your Secretary of the Treasury in the one hand for all the years up to the present and in the other hand I hold up the other document, published by authority of law, showing the appropriations for the present year. If that is true, then where is your reduction of $30,000,000? For 1874 the appropriations were $194,000,000 and for this year the appropriations are $179,000,000.

The gentleman should not forget that even in the year 1870 we had reduced the expenditures of this Government down to $164,000,000. In 1872 we had reached a point as low as $153,000,000. This remorseless growth of expenditures is what arrests attention. If what the gentleman from Ohio suggests be true, then it would be a most gratifying spectacle if the ordinary current expenditures of the Government had been reduced for the present year to $147,000,000. Instead of that, however, the record shows the enormous aggregation of $179,000,000.

I will ask to have printed in the RECORD to-morrow morning the table prepared by the Clerk of this House, of the appropriations of the last Congress, with its various items, making $179,000,000. If that statement is false, let us understand why it is false, why a public record is no longer to be relied upon, and that a margin of $40,000,000 can possibly exist between the statement of a gentleman so well informed as the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] so long chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and these solemn records, upon which this whole matter is dependent.

The table referred to by Mr. HOLMAN is as follows:

Object of appropriation.	Amount.
For pensions	$30,000,000 00
For legislative, executive, and judicial expenses	18,902,236 99
For Indian service	5,360,554 55
For sundry civil expenses	26,644,350 09
For deficiencies	4,703,699 18
For rivers and harbors	6,643,517 50
For Army	27,933,830 00
For Navy	17,001,006 40
For consular and diplomatic service	1,374,985 00
For Post-Office	37,524,361 00
For Military Academy	364,740 00
For fortifications	850,000 00
For awards of commissioners of claims	729,653 62
Miscellaneous	1,133,275 57
Total	179,166,209 90

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very glad that my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and I have at last locked horns on facts. I will not look at the document which the gentleman proposes to publish, I know it so well; but I ask the Clerk to read from that document the appropriation for the Post-Office Department for the last fiscal year.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; and the gentleman will find the same modes embodied in the report on finance. It covers the whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Post-Office, $37,524,361.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, that is it, is it?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly, you will find the same items in the report which I hold in my hand.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Post-Office Department never has appropriated for it out of the Treasury anything except the deficiency necessary on account of the revenues falling short of the expenditures; and the Secretary of the Treasury, in a book lying on the gentleman's table in the committee-room, a book in the possession of every member of the committee, has certified the warrants of appropriations to the whole amount of every dollar appropriated out of the Treasury. From that book I read my statement that the appropriations of last year were $147,000,000. Now, how much does the Secretary of the Treasury say was appropriated out of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department; that is, the deficiency of money to supply the lack of revenue? Here is the amount, $7,175,542. And the gentleman reads from the report of the Clerk, which includes in its statement the whole amount of revenue of the Post-Office Department, superadded to our deficiency appropriation, and makes it $37,000,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. There he makes just the difference; there we have all the explanation. Having been so long a member of this House, and now almost five months a member of the Committee on Appropriations, does he not know the methods of keeping accounts; that the Secretary of the Treasury issues his certificate of the amount of money appropriated out of the Treasury, which is the thing we have to do with, and that the Clerk states the whole of that, plus the revenues of the Post-Office Department? I have explained this twenty times to new members who have come here within the last four years, but I did not suppose it was necessary to explain it to the Nestor of the House, least of all did I suppose I should need to explain it to any Thersites who merely scolds without knowledge. Now, that is all there is in this case. And the statement I made is the actual official statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the amount of money appropriated out of the Treasury by Congress.

Now, I have said many a time (and I agree to help any man who will join with me in the effort to make such a provision the law) that the revenues of the Post-Office Department should be covered into the Treasury and then appropriated out; but I have never been able to get that idea carried through nor to get any considerable support for it. If that were done, then the report of the Clerk would agree with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, the other book from which the gentleman read was a report of expenditures, not of appropriations; and the report of expenditures covers not only what we appropriate annually, but also all the interest on the public debt, which comes out of permanent appropriations with which Congress from session to session has nothing to do. The gentleman reads from a table of expenditures, compares it with my statement of appropriations, and hurras over the difference, wanting to know what is the matter with our accounts.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] seems to plume himself upon having discovered a mode of reconciling this difficulty. Why, sir, did I not assert that this finance report dealt in expenditures, and do I not still so assert? Does not this book of appropriations also deal in the same mode of expenditures? Does the gentleman pretend to say there is no doubling up all the way through?

Mr. GARFIELD. In what?

Mr. HOLMAN. In the statement of the expenditures by warrant as well as the statement of the expenditures in appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, I say it is the fact.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know that I know what the gentleman means by "doubling up."

Mr. HOLMAN. When the statement of the present fiscal year shall be published, the fact will be apparent that these revenues have been expended in the ordinary way, (I do not care whether they come from the Post-Office Department or any other Department,) and the statement for the present current year will show an expenditure exceeding $179,000,000. The gentleman need not think to squirm out of that proposition.

Mr. HALE. What was it last year, taking the gentleman's mode of reckoning?

Mr. HOLMAN. Last year it was $171,000,000, the year before $194,000,000, by the same mode of reckoning exactly. Do not the revenues of the Post-Office Department, the body of them, go to the credit of that Department? Are they not covered into the Treasury, and are they not re-appropriated in the regular, ordinary way?

Mr. HALE. They are not.

Mr. HOLMAN. They are.

Mr. HALE. Only the deficiency is appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. The whole are appropriated. They are estimated for by the Post-Office Department and are drawn by warrant from the Treasury. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] will find that he has a great deal to learn on this subject. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in spite of the opportunities for acquiring knowledge which he enjoyed upon the Committee on Appropriations, will find that he has a great deal to learn if he does not know that the moneys appropriated from the revenues of the Post-Office Department are drawn from the Treasury of the United States by warrant and placed to the credit of that Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman mean that a dollar of those revenues ever goes into the Treasury?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do mean it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Never a dollar of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman is mistaken. It does not go into the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. The very fact of appropriation implies that. I hope they will watch the process for the coming year. The next report on finance, when accounts are made up, will show it embraces appropriations of the current revenue of the Post-Office Department. The expenditures of the present fiscal year on that basis exceed $179,000,000. I have heard this attempted explanation made over and over again. I remember the quarrel between the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DAWES, and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GARFIELD, on this very point when the latter attempted——

Mr. GARFIELD. That was about the sinking fund.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. DAWES was then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—no, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The latter charged that Mr. DAWES was adding largely to his figures, when in fact the gentleman from Ohio discovered that the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DAWES, chairman of the other great committee of the House, was correct, while he himself was in the wrong.

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend forgets that was about the sinking fund.

Mr. HOLMAN. Take the appropriation for the last year. It is provided that if the revenues of the Post-Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, then the sum of $6,852,705, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30 1876.

Mr. RANDALL. That appropriates the revenues.

Mr. HOLMAN. How could it be possible the Clerk of the House, under the law, would certify an appropriation of $37,000,000 if the money did not happen to be appropriated from the Treasury of the United States? Where is it appropriated from? From what other place do you appropriate money except the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will for a question.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I desire to know whether the gentleman includes in the statement for 1875, which is $171,000,000, the Post-Office revenue?

Mr. HOLMAN. The figures in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury show the expenditures for that year, and the revenues of the Post-Office are included. That is unavoidable.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I have the statement from which that amount is made up, $171,000,000, and the gentleman will find on page 4 of the report the deficiency only is there included.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman may have those items before him, but the fact is as I have stated. They are all put upon the same basis. The attempt has been all the time to show an enormous reduction of twenty-odd millions of dollars was made in the last Congress. The same effort is being made now that was made then. The gentleman from Ohio then made the same kind of speech he has made recently. This is not a new attempt to cover up the facts.

Mr. HALE. It struck me many times this session that the gentleman from Indiana never appears better in debate upon this floor than when almost driven to the wall; but when he is driven clean to the wall, even he cannot stand up against the facts and figures. He made his issue upon the statement that the appropriation for the year 1876, ending July of that year, instead of being one hundred and forty-seven million and odd dollars, as claimed by the gentleman from Ohio, was $179,000,000. Now either one or the other is true, and what we have to deal with as of importance to the people is the appropriation of money to be raised by taxation. That is represented by $147,000,000, and I say again to the gentleman from Indiana, those are the figures. When he proceeds to add thirty-odd millions in order to make bigger figures he takes those millions from sources of revenue for which the people have no taxation put upon them in appropriation bills. Therefore he is wrong.

If he says there has not been an actual reduction in the last year by Congress through the Committee on Appropriations ranging from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000, thereby reducing the draft on the people, he states what is not borne out by the facts, and he may search from now until doomsday in all the books, and he will find himself to be wrong.

One thing more in which I wish to correct him, as he is the subject of discipline to-night, and that is his charge that objection on this side of the House to legislation on appropriation bills is new-born. He has said I for one have sat here for years, and he has never heard any objection from me and no speech of mine in opposition has come to him. Why, sir, under the old arrangement no speech had to be made to prevent legislation being incorporated upon an appropriation bill. If an amendment was offered for general legislation all that a member had to do was to rise in his place and object on a point of order, and it was ruled out. No speech was made and none was needed.

Now, I have sat here side by side with the gentleman for years, and on some days he knows, and as I bring this to his mind he will remember it, he and I have risen, turn and turn about, in our seats, and objected to amendments putting legislation upon appropriation bills on the point of order that they involved new legislation. If the gentleman does not remember that, he does not give me as much credit as I give him, for I know that he has done so scores of times, and as I look him in the face and call this to his mind, I am sure he will remember that I have done it. And my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has risen from his seat over and over again, and prevented legislation, not by speeches—because they were not needed—but by a simple objection on the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I rose at the same time as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, simply for the purpose of asking that gentleman whether, in his judgment, the debate on this question has not been pretty well exhausted?

Mr. RANDALL. I think it has, but I want to say a word further. I renew the amendment to the amendment.

The expenditures by the Post-Office Department are different perhaps from those of any Department of the Government. We provide generally for an appropriation of all the revenues of the Post-Office Department, and appropriate in addition a deficiency. Now, to all intents and purposes that money comes out of the Treasury, just as the money comes out of the Treasury which is included under the head of collections of internal revenue; and it is a stronger case than even that. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] knows perfectly well that we do not from year to year make appropriations for the collection of customs; and yet there go out of the Treasury of the United States for that purpose specific appropriations of five and a half millions of dollars and all the money that is collected from fines, forfeitures, penalties, and fees. And when the gentleman makes up his account for the present fiscal year as showing that the expenditures are only $179,000,000, he has not told us at all what were the permanent specific and indefinite appropriations of the Government. Now, those permanent indefinite appropriations of the Government include the amount necessary to pay the public debt and the amount necessary to meet the sinking-fund requirements; and it is quite right that those two items should be out of the reach of legislation, because something might occur by which legislation for the payment of the interest on the public debt might fail in Congress. Nevertheless, these permanent appropriations, these indefinite, and these post-office appropriations all come out of the revenues of the Government, and it is an evasion of the gentleman from Ohio when he says that the money which comes in through the Post-Office Department is not an expenditure of the Government. The truth is that this is as much an expenditure of the Government as any other money that comes in.

We have that source of revenue, it is true, just as we have the source of revenue of internal taxation, just as we have the source of revenue from customs. But it is all one and the same thing; it comes out of the great body of the people after all. And when we come to show how much it costs to run the Government, the customs, the internal revenue, the indefinite, the permanent, and the Post-Office receipts are entitled properly to be charged as expenditures when they are paid out, whether they are in the nature of deficiencies of the Post-Office Department, or whether they appear as revenues.

The gentleman from Maine spoke some time ago of the system of placing legislation on appropriation bills as pernicious. I want to draw the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the appropriation act for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865. The gentleman from Ohio and I at the time of the passage of that act were here together. The honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was also here. I read the last clause of a section in that appropriation bill in the form of a proviso, as follows:

Provided, That in the courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color, nor in civil actions because he is a party to, or interested in, the issue tried.

I read from the report of the proceedings as I find it in the Congressional Globe:

The question recurred upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate, which was to add the following proviso:

Provided, That in the courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color, nor in civil actions because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried.

I find that Mr. HOLMAN objected and demanded the yeas and nays, and I find among the yeas the name of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD;] and I find voting against it the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and I am by his side voting against incorporating that legislation on an appropriation bill. And now talk to me about inserting legislation in appropriation bills, and about its being pernicious, after the insertion of that legislation relating to a matter which had no more connection with the appropriation bill than I have with the man in the moon. The proviso was attached to a section to meet expenses in convicting counterfeiters, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of meeting any expenses in detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, or other securities of the United States, as well as the coin of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, one simple statement I think will dispose of the position of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in regard to the rightfulness of including the Post-Office Department appropriation in the sum spent for the expenses of the Government, and for which we may hold either political party responsible. Suppose the revenues of the Post-Office Department shall go up to $100,000,000 next year and it should pay its own expenses and something over, would you think it quite fair to add that to the amount to be charged to you as a matter of extravagance of expenditures? That $100,000,000 is what the Government receives for a particular service rendered to the people for something that it sells, and every additional million received by the Post-Office Department from the people is an additional evidence of the prosperity of the people and of the economy with which the Department is managed.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the difference between a postage-stamp which yields three or two cents and a revenue-stamp on tobacco?

Mr. HOAR. Why, the difference is very great. Every new postage-stamp represents a new service done to the business of the country by the Government and which is sold and paid for; but we lament the necessity of every revenue-stamp we issue, and rejoice in the increased demand for postage-stamps.

Mr. RANDALL. That does not affect the question of revenue; both relate to revenue, whether they be Post-Office stamps, tobacco stamps, or whisky stamps.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Pennsylvania were debating with this side of the House the question whether the expenditures of the Government had been more or less economical, and I do not believe either of them can find an associate on that side of the House who will say he believes that an addition of $100,000,000 to the Post-Office revenues of the Government, if it should take place by reason of growth in population and increase of prosperity, should be charged against the party in possession of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only indulged in that by way of comparison.

Mr. HOAR. Now, in regard to this question of legislation upon appropriation bills, I think the instance that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has read, although the matter inserted in the bill was a wise and just law, was a vicious example of the method of getting a wise and just law through. Every majority in this House will claim that the matter which, without the responsibility of the yeas and nays, it ingrafts upon an appropriation bill is a good measure, and will say, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations does and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] does, that he thinks it a good thing to do when the end is a good one and a bad thing to do when the end is a bad one.

Mr. RANDALL. If it be germane.

Mr. HOAR. It is a bad thing to permit it to be done whenever the majority of the House happens to believe or professes to believe that the thing is a good one.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Butler, who was here in the last Congress, claimed that the bill increasing the salaries of members and the salary of the President was a good bill, and it was put on. Now I think that the bill to which the gentleman has referred, making colored men witnesses, although I suppose there is no gentleman in the House who now would rise up and vote against it as a separate measure, could have waited until the sense of the country and Congress would pass it as a separate measure and that it was an abuse. I said to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that I agreed that the side of the House to which I belonged had practiced and set an example of that abuse in times past. I have denounced it quite as earnestly as I have denounced it at the time it was done by a two-thirds majority of Congress. The difference is this: this is the first time in the history of this country that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has stood up in the face of the country and the House to justify the practice, a practice which introduces all manner of vicious and evil legislation, which forces it through without the constitutional record being made, and which deprives the House of its constitutional power and dignity in relation to legislation and puts it into the hands of five or six members of a conference committee.

Gentlemen know very well that upon these conference committees' reports when they come in there is but one motion in order: will you concur or non-concur? You cannot move an amendment; you cannot lay them on the table; you cannot under the rules of the House do anything but concur or non-concur, or send the whole appropriations to destruction and thereby stop all the operations of the Government of the country.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman see any impropriety, or has he ever heard any question of propriety raised as to an amendment on an appropriation bill that limited the appropriation of the money?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, does not the gentleman know that where a measure is germane to the bill and in the nature of retrenchment it belongs simply to that class of legislation, and nothing more? And that is all we are asking for.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the point, and I agree that the gentleman is right as far as he goes. My objection is to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that he puts into an appropriation bill matter not limiting the appropriation of money and having nothing to do with the appropriation for the salary of the President for the present year.

Mr. RANDALL. To my knowledge there is nothing in this appropriation bill except what is germane and proposes to reduce expenditures.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I renew it to answer a question which has been discussed to-night without being fairly met. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says that he sought to have the money received by the Postmaster-General's Department covered into the Treasury and could not get it done, and objected to its being considered a part of the expenditures of last year.

I state that whether the expenditure be for the Post-Office Department or for any other Department of the Government, it cannot be made without a legal appropriation. And I state further, what the former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] doubtless knows, but what he seems not to recognize as the fact now, that, while the revenues of the Post-Office Department may not be actually paid into the Treasury here in Washington City or elsewhere, they cannot be used by that Department until they are by covering warrants carried into the Treasury, and by a law of Congress appropriated for the service of that Department. And following that statement, which will not and cannot be controverted, I will read section 3623 of the Revised Statutes, being a provision of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1809.

All officers, agents, or other persons receiving public moneys shall render distinct accounts of the application thereof according to the appropriation under which the same may have been advanced to them.

The only point I desired to make was this; in making up the accounts referred to by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] he is clearly correct in assuming that the moneys from the Post-Office Department, like all other moneys, are actually carried into the Treasury or go there by the fiction of covering warrants, and cannot be expended unless so covered into the Treasury and appropriated by an act of Congress.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to one point. The statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] as to the expenditures for 1875, 1874, and preceding years include only the deficiencies appropriated for the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, as the Treasury reports for 1875 and preceding years show. In his statement of the expenditures that will be incurred for the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1876, he has included, as I understand, all of the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, not limiting his statement, as in the preceding years, to the appropriations for deficiencies in the expenditures of that Department. That is the difference between his statement and the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who includes in the expenditures of the present fiscal year, as well as of the preceding fiscal years, the deficiencies only for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman mean by that statement to assume that the ordinary revenues of the Post-Office Department are not appropriated by law before they can be used?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. As a matter of fact, whether they are passed upon by the Treasury Department or not has nothing to do with this case. Here is the finance report, from which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] read the statement of the expenditures of the several Departments of the Government for the year 1875 and preceding years. In the preceding pages of that report will be found the items of those expenditures, and those items—and I call his attention to them—merely cover the deficiencies of appropriations for the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, being a little over $6,000,000 for 1875. This report from the Treasury Department sustains the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment and upon the amendment to the amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to have the pending paragraph disposed of, and then I will move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read the amendment to the amendment; which was to strike out of the pending paragraph the following:

And on and after the 4th day of March, 1877, the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. RANDALL, which was to insert after the words "United States" where they first occur the words "up to the 4th day of March, 1877, at the rate of $50,000 per annum;" and to insert after "$33,611.11" the words "and from the said day to the 30th day of June, 1877, both days inclusive, at the rate of $25,000 per annum, $8,035; in all, $41,746.11;" so that the paragraph will read:

For compensation of the President of the United States up to the 4th day of March, 1877, at the rate of $50,000 per annum, $33,611.11; and from the said day to the 30th day of June, 1877, both days inclusive, at the rate of $25,000 per annum, $8,035; in all, $41,746.11; and on and after the 4th day of March, 1877, the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum.

The amendment of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For compensation of the Vice-President of the United States, $8,000.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] said that as soon as we had passed the paragraph relating to the salary of the President of the United States he would move that the committee rise.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX reported that the committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BRADLEY: Resolutions of the Vessel Owners and Captains' Association, favoring the granting of liberal appropriations to the United States Signal Service and to the hydrographic branch of the Navy Department, to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, the petition of 73 citizens of Gladwin County, Michigan, for the establishment of a post-route from Loomis to Cedar, via Grant, Michigan, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. CAULFIELD: The petition of A. G. Burley and other importers and dealers in china and glassware, of Chicago, Illinois, that a uniform rate of duty of 30 per cent. be levied upon earthenware, crockery, china, and glassware, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. CLYMER: The petition of citizens of Union Township, Berks County, Pennsylvania, against a revision of the tariff laws, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of citizens of Douglass Township, Berks County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. DURHAM: The petition of Lemuel S. Brown, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FARWELL: The petition of Mary P. Mullin, for indemnity for the destruction of her house and household property by order of the military authority commanding at Paducah, Kentucky, on the 25th of March, 1864, in defense of the attack of confederate troops under General Forrest, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FROST: The petition of citizens of Massachusetts, for a light-house and fog-bell upon the Grave's Rocks, in Boston Harbor, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HOAR: The petition of Sydney S. Turner, for renewal of his patent No. 11588 and re-issue No. 163, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of J. M. Talbott and others, for an appropriation for the improvement of the approaches to the National Cemetery of Richmond, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of the heirs of Jamima Bell, that they be paid money due her at the time of her death as the widow of Isaac Bell, a revolutionary soldier, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. LAPHAM: Resolution of the Vessel Owners and Captains' Association, favoring the granting of liberal appropriations to the United States Signal Service and to the hydrographic branch of the Navy Department, to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. MACDOUGALL: Resolutions of the Vessel Owners and Captains' Association, favoring the granting of liberal appropriations to the United States Signal Service and to the hydrographic branch of the Navy Department, to the same committee.

By Mr. PARSONS: Papers relating to the claim of Thierman & Frast, of Louisville, Kentucky, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. ROBERTS: The petition of 72 farmers, fishermen, and others having interests in the North East River, Cecil County, Maryland, against any further appropriation for the deepening of said river, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. STONE: The petitions of wholesale grocers, liquor dealers, brewers, mineral-water manufacturers, and druggists, of San Francisco, California; of New Orleans, Louisiana; of Milwaukee, Wisconsin; of Cleveland, Ohio; of Brooklyn, New York; of Sacramento, California; of Columbus, Ohio; of Macon, Georgia; of Memphis, Tennessee; of Augusta, Georgia; of Springfield, Tennessee; of Mobile, Alabama; of Saint Paul, Minnesota; of Toledo, Ohio; of La Grange, Missouri, and of Nashville, Tennessee, that cork and manufactures of cork be placed on the free list, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. SWANN: The petition of Clement Deitrich, Edward A. Deitrich, and 68 other workingmen, against any reduction in the tariff, to the same committee.

Also, remonstrance of W. C. Dulany & Co., Cushing & Baily, Kelly, Piet & Co., and 17 others, envelope manufacturers, printers, stationers, and lithographers, against the Post-Office Department manufacturing, selling, and printing envelopes so as to interfere with petitioners' business, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: The petition of Cynthia Spradlin, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. VAN VORHES: The petition of citizens of Athens, Ohio, and also a letter from Messrs. Kurtz & Norris, remonstrating against the Post-Office Department manufacturing, selling, and printing envelopes so as to interfere with their business, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WELLS, of Missouri: Memorial of Anthony S. Robinson, heir of Dr. John Hamilton Robinson, for compensation for services rendered by him as a brigadier-general in the Mexican army during the struggle for independence in that country, and indemnity for losses and injuries sustained while acting in that capacity, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. WHITE: A paper relating to a post-route from Mouth Pond, Kentucky, to Big Rock, Virginia, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS: The petition of 122 citizens of Detroit, Michigan, for authority to construct a bridge across Detroit River, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Michigan, soldiers of the late war, for the passage of the bill for equalizing bounties, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Michigan, soldiers of the late war, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Michigan, soldiers of the late war, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 28 citizens of Michigan, soldiers in the late war, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Michigan, soldiers in the late war, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Michigan, soldiers in the late war, of similar import, to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 5, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the attention of the Senate to a matter which I, after consultation with as many Senators as I could find, think it necessary to bring to the notice of the Senate respecting the matter of the impeachment to-day. The third rule of the Senate in regard to impeachments provides that on this day at one o'clock—

> The presiding officer shall administer the oath hereinafter provided to the members of the Senate then present, and to the other members of the Senate as they shall appear, whose duty it shall be to take the same.

But on examination we are unable to find any statute of the United States which authorizes the President of the Senate or the presiding officer to administer this oath. It stands upon the rule alone. The language of the statute about the authority of the presiding officer is that when Senators appear to take their seats upon an election to this body the presiding officer shall swear them in, and any Senator may administer the similar oath to the Vice-President, the President of the Senate, when he appears; and there the statute stops except in respect of witnesses who are by law to be sworn by the President of the Senate.

In this state of difficulty and in the very grave doubt, at least, that in the minds of all the gentlemen whom I have been able to consult there is about this being a constitutional compliance with that requirement which obliges us to be under oath, which, of course, implies a legal and binding oath, we have thought it best for this occasion, until provision can be made by law, to submit to the Senate a proposition that the Chief Justice of the United States be invited to attend at one o'clock to-day to administer these oaths, there being no question about his authority to do so. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this portion of Rule 3 which I have read, respecting the administration of the oath by the presiding officer, shall be suspended for this day; and if that be unanimously agreed to, as of course it requires unanimous consent to suspend this rule, I shall then offer an order which will accomplish the next step in the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has heard the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, that so much of the rule as pertains to the swearing in of the Senators by the presiding officer be suspended for to-day. Is there objection? [A pause.] The Chair hears none. The order is unanimously made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now offer the following order:

> Ordered, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Chair to wait upon the Chief Justice of the United States, and invite him to attend in the Senate Chamber at one o'clock p. m. this day to administer to Senators the oath required by the Constitution in the matter of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

Mr. INGALLS. Can the Senator from Vermont inform us if the authority of the Chief Justice is statutory to administer oaths in cases of impeachment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; not to administer oaths in cases of impeachment; but there is a general authority given the judges of the courts of the United States to administer any oath that it is lawful for any person to take, swear persons upon affidavits, or swear any body into office, or administer any other oath in the course of proceedings, as we understand the law.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Vermont if he knows certainly that it will be within the power of the Chief Justice to attend, and if not, I make a suggestion whether it would not be well to make his resolution in the alternative, in case the Chief Justice should not be able to attend, then some associate justice?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that may be very well, and I will modify the resolution by adding, "or, in case of his inability to attend, any one of the associate justices."

While that correction is being made, as is suggested by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] we propose to introduce a bill presently to provide for cases of this character, and also to provide, as probably we ought, (although that would be a matter for consideration,) an authority to the Secretary or the Chief Clerk to administer oaths to witnesses, which by statute does not now exist, though that has usually been practiced; but it is certainly not authorized by law, so far as can be discovered.

Mr. BOGY. I could not very distinctly hear what the Senator from Vermont said; therefore I am a little at a loss, and would like to know the reason why the presiding officer cannot administer the oaths required on this occasion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The reason I stated was that, as we understand it, in order to make an oath a lawful oath, it must be administered by some person authorized by law to administer oaths, and there is no law that can be discovered which confers that authority, the present law merely conferring it upon the presiding officer in the case of the first appearance of Senators when elected.

Mr. BOGY. The difficulty was that I had not heard the Senator from Vermont distinctly.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask to have the resolution reported as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> Ordered, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Chair to wait upon the Chief Justice of the United States and invite him to attend in the Senate Chamber at one o'clock p. m. this day, or, in case of his inability to attend, then to invite any one of the associate justices to administer to Senators the oath required by the Constitution in the matter of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair appoints the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] as the committee.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WALLACE presented a memorial of workingmen of Fayette County, Pennsylvania, a memorial of workingmen of Delaware County, Pennsylvania, and two memorials of workingmen of Berks County, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any change in the tariff laws; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Daniel Sullivan, of Saint Lawrence County, New York, praying that he may be allowed an increase of Pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the petition of a large number of United States pensioners who have lost a leg above the knee or an arm above the elbow, praying for the repeal of the proviso prohibiting the issue of artificial limbs or commutation therefor to them. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented a memorial of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, in favor of legislation authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to confirm to that society the sale of the marine hospital building at Natchez, Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BAYARD presented the memorial of F. E. Hering and 31 others, of Wilmington, Delaware, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented the petition of Allen B. Wilson, of Waterbury, Connecticut, praying for the extension of his letters-patent for an improvement in sewing-machines; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

ALABAMA CLAIMS COURT JUDGMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] if he is willing now to allow us to take up and act upon the bill reported yesterday in regard to the payment of certain judgments?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am willing to have it taken up and considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now ask the attention of the Senate to this bill. I move to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is not through, the Chair will observe.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will wait until after the morning business is concluded.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas N. Poullain, sr., of Georgia, praying to be indemnified for the loss of cotton seized by the United States authorities in 1863 and 1864, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Angeline Logan, of Van Buren, Arkansas, praying compensation for services rendered in a Federal hospital, have had the same under consideration, and instruct me to report a bill providing for the allowance of the claim. There was a printed report in this case at the last Congress. That report is adopted by the committee. I do not ask that the report shall be printed. The matter is of very small importance.

The bill (S. No. 696) for the relief of Angeline Logan was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Josiah Wardwell, of Penobscot, Maine, praying remuneration for the loss sustained by him by reason of the enlistment of his son, Hiram F. Wardwell, in the Navy of the United States, he being at the time a minor, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 622) for the relief of John L. Williams, sole heir of Eleazer Williams, deceased, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Lyman Guinnip, praying payment of expenses incurred by means of his imprisonment through false charges of rebels during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Zepherin Lambert, of Saint Landry Parish, Louisiana, asking compensation for nineteen bales of cotton delivered to Captain C. H. Conwell, acting quartermaster United States Army, in 1863, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1797) providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 212) to provide for the issuance of patents to certain Indian lands in Kansas, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

SALE OF PAWNEE RESERVATION.

Mr. WITHERS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2678) to authorize the sale of the Pawnee reservation, to report it without amendment; and I am also instructed to ask for its present consideration, as the exigency of the case requires it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MENOMONEE INDIANS.

Mr. OGLESBY. The Committee on Indian Affairs have had under consideration a subject not referred to them by this body in regard to some Indians in Wisconsin on the Menomonee reservation, and the committee have instructed me to report a bill on that subject authorizing the sale of logs cut by the Indians of the Menomonee reservation in Wisconsin, under the direction of the Interior Department, a bill originating in the committee, recommended by the committee, and I should like to state the reason why the bill should pass at once. I will ask to have it considered now.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it lie aside long enough to take up a bill lying on the table for a day.

The bill (S. No. 697) authorizing the sale of logs cut by the Indians of the Menomonee reservation in Wisconsin was read the first time by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it lie over for a little while.

Mr. OGLESBY. Is there any particular reason why the Senator desires it to lie over, provided it is a meritorious and just bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not the slightest; but I desire to have a bill passed that has priority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield for that purpose?

Mr. OGLESBY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. OGLESBY. I understood that the bill would lie over momentarily, not to be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. Just let it lie on the table for the present. It can be called up again.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 698) authorizing the President to nominate Ira C. Whitehead an assistant surgeon in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 699) to confirm the sale of the marine hospital building and grounds at Natchez, in the State of Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will take this occasion to state that I think it would be exceedingly well that all bills and resolutions introduced by request should be so labeled on the back, so that the committees may know whether the Senator introducing them is responsible for them or not.

Mr. INGALLS. The suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont appears to me to be very just. In common with many others, I have been frequently called upon to introduce bills in the interest of parties with whom I was unacquainted, and upon matters that I had no knowledge of whatever; and if it is now in order, I will move that the Secretary be instructed in printing bills, if they are introduced by request, to have that fact appear upon the title of the bill itself, inserting in brackets the words "by request." It always appears, I believe, in the RECORD, but the bill is the document from which information is received by the public at large. They see the bill, and ascertain that it is introduced by a Senator, and suppose it is his bill, and that he is concerned in it or interested in its progress. In order to prevent that difficulty, I move that the Secretary, in having bills printed hereafter, be instructed to have the words "by request" inserted when that is the fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has heard the motion of the Senator from Kansas. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest, for the convenience of the Secretary, that Senators, if they please, will note the words "by request" on the bills they introduce; and then there will be no confusion.

Mr. OGLESBY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 700) for the relief of the heirs of Jean François Perry; which was read twice by its title, and, together with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HITCHCOCK, it was Ordered, That the papers pertaining to the claim of James R. Porter be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask permission to have the evidence and papers in the case of the University of Missouri, now pending before the Committee on Claims of the Senate, withdrawn, to be referred to a committee in the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will first be necessary to discharge the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not want the committee discharged. The committee of the House are considering the claim now, and they desire the evidence. We want simply permission for them to take the papers from the files here and use them there, to be returned, of course.

Mr. WRIGHT. The proposition of the Senator from Missouri is in regard to papers not in the possession of the Senate, but in the hands of the committee; and the Senate has no control over them, as I understand, until the committee is discharged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair understands. Does the Senator move that the committee be discharged?

Mr. COCKRELL. Under the rules, must the committee be discharged before the papers can be withdrawn from the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly. They are in possession of the committee, and it will be necessary to discharge the committee. The Senate will then have possession of the papers, and then they can be transmitted, by copies or otherwise, to the other House.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to my friend from Missouri that he can accomplish all he wants by either having some person take copies of the papers as they are now before the committee or getting the consent of the committee for their present use in the House if that is desirable.

Mr. COCKRELL. All I want is their presence in the House; and if the chairman will direct the clerk of the committee to let the House committee have them, that will be sufficient.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is a matter that we can arrange in committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

ALABAMA CLAIMS COURT JUDGMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2800.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2800) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay judgments provided for in an act approved February 15, 1876, entitled "An act providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of paying the judgments provided for in the act approved February 15, 1876, to convert into coupon bonds and to sell, after five days' notice, so many as may be necessary for this purpose of the 5 per cent. registered bonds of the United States now held subject to the disposition of Congress under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1873.

Mr. SHERMAN. As there was an objection made to this bill yesterday, I will state that under the act referred to, approved March 3, 1873, the money received from Great Britain in consequence of the arbitration at Geneva was invested in a 5 per cent. registered bond of the United States to be held subject to the future disposition of Congress. During the present session provision has been made for the payment of judgments to the amount of five or six million dollars—I do not know the precise amount; but the fund out of which they are to be paid now stands in the form of a registered bond payable to the order of the Secretary of the Treasury to the amount of $15,000,000. It is necessary to break it up and change it in order to pay these various judgments; and this bill is intended to carry that into execution. That is all there is of it. The bill was carefully prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury with a view to meet the case, and was passed in the House of Representatives and is now before us without amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask him a question? The fifteenth section of the act of June 25, 1874, seems to make an ample provision for this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under that section it would be necessary to print an entire new bond, and it is objectionable to have another class of bonds for so small an amount comparatively as five or six millions of dollars. Therefore it was thought best to issue the existing 5 per cent. bonds of the United States that are now on the market, without introducing a new loan. Every Senator can understand how desirable it is not to multiply the loans of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then section 15 of the act of 1874 provides for a parcel of new bonds different from any heretofore issued?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, that provides for a class of bonds not now in use—old bonds entirely out of use—while the bill that is now before us provides for what is called the new 5 per cent. bonds. I supposed myself that the objection of the Senator grew out of the fact that this bill did not require the bonds to be sold for coin.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to come to the objections as I go along.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why does not this bill require these bonds to be sold at not less than par, when all the other bills I have seen authorizing the sale of bonds put some limit upon the price at which they shall be sold?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can only say, in reference to that, that such a provision is entirely unnecessary, because these bonds are above par in coin in the market, and it may not be desirable to sell them in coin, because they will sell for a higher price in currency. The judgments are payable in currency, and it is as a matter of course the interest of the United States to get as much for these bonds in currency as possible.

Mr. COCKRELL. My objection was not that the bonds were not to be sold for coin, but that there was no limit as to the price at which they should be sold. The Secretary may sell them at any price he chooses.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may be; but we know very well that they are worth in currency about 118. If the Senator really desires to put in a limitation that they shall not be sold at less than par, I have no objection except that it sends the bill back to the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no desire to encumber the bill; but I want to know the reason why we have here this departure from any act I have been able to find.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the reason. The reason the phrase is omitted, "sold at not less than par in coin," is because it may be advisable to sell these bonds in currency.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should not want them sold for coin. I would want them sold for gold. "Coin" would include silver.

Mr. SHERMAN. They will be sold for more than par. They are worth 103 in gold and 118 in currency, I believe.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE-SERVICE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. Being on four committees, I think I am entitled to resign one of them, and I prefer to resign this one.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think, after the very exhaustive and careful report that the Senator has made from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims at this session, he is entitled to a furlough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that he be excused from further service upon the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, by unanimous consent, was authorized to fill the vacancy.

MENOMONEE INDIANS.

Mr. OGLESBY. The reason for the present consideration of the bill that I reported this morning from the Committee on Indian Affairs arises from the fact that the logs in question were cut under the direction of the Indian agent by the Indians on the reservation in Wisconsin and are now distributed along the waters which lead into Green Bay, and, if some disposition is not made within a very few days by an act of Congress on the subject, the spring thaw will come and the logs will be lost and carried off by the high waters, and no good can come to either the Indians or the Government from it. Upon consultation with the Interior Department and communications from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and upon consideration by the committee this morning, the bill, which is an original bill and not yet printed, attempts to meet the difficulty. Now, I will state the facts so that the Senate will be in possession of all there is about it.

In 1874, through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, the Indian agent on the Menomonee reservation, which lies forty-five or fifty miles west of Green Bay, was permitted to give the Indians employment and labor in cutting pine logs. They were cut from trees that had been injured by the fires and were in the process of decay. It was thought that they would go to ruin unless they were utilized by putting them into what we call saws. So this Indian agent employed the Indians there and they cut up the partially-damaged pine timber and stored it away, and it has been remaining there to the amount of about fourteen million feet at a cost of some $45,000 for the labor and service of the Indians and for supplies purchased on credit for the Indians while the trees were being cut into logs, of which about $12,000 has been paid. The remainder is unpaid and the Indians stand greatly in need of it. The Secretary of the Interior understands that he cannot give directions for the disposition of these logs at public sale after due advertisement without a special act of Congress. This bill provides that the special agent of the Interior Department shall go upon the ground and give the necessary public notice and sell the logs to the highest bidder for cash, and out of the proceeds the amount due shall be paid to the Indians for their labor and to those persons who furnished them supplies, and the balance shall be deposited in the nearest depository of the Treasury for the benefit of the United States.

The necessity for the bill, as the committee regard it, is that it may pass both Houses and be put into execution, so that the logs may be sold and what benefit will ever be derived from them be derived instantly, that the purchasers of the logs may have the benefit of the spring rise and take them to market. If this bill be not passed, they may be drifted away, and probably will be, and a large portion, if not all of them, lost. The committee regard the bill as entirely meritorious, and only ask for its present consideration in view of the coming spring thaw and floods; and if it be not speedily acted upon, it will be of no utility this year. These are the substantial facts in the case. The committee would be glad if the Senate would act favorably on the bill.

The bill (S. No. 697) authorizing the sale of logs cut by the Indians on the Menomonee reservation in Wisconsin, under the direction of the Interior Department was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be sold at public sale to the highest bidder, for cash, after due advertisement and in such lots or quantities as he may deem judicious, all pine timber cut upon the Menomonee Indian reservation in Wisconsin under the direction of the United States Indian agent, J. C. Bridgman. The proceeds arising from the sale of such timber are to be applied, first, to the payment of any and all indebtedness incurred for labor, supplies, and other expenses incident to the cutting and sale of the timber; and the surplus, if any, is to be deposited in the nearest depository to the credit of the United States.

Mr. BOGY. I should like to move an amendment to the bill. I will state that I think the bill is very proper, and it ought to pass immediately if it is intended to carry out the object designed to be accomplished; otherwise it will be too late—that is, to permit the logs to be sold before they can be washed away by the spring freshets. But the bill provides that the remainder of the money, after the expenses are all paid, "shall be placed to the credit of the United States." It should be "to the credit of the United States for the benefit of the Indians." I move to insert the words, "for the benefit of the said Menomonee Indians."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that we proceed with the Calendar, and consider unobjected cases, for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar, at the point where its consideration was left yesterday.

BUTLER, MILLER & CO.

The bill (S. No. 627) making an appropriation to pay the claim of Butler, Miller & Co., was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $7,224.88 to Butler, Miller & Co., for cotton taken at Nashville, Tennessee, in 1863, by the United States Army, and in full satisfaction and discharge of their claim for such cotton.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That bill was read yesterday, and the accompanying report was also read. I think there is no objection to the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The Chief Justice of the United States, Hon. Morrison R. Waite, entered the Senate Chamber, escorted by Messrs. EDMUNDS and THURMAN, the committee appointed for the purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the Senate, according to its rule, will now proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Chief Justice will take the seat provided for him at the right of the Chair.

The Chief Justice took a seat by the side of the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will give attention while the constitutional oath is being administered.

The Chief Justice administered the oath to the President pro tempore, as follows:

You do solemnly swear that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, now pending, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws: so help you God.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now call the roll of Senators alphabetically in groups of six, and Senators as they are so called will advance to the desk and take the oath.

Mr. MORTON. If there be no objection on the part of any Senator, I suggest that all the Senators be sworn at once, standing in their places. I see no objection to that. It will save time and some trouble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. THURMAN. There will be some doubt about verifying who are sworn if we proceed in that way. I think we had better follow the precedent heretofore established.

Mr. MORTON. Very well.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll alphabetically, and the Chief Justice administered the oath to Senators ANTHONY, BAYARD, BOGY, BOOTH, BOUTWELL, BRUCE, CAMERON of Pennsylvania, CAMERON of Wisconsin, CLAYTON, COCKRELL, COOPER, CRAGIN, DAVIS, DAWES, DORSEY, EATON, EDMUNDS, FRELINGHUYSEN, GORDON, HAMILTON, HAMLIN, HARVEY, HITCHCOCK, INGALLS, JONES of Florida, KELLY, KERNAN, KEY, LOGAN, MCCREERY, MCDONALD, MCMILLAN, MAXEY, MERRIMON, MITCHELL, MORRILL of Vermont, MORTON, NORWOOD, OGLESBY, PADDOCK, RANDOLPH, SARGENT, SAULSBURY, SHARON, SHERMAN, SPENCER, STEVENSON, THURMAN, WALLACE, WEST, WHYTE, WINDOM, WITHERS, and WRIGHT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absentees on the call will now be called, so that in case they have entered the Chamber since the oath has been administered they may come forward.

The Chief Clerk called the names of the absentees as follows: Messrs. ALCORN, ALLISON, BURNSIDE, CAPERTON, CHRISTIANCY, CONKLING, CONOVER, DENNIS, ENGLISH, GOLDTHWAITE, HOWE, JOHNSTON, JONES of Nevada, MORRILL of Maine, PATTERSON, RANSOM, ROBERTSON, and WADLEIGH.

The Chief Justice thereupon withdrew from the Senate Chamber, escorted by Messrs. EDMUNDS and THURMAN.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I offer the following order, and ask for its present consideration:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now organized for the trial of articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and is ready to receive the managers on the part of the House at its bar.

The order was agreed to.

At one o'clock and forty minutes p. m. the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives appeared at the bar and their presence was announced by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will conduct the managers to the seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were conducted to the seats assigned them within the space in front of the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Gentlemen managers, the Senate is now organized for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

Mr. Manager LORD rose and said: Mr. President, we pray for the issuing of process against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, on the articles hitherto presented.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I offer the following order:

Ordered, That a summons be issued, as required by the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting for the trial of impeachments, to William W. Belknap, returnable on Monday, the 17th day of the present month, at one o'clock in the afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the proposed order; and it was agreed to.

Mr. Manager LORD. That is satisfactory to the managers.

The managers thereupon withdrew.

Mr. STEVENSON. If there is no further business I move that the court adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that is precisely the proper motion to make under the rules. I think we ought to adjourn until the day at which the summons is returnable; and therefore——

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont whether the counsel of General Belknap are satisfied with the period of time fixed for his appearance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to know whether there has been any conference with General Belknap's counsel to learn whether the period fixed for his appearance is ample enough to meet with their wishes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not authorized to speak for anybody but myself. Speaking for myself, I say, as a Senator sitting on this trial and as a judge, that I have not had and do not expect to have any conference with the counsel of General Belknap; but I have proposed this period of time as a reasonable and suitable one. Of course, when he appears, if he needs further time he will apply for it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I did not suppose there was any impropriety in the question, nor did I suppose that there was anything that could be implied by the question; but certainly a good deal of time may be saved to the Senate, and I see no impropriety in the managers, if they think proper, before the time is fixed, having a friendly interview with the counsel of General Belknap as to what would be a proper time. If we adjourn now until Monday week, and then ten day's more should be asked, we shall lose that much time, which it seems to me might be avoided by some conference with the counsel of General Belknap. That was the only reason I made the suggestion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure the Senator ought not to have understood me as intending to reflect on the propriety of his question, but only as stating my own view of what it would be proper for me to do under the circumstances. I move that the Senate sitting for this trial adjourn until the 17th instant.

Mr. BOGY. Before the motion to adjourn is put I should like to make an inquiry; and I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to what I am about to state. I see by the twenty-fourth rule that the summons has to be returned to the Senate or to the court at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.; and this order speaks of one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn does not fix the time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has turned to a form, and that form happens to say twelve o'clock and thirty minutes, but the Senate has ordered changing that form which I thought it was convenient to do, and as it was merely a form I did not suppose it was necessary to make a separate motion on that subject to make the form say "one o'clock," in order that the necessary preliminaries from half-past twelve, usual on such occasions, might take place before-hand.

Mr. BOGY. That may be; I speak on this subject with very great modesty, for I really know nothing about it; but, nevertheless, the forms being given in the rule, I am of opinion that they are a part of the rules, and unless a very good reason can be given why the forms should be departed from, it may be that the very first step we take in this proceeding may possibly be wrong. The form is given in a joint rule, and it would be a very easy thing to conform to that form which appears to be a part of that joint rule as adopted for this specific purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not a joint rule, but a rule of the Senate. It is a form of the Senate rather than a rule.

Mr. BOGY. It is a Senate rule, nevertheless; and why not conform to the rule?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would have been very well to have made that suggestion before the order of the Senate had been adopted fixing the hour of one o'clock as the moment at which this accused person should appear. But if the Senate has adopted an order which is contrary to a form which it had previously adopted, I take it that the adoption of this order would, for the time being, override the form of the writ of summons fixing a different hour.

Mr. BOGY. I would suggest to the Senator is it not a rule? The form makes it a rule. Is it not so?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose that to be so, if the Senate, without objection, orders that a particular moment named in the rule shall be for a particular occasion changed to another moment, I take it that order making the change would be binding nevertheless. Certainly the Senate, in the presence of the managers, has ordered that this summons shall issue for this person to appear on the 17th instant, at the hour of one o'clock in the afternoon, which is, to be sure, a half hour later than the form of the summons names. So the present order of the Senate is that the summons go in that way; and until that order is reversed, I take it, it will bind the President of the Senate and the executive officers to follow it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn until the 17th instant.

Mr. BOGY. The suggestion I have made has not been disposed of. Perhaps there is nothing that the court can dispose of. Nevertheless it does seem to me that the form is a rule, a rule prescribed by the Senate for the government of the Senate when it sits as a court. This body in its capacity of a court has changed that rule. It may be altogether proper; I am not clear that it is proper. If there could be any way by which we could retrace our steps and conform to what appears to me to be a rule, because it is a form prescribed by the Senate as a Senate for the government of this court as a court of impeachment, and which we as a court perhaps cannot well change, it is a subject worthy of being considered, and I suggest that the matter be more thoroughly investigated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think it right to say to my friend from Missouri that so far from our inability to change the forms of procedure sitting as a court, as the expression is, when the late Chief Justice of the United States appeared, these rules having been adopted by the Senate before he did appear, to preside at the trial of Mr. Johnson, the President of the United States, he thought, and submitted to the Senate, that it ought to adopt these rules while we were sitting as a court, inasmuch as its composition was such that a new element was introduced into it on that occasion. And accordingly the Senate sitting as a court, or sitting for the trial of the impeachment, which is the same thing, adopted over again these rules as part of its orders. So I think there can be no question, judging from the previous consideration given to the subject, that it is perfectly competent for us to change or to modify these forms by any order that we choose to make sitting as a court. That was the general opinion at that time. Although it was thought by many Senators that it was quite unnecessary to adopt them over again merely because the Chief Justice, a new element, had come in, yet everybody agreed that it was competent to do it; and, out of respect to his wishes, it was done.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I understand it, the Senate have only fixed one o'clock as the hour for the return of the process. It seems to me we ought to adjourn until half past twelve o'clock, with a view to making the necessary preliminaries before that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, that is the time the rule provides we shall meet.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see that there is any difficulty. The summons calls on General Belknap to appear at one o'clock. That is not at all inconsistent with the rule; but the court is to convene at half past twelve o'clock for the purpose of making preliminary orders and arrangements. The action of the Senate thus far is in perfect harmony with the rules.

Mr. BAYARD. All that I have to guide my mind is the rules of the Senate on the subject. Looking at them, it seems to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri is entitled to a great deal of consideration. Rule 7 provides that—

> The presiding officer of the Senate shall direct all necessary preparations in the Senate Chamber, and the presiding officer on the trial shall direct all the forms of proceedings while the Senate are sitting for the purpose of trying an impeachment, and all forms during the trial not otherwise specially provided for.

There is in the twenty-fourth rule a special provision, according to my understanding, of the form of the summons to be served upon the party impeached, and that form requires the impeached party—

> To be and appear before the Senate of the United States of America, at their Chamber in the city of Washington, on the —— day of ——, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes after noon, then and there to answer to the said articles of impeachment, &c.

By Rule 9 it is provided that—

> At twelve o'clock and thirty minutes after noon of the day appointed for the return of the summons against the person impeached, the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary of the Senate shall administer an oath to the returning officer in the form following.

Then follows the form prescribed for the returning officer. The tenth rule provides that—

> The person impeached shall then be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment against him. If he appear, or any person for him, the appearance shall be recorded, stating particulary if by himself, or by agent or attorney, naming the person appearing, and the capacity in which he appears.

It seems to me, with all due respect for the superior experience of those who have heretofore sat in business of this kind, that the language of the rules is directory, and I cannot imagine any inconvenience or ill to follow from our following their language with precision. If the Senate has from any inadvertence or from any other cause fixed a time for the appearance contrary to that prescribed by the form contained in Rule 24, it seems to me that it is erring upon the side of caution if it follows the rule by amending the order lately made. I see no possible objection to the amendment of the order, and if it be fixed at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes of the afternoon of the day named for the return of the writ, then it will be in precise accordance with the form prescribed in Rule 24 and also in accordance with Rules 9 and 10, which fix the time of the return of that writ for the swearing of the officer as to the true service of the process and of the appearance of the party, either in person or by attorney. I think it is just possible that there might be a technical objection made to the hour and minute of the return of this service. It may not be one of substance; but even if of form, if it be necessary for the Senate then to pass upon it, certainly the necessity for passing upon it can be saved by an amendment of the order of the Senate as made just now.

Therefore I trust there will be a reconsideration of that order for the purpose of having an order made in accordance with the twenty-fourth rule. No harm can come, but much difficulty may be saved.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the President of the Senate whether it is not proper for us in the first instance, as a court, to adopt the rules of procedure by the Senate in cases of impeachment? It was the opinion of the Chief Justice in the trial which last took place in this Hall that while the Senate might as a Senate in its legislative capacity adopt certain rules in regard to impeachment, it was necessary for the Senate when sitting as a court of impeachment to adopt those rules as such court. Therefore I suggest to the Chair whether it is not proper for us in this instance to adopt the rules before we discuss any questions arising under those rules?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist upon the motion I made, that the Senate, sitting for the trial of this impeachment, stand adjourned until the 17th instant at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. BOGY. Before that motion is put I hope that this matter may be further considered. I intend to present a motion that the order which has been made, for the return of service at one o'clock, be amended so as to make the return at half past twelve.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That cannot be properly done without the presence of the managers.

Mr. BOGY. Why is it not proper?

Mr. EDMUNDS. And there is not the slightest need of it.

Mr. BOGY. I can see no reason for the Senator's suggestion. Any order made by a court can be changed by the court on a proper case being made out. I desire to present the question to this body in a proper way. The very limited discussion which has taken place upon the subject has tended to confirm me in the belief that we are departing, in the very first step we take, from the rules prescribed for our guidance. If the motion of the Senator from Vermont be insisted upon, I hope it will not be carried, so that I may make a motion to amend the order which has been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn until the 17th instant at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. BOGY. The motion I would make of course cannot be entertained if that motion is carried.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is so.

Mr. BOGY. I am extremely sorry that at the very first step the Senator from Vermont should be rather disposed to cut short and be curt about this thing. I desire no offense to him, and do not question anything he may have done. I am inclined to think we have committed an error; and the views expressed by the Senator from Delaware confirm me in that opinion. To dispose of this thing in that manner, I think, is not treating the subject, or those persons that do not agree with the Senator, with much courtesy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to make an observation, as all this debate is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that as different Senators were speaking, he supposed it was done by unanimous consent. The rule is explicit that there shall be no debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to state to my honorable friend from Missouri that I have not intended to be either curt or short, but after the subject has, by unanimous consent, been considered upon both sides of the views, it struck me that the simplest way of testing the sense of the Senate upon this question of half past twelve or one o'clock would be to make this motion. If a majority of this body are of opinion that we have exceeded our jurisdiction in making this order returnable at one o'clock instead of half past twelve, of course it will be their bounden duty to refuse to adjourn, and to send for the managers and have the order amended; but if they are of opinion that this court can change one of its forms by making an order inconsistent with it as to an hour, without violating the Constitution of the United States, then I take it the Senate will be willing to adjourn until that time. Making this explanation to my friend, lest he may have misunderstood the spirit in which I made the motion, I take my seat.

Mr. BOGY. I shall feel compelled under the circumstances to call for the yeas and nays upon the question, a thing which I have never done in this body before. I think we are starting wrong in this thing, and therefore I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of adjournment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll of Senators who have been duly sworn.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, as directed; and the result was announced—yeas 38, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Cockrell, Dawes, Dorsey, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wallace, West, Windom, and Wright—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Norwood, Randolph, Saulsbury, Whyte, and Withers—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Ferry, Harvey, Ingalls, Sharon, Stevenson, and Thurman—7.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment stands adjourned until the 17th instant at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. The Senate resumes its legislative business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2655) to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2822) repealing section 363 of the Revised Statutes, and the substitution of another section in lieu thereof.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 169) giving the consent of the United States to the county of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, to construct county buildings in Washington Square, in the city of Dubuque, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. No. 235) providing for the sale of part of the custom-house lot in Rockland, Maine.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following bills and joint resolution; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 58) to pay the First National Bank of Saint Albans, in the County of Franklin and State of Vermont, the value of certain United States Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agent of the United States and forcibly taken therefrom by raiders from Canada in October, 1864;

A bill (S. No. 682) to suspend the sale of the jail on Judiciary Square, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 575) for the relief of Charles E. Hovey;

A bill (H. R. No. 2143) for the sale of the arsenal and lot at Stonington, Connecticut; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 12) declaring the 14th day of April, 1876, a holiday.

ADMINISTERING OF OATHS.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, directed to inquire into the expediency of further providing by law for the administration of oaths in the proceedings of the Senate, and to report by bill or otherwise.

POSTAGE ON THIRD-CLASS MATTER.

Mr. HAMLIN. I now move, in pursuance of the notice which I gave the Senate a few days since, to take up the bill (S. No. 650) fixing the rate of postage on third-class mail matter, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section declares that mailable matter of the third class shall embrace all pamphlets, occasional publications, regular publications devoted primarily to advertising purposes or for free circulation or for circulation at nominal subscription rates, prices-current, catalogues, annuals, hand-bills, posters, unsealed circulars, prospectuses, books bound or unbound, book-manuscripts, proof-sheets, maps, prints, engravings, blanks, flexible patterns, samples, merchandise, sample cards, phonographic paper, letter envelopes, postal envelopes and wrappers, cards, plain and ornamental paper, photographic representations, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and all other matter which may be declared mailable by law, and all other articles not above the weight prescribed by law, which are not from their form or nature liable to destroy, deface, or otherwise injure the contents of the mail-bags or the person of any one engaged in the postal service. All liquors, poisons, glass, explosive materials, and obscene books or papers shall be excluded from the mails.

Section 2 provides that packages of matter of the third class shall not exceed four pounds in weight and shall be subject to examination and rates of postage as hereinafter provided. The postage on mail matter of the third class is to be for all distances of one thousand miles or less, one cent for each ounce or fractional part thereof; for all distances over one thousand miles, two cents for each ounce or fractional part thereof. Every package of the third class of mail matter is to bear the post-mark of the office at which it shall be mailed for transportation.

By the third section, postages on third-class matter are to be prepaid by stamps. If, however, the postages on third-class matter mailed at an office be less than the full amount prescribed, in cases where the sender is known he shall be notified of the fact and the amount of postage due be collected from him. In case the sender is not known, and where it has not been the evident intention of the party so depositing the package to place less than full postage thereon, the package shall be forwarded, and double the amount of deficient postage shall be collected from the party to whom it is addressed or delivered at its proper destination.

Section 4 provides that the sender of any article of the third class of mail matter may write his or her name and address therein or on the outside thereof, with the word "from" above or preceding the same, or may write briefly or print on any package the number and names of the articles inclosed. Publishers of newspapers and periodicals may print on the wrappers of newspapers or magazines sent from the office of publication to regular subscribers the time to which subscription therefor has been paid.

Section 5 provides that transient newspapers and magazines shall be admitted to, and transmitted in, the mails at the rate of one cent for every three ounces or fractional part thereof, and one cent for each two additional ounces or fractional part thereof.

By section 6 the act is to take effect on and after the 1st day of July, 1876.

Mr. HAMLIN. I submit a formal amendment to the bill. After the word "sender,' in line 6, section 3, I move to insert:

Before the same shall be transmitted by mail.

So that, if amended, that portion of the section will read:

If, however, the postage on third-class matter mailed at an office shall be less than the full amount above prescribed, in cases where the sender is known such sender shall be notified of the fact and the amount of postage due shall be collected from such sender before the same shall be transmitted by mail.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. Before the Senator from Maine explains the bill, I wish to ask whether the words in lines 13 and 14 of the first section, "and all other matter which may be declared mailable by law," do not really make all mailable matter come within the third class?

Mr. HAMLIN. Only within that specified in the third class. That is the design.

Mr. THURMAN. It seems to me that the language should be changed, then.

Mr. HAMLIN. The caption of the bill, as the Senator will see, has reference to third-class matter. It may be made more certain, however, by inserting the words "third class." That is precisely what it does mean.

Mr. THURMAN. It seems to me it should read, "declared mailable by law as third-class matter."

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no objection to that amendment. I think that is precisely what the section means, but let that be added.

Mr. SHERMAN. After the word "other" put in "third-class."

Mr. THURMAN. In line 13, after the word "other," I move to insert the words "third-class;" so as to read:

And all other third-class matter which may be declared mailable by law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOGY. I request the Senator from Maine to give way for a moment, that he may have the benefit of what I intend to say. I object to this bill because it raises postage pretty much in accordance with the bill which we passed last session.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. BOGY. This bill, as I understand, raises the postage on third-class matter; that is, it is raised by the distance. At the last session of Congress we raised the postage on third-class matter from one cent for two ounces to one cent for one ounce. I opposed that bill at the time, but yet there was not much said upon the subject. My wish is to return to the old law, and I make these remarks now that the Senator from Maine, who is, I admit, remarkably well versed in the subject of the post-office and mail transportation, may have the benefit of my objection. He may be able to satisfy me that I am wrong. If there be a good reason why the postage should be raised, I of course will accede to it, and it will receive my vote. We raised the postage at the last session. I know that in my section, and I may say throughout the entire western country, it has been the cause of very great dissatisfaction. I make these objections now so that my friend may have the full benefit of them, and be able to answer them.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to make one inquiry before the Senator from Maine proceeds. An amendment was offered to the thirteenth line of the first section by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and accepted by the chairman of the committee. It has occurred to me—I do not know that I am right, and I make inquiry for that reason—that this section prescribes what matter is third-class matter. It sets out in detail the matter which is third-class matter. The amendment makes it read, "and all other third-class matter." How can there be any other third-class matter than what is provided for in this section? Was not the amendment contemplated by the Senator from Ohio to be that all other matter, the rate of postage upon which is not otherwise prescribed, shall be as herein prescribed?

Mr. THURMAN. The idea that struck me in suggesting an amendment was that the effect of the words "and all other matter which may be declared mailable by law" would be to make everything third-class matter. Therefore I suggested to add after the word "law" the words "as third-class matter;" so as to read:

And all other matter which may be declared mailable by law as third-class matter.

Upon the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] I agreed to insert the words "third class" after the word "other;" but upon looking more carefully at it, and hearing what the Senator from Iowa has said, I think the amendment which I first suggested would be better, and then it would apply to whatever any future Congress might declare to be third-class matter

Mr. WRIGHT. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I would suggest that the Senator having the bill in charge may proceed with his remarks, that we hear his general exposition of the bill, and in the mean time we can have sufficient time to look at the bill and prepare amendments with more care than we can do now.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask to reconsider the vote by which the words "third-class" were put in after "other," in order that I may move to add after the word "law" the words "as third-class matter;" so that the section shall read:

And all other matter which may be declared mailable by law as third-class matter.

That would refer to future legislation, and it would be better than to put in the words "third-class" after "other."

Mr. HAMLIN. That is just what it is now; but the amendment can do no possible harm.

Mr. THURMAN. I think it would be very dangerous to leave it as it is.

Mr. HAMLIN. It can be transposed by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is simply to transpose the words to another place.

Mr. THURMAN. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. THURMAN. I now move to insert after the word "law," in the fourteenth line, the words "as third-class matter."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN Mr. President, I have not often vexed the ear, and I am quite sure I have not tired the patience, of the Senate, in discussing any of the various propositions which have been submitted to it for its consideration. I have known well that there were others who would do ample justice to all matters presented to us for our deliberation, and I have chosen to express my opinion upon all these various questions in the vote which I should give that determines the action of the Senate upon the proposition before it. I would prefer to do so now, but having been directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report the bill now before us, it becomes my duty to state as briefly and as well as I may the considerations which have controlled that committee and the facts and evidence upon which they have acted. It is a delicate and a difficult duty. It is a delicate subject, because it affects the interests of so many in our community and thereby touches the pocket-nerve, which I think is the most sensitive nerve around the human system. It is difficult, because it embraces such a variety of aspects.

I am inclined to believe from the investigation which the committee have given to this subject that we may safely come to the conclusion that persons who are specially interested in a particular thing are not able to judge as well or quite as wisely as other parties who may not be controlled by their particular interest.

The committee have given a great deal of time and attention to this subject, and I must express my gratitude in being able to say that we come in our results before this body with an undivided opinion; we come here, after examining the whole subject, united in our judgment that action by Congress is demanded in relation to the postal service. If we had a full Senate here, I would invoke its attention, and I would say that it challenges their investigation and their cool and deliberate judgment.

We are presented with a peculiar condition of things. Two years ago the revenues of this Department were deficient in the aggregate more than $6,000,000. Last year they were deficient more than $7,000,000, and the Postmaster-General tells you in his annual report in December last that there will be a deficiency of more than $8,000,000 in the ensuing year. I say, Mr. President, that the deficiency in the Post-Office Department, if you reduce the postage on third-class matter to the rate of two ounces for one cent, will exceed $9,000,000 and probably reach $10,000,000. This is a matter that I have said challenges our attention. Here are deficiencies by millions in a year, and it will require but few years before these deficiencies will aggregate hundreds of millions of dollars. There is no question, there will be none that will be submitted to Congress during this session, of more importance in relation to the finances of the country than this bill or the subject with which this bill is connected.

The Postmaster-General has told us, after stating the deficiency at $8,181,602.19, that there is also an additional deficiency which is to be supplied by the Treasury of $850,000 to pay the postage of the Post-Office Department alone, and when I go to the estimates for appropriations by the other Departments I find that the Interior Department estimate for $129,750
The Treasury Department 150,000
The War Department 80,612
The Navy Department 20,000
The Department of Justice 5,000
The Executive 600
And the Bureau of Agriculture 10,000

Making 345,962

Add this to the estimated deficiency for the Post-Office Department, and you have the aggregate of $9,377,564.19. The committee in considering this subject have acted under a resolution of the Senate submitted by my colleague, December 8, 1875, and which is in these words:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws in relation to the postal service of the United States as to produce an annual revenue adequate to the support of said service.

The committee had also before it the law passed at the last session of Congress as an amendment, I believe, submitted on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] directing—

That the Postmaster-General shall cause a full inquiry and investigation to be made into all branches of the expenditure of the Post-Office Department, with a view to reduce such expenditures as nearly as practicable to the postal receipts; and with that purpose he shall report to the first session of the next Congress such a rate of compensation for postmasters and other employés of that Department as will reduce such compensation to a rate not exceeding that paid for equal service in private employments, and to limit the number of clerks and employés, and to reduce the number of free-delivery cities, and the compensation of postal transportation companies; and that he also report a rate of postage on printed matter and packages approaching the actual cost of their transportation and delivery, together with such practical measures that will, in his opinion, tend to make the Post-Office Department self-sustaining.

I will say here, in passing, that the Postmaster-General has complied with the provisions of that section of the law. He has sent to the other House a bill in relation to the compensation of postmasters and the employés. He has furnished to the committee of the Senate a communication relating to the bill regulating the postage upon third-class matter.

Such, then, is the basis upon which your committee have acted, first upon the resolution submitted by my colleague and second in the spirit of the law which was adopted at the last session of Congress.

In discussing these propositions I have to submit to the consideration of the Senate, first, what was the original object and purpose of the Post-Office Department; second, was it the design of its founders, as exhibited in the language which created it and the practice which existed under it for more than fifty long years, that it should be self-sustaining; and, third, what is the condition of the Department at the present hour and what are the evils which this bill seeks to remedy?

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Senator proceeds to discuss those points, I should like to ask him simply whether the bill he is now discussing has received the sanction of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. HAMLIN. It has. I have here the letter of the Postmaster-General, and the Senator has it also. Under date of February 8, 1876, he says:

In regard to the rates which are proper to be charged for miscellaneous third-class matter, which I have denominated "merchandise in the mails," I am decidedly of the opinion that the rates should be varied according to the distance. Thus applying the simplest rules of business, that the charge should bear some proportion to the service rendered, and is, in my opinion, the only way to prevent an increase of the already too large deficit in this Department.

Very respectfully,

MARSHALL JEWELL,
Postmaster-General.

If this communication were not before us, the question of the Senator from Oregon would have been improper, and one which I could not have answered. The Senator will see that his question is answered by the Postmaster-General. Senators will notice two distinct points made by the Postmaster-General in the extract which I have made from his letter: first, that the rates should be varied according to the distance; second, that it was the only way to prevent an increase of the already too large deficit in the Department, as bearing directly upon what I shall have hereafter to say.

Before proceeding to the consideration of the propositions which have been considered, I wish to make one further statement. The action of your committee has been made in view of other and different things than those which are connected either with the resolution of my colleague or the section of the law to which I have referred. We have looked at this question in a broader light and from a higher stand-point. We mean cheap postage. We claim to be the advocates of cheap postage; and that is what we are aiming at. There is nobody here from the millions asking that their rights shall be looked to; but there is not a petty manufacturer within all the broad land that is not either complaining by letter or through the newspaper press that we will not carry his matter as third class through the mail for half what it costs. The view of the committee has been this, and I state it distinctly, that, if Congress will wisely adopt a system of measures that shall make every article that goes in the mail contribute a fair, just, and equitable rate of compensation, based upon what it costs the Government to transport it, we will put letters to-morrow at two cents, and make our post-office self-sustaining; and when you do that, you accomplish an object that benefits the millions. I affirm that it is mainly in consequence of men who are particularly interested in special branches of industry, and who want to use the mail for particular purposes, and who do not pay the Government what it costs to transport their matter, that we are not enabled this very hour to reduce the postage on letters to two cents and make the Department self-sustaining.

What was the object of instituting our postal system? It is well, I think, to look at these things, and I am going to invite the attention of the Senate to what our fathers said and to the purpose for which this Department was instituted. I go back, because there is wisdom in it, and it is a wisdom that guided us for a long time, but have not adhered to as we should; I go back to the men who preceded the formation of the Constitution and who founded our postal system. I read from the Journals of Congress of 1775, that first established the postal system in this country:

As the present critical situation of the colonies renders it highly necessary that ways and means should be devised for the speedy and secure conveyance of intelligence from one end of the continent to the other:

Resolved, That Mr. Franklin, Mr. Lynch, Mr. Lee, Mr. Willing, Mr. S. Adams, and Mr. P. Livingston be a committee to consider the best means of establishing a post for conveying letters and intelligence through this continent.

Mark the purpose, "letters and intelligence." That was the object; and we will trace it along from that day down to 1851, when books were first made mailable matter; subsequently, by different acts, soldiers' clothes, boots, shoes, brogans, watches, jewelry, and all the catalogue of articles that come within the scope of merchandise got into our mail, and when at that precise period of time the mail system began to show a deficiency, which increased as you admitted these articles into the mail. Following along the Journals of Congress, in 1782 the first ordinance for regulating the Postal Department in the United States was passed, and in its very first words the object is stated for which the postal system was created:

Whereas the communication of intelligence with regularity and dispatch from one part to another of these United States is essentially requisite to the safety as well as the commercial interest thereof; and the United States in Congress assembled being by the Articles of Confederation vested with the sole and exclusive right and power of establishing and regulating post-offices throughout all these United States; and whereas it is become necessary to revise the several regulations heretofore made relating to the Post-Office and reduce them to one act.

I could illustrate this point by a great variety of references to the postal laws and to the opinions of men who have been connected with the Government in relation to the objects of the mail service, but I will not tire the patience of the Senate by doing that. There is in the mind of every Senator a well-defined idea of what the postal service was established for. It was originally established for the purpose of communicating intelligence. By the men who created it, the purposes for which it was created, were well understood; but I state again that in 1851 matter not pertinent, not legitimately mail matter, began to be admitted into your mails; and from that very date, as I will show you by the figures presented from the Post-Office Department, the revenues began in their deficiency, until they are now startling—$8,000,000—enough to support your Government within my recollection. And I say to you, Mr. President, and through you to this body, that we have but just trodden upon the threshold of that mighty store-house of merchandise which, if it is to go through the mail at half rates, will load it down, and you will find deficiencies within a very limited period of time that will more than exceed the whole revenues of your Department. Is it not a question that demands our attention, and demands a remedy?

I come then to the next proposition, Why should the Post-Office be self-sustaining; why any more than the State, Navy, War, or Treasury Department? I think the answer is as obvious and as clear as a mathematical proposition. Under the Constitution Congress has the power to establish post-routes. It might be that we should have done our duty and have complied with the letter of the Constitution by declaring what should be post-routes; but I think Congress has assumed more wisely that the necessary power to put mail service upon those routes was rightfully and properly to be inferred. They have inferred it; they have acted upon it. But the Post-Office Department is distinct from all the other Departments of your Government. You have none others like it. It was instituted for the purpose of giving both to the Government and to the people of this country the opportunity of transmitting social and business correspondence and intelligence from the one to the other through it. That was the object of it. It never was designed to be a source of revenue; it never was designed to be a tax upon the Government. It was no Department from which you could seek a revenue. It was a simple compliance with that provision of the Constitution which authorizes us to establish postal routes, to prepare the proper laws and instrumentalities for transmitting intelligence. I want Senators to bear in mind that that comprises only letters and what was current intelligence of that day.

You establish the State Department for the purpose mainly of superintending and regulating our relations with foreign governments. You establish your Navy Department to construct ships to protect your Government against foreign invasion, to protect your flag all over the world, to represent your country on distant seas. You create your War Department to provide arms and munitions for time of war and to make the preparation that shall be necessary when the sad hour for their use shall come. You organize your Treasury Department for the purpose of collecting your revenue and regulating your commerce. You create your Interior Department to supervise the industrial pursuits of the country and its internal relations, the Indians, pensions, and all other subjects that are necessarily a tax upon us. You create your Administration of Justice that the laws shall be administered. You create every other Department of the Government for the purpose of performing some functions appropriate, and I may say national in their character and in the duties that are imposed upon them both by the law and by the Constitution. You create your Post-Office Department solely to afford citizens and the Government opportunity to interchange one with another letters and intelligence. That was the original design.

The Post-Office being established for this purpose, the Government using it only as the citizen uses it, for transmitting its own information through it, what has been the practice of the Government? It has been recently stated in the newspapers that our Post-Office had never from its commencement been a self-sustaining Department in a single year. I called on the Department for the purpose of obtaining the facts, and I find that from 1789 to 1841 not one dollar was appropriated from your Treasury to support the Post-Office Department, but it was made self-sustaining. From 1789 to 1841 there was not a mill of deficiency in the Post-Office Department. I ought to qualify that, perhaps, by saying that if you run along over the various years you may find a deficiency one year of a small amount, with a small excess the next year; but no appropriation was ever called for, and up to 1841 no dollar had ever been appropriated from the Treasury for the purpose of sustaining the Post-Office Department. In 1841 what we would call to-day a very paltry sum, $482,657, was appropriated. I am not able to state precisely the objects of that appropriation, but I hazard the suggestion that it was to meet foreign and not home mail service. There were no other appropriations before 1852 for the relief of the Post-Office Department except, in 1846, $750,000; in 1847, $12,500; in 1848, $125,000—paltry and inconsiderable and aggregating nowhere near what the Government ought to pay for its own use of the mail. Therefore, I hazard the assertion that the Department was practically self-sustaining down to 1851.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator wants to be very exact, I have no doubt, and I am listening to his statement with pleasure; but I wish to remind him that before 1851 there was a permanent appropriation to pay the expense of carrying free matter, that ought to be mentioned. I do not know when that commenced, but I think it was as early as 1842.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not now the data before me which would enable me to tell the Senator precisely when it did commence, but I think it did not commence until 1852. That is my impression, but I am not certain.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will find out.

Mr. HAMLIN. In 1851 and 1852 the postal rates upon second-class matter were reduced about 66 per cent., and the restrictions upon the limitation of their weight largely reduced, and books were then first made mailable matter. Books communicate knowledge, I grant, but not current intelligence, for the transmission of which the Post-Office was established. How did they get in? I have some practical knowledge in relation to that, because I have been familiar with and aided in the admission of most of the articles that have gone into the mail as third-class matter. They all went in upon the general idea that, if your mail could carry other than the matter for which it was properly and originally instituted without a loss, it would be a convenience to the public, to the people, and a convenience that might be granted. From 1861 down to the present time article after article has been made mailable, until at last merchandise went in; and when you got merchandise in you might as well have put everything else out, because merchandise covered everything. Nearly every article that is enumerated in the third class to-day, with the exception of advertising-sheets, may be classed under the head of merchandise. They crept in; and it is from these sources, from the vast amounts of weight, from the expense which it entails, that the revenues of your Department have been falling behind, as I will show you under another head.

But I will go one step further in this regard. I say that every Postmaster-General from the formation of the Government down to this present time has recognized or recommended the general doctrine that the Post-Office Department ought to be self-sustaining, with one exception; and that exception establishes the rule. And, as most pertinent to this part of my argument, to invite the attention of the Senate to the opinions of some of the eminent men who have occupied that place, I will ask my friend from Massachusetts to read from the report of Postmaster-General Holt, a man known to you all, whose judgment, whose legal ability, challenge the respect of every man who knows him. He was Postmaster-General in 1859. We shall learn his opinions, and they support me in the position which I assume.

The Post-Office Department, according to the theory of its organization, should be self-sustaining, and, because of the peculiar character of its functions, should not be a charge on the common Treasury. In this respect, its aspects and mission are wholly unlike those of the other branches of the Government, and demand a corresponding principle of administration. The dispensation of public justice, the enforcement of laws enacted by national authority for the general protection, and the vindication of the rights of the Republic upon land and on the sea, are duties whose performance is of the very essence of our political system, and, affecting, as they do deeply, every member of the body-politic, they justly claim their support from the fund which is the contribution and property of all. But the transportation of a letter or newspaper or pamphlet for the citizen is no more public business than would be the transportation of his person or merchandise. It is an operation prompted by and performed in subserviency to a private, personal interest, and that interest, and that alone, should bear the pecuniary burden inseparable from it. The Government has charged itself with the establishment and superintendence of the postal system, because the peculiarities of this complex and widespread service rendered such intervention indispensable. The service, to be effectual, had to be clothed with an energy and power, and to enjoy immunities and the guardianship of a prompt and rigid accountability on the part of multiplied thousands of agents, which no private enterprise could possess; and hence the interposition of the Government became a necessity—a necessity, however, which, while it occasioned the intervention, also furnished its limitation. While it was thus essential that the system should be organized and supervised by the Government, it was at the same time entirely practicable to sustain it from the means of those for whose benefit it was established; and, therefore, it was not necessary that its maintenance should be imposed as a burden on the National Treasury. On the contrary, it was eminently just and proper that they, and they only, who used mails should pay for them, and that such payment should be exactly proportioned to such use. Were the support of the system charged on the Treasury, those who do not participate in its advantages would be equally taxed with those who do, and the farmer who dispatches a single letter a month would have to contribute as much as the merchant who dispatches and receives fifty per day. The gross injustice of this result is too flagrant to require exposure or comment. It was in obedience to this sentiment that a self-sustaining character was impressed upon the Department in its creation, and was long and most sedulously and scrupulously adhered to in its administration. The act of February 20, 1792, to establish the Post-Office and Post-Roads in the United States, declares that "the Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail of the United States," and "shall defray the expense thereof, together with all other expenses arising on the collection and management of the revenue of the Post-Office;" and to enable him to comply with this requisition, no other fund is placed at his disposal than that derived from the current receipts of the service.

* * * * * * *

In 1836 Congress provided that "the aggregate sum required for the service of the Post-Office Department in each year shall be appropriated by law out of the revenues of the Department.—Postmaster-General Holt's Report for 1859.

Mr. HAMLIN. In the year following, after Judge Holt had been at the head of that Department for one year, he expressed this additional opinion, which I will ask my friend to read.

Mr. DAWES read as follows:

The opinion is entertained more firmly than ever that the Department should be administered in conformity to the self-sustaining theory on which it was organized and faithfully conducted for forty-five years, and that every departure from this principle is deplorable in its tendencies alike to its honor and to the vigor and success of its operations.—Postmaster-General Holt's Report for 1860.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, if I were to take up the time of the Senate I could quote from the report of almost every Postmaster-General showing they have acted upon or recommended this principle; but I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts to read one or two additional extracts from one head of that Department, once a Senator distinguished in this body, whose counsels, in my judgment, it is always wise to follow—Judge Collamer, of Vermont.

Mr. DAWES read as follows:

It seems long to have been the received principle in this Department that its expenses should always be kept within the income furnished by postage, and all exertions at the improvement and extension of the service are to be limited to and fall within such receipts. The opinion of the community without the Department is believed to be that the General Post-Office, being for the dissemination of intelligence and advancement of business, is not a proper subject of taxation; that no burden for public service should lean upon it, and that the rate of postage should only be such as will pay the expense of the care, conveyance, and delivery of the matter on which the postage is laid. These views are in no way incompatible, and may both be successfully regarded, provided a reasonable compensation be made to the Department for the service it performs by those for whose benefit such service is required.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend from Maine will allow me, I will now refer to the law. I find an appropriation as early as the 3d of March, 1847, and there may have been some earlier than that. This is an appropriation for compensation to the Post-Office Department for mail service performed in the several Departments of the Government under the twelfth section of the act of March 3, 1847, $166,577.34. Then year by year that was increased until it was fixed by a permanent appropriation, I think, at $800,000. That law was repealed recently, when the franking privilege was abolished, but it is in harmony with the argument of the Senator because it shows that a specific sum was estimated for by the Department each year, varying year by year, in order to pay for the services rendered by the Post-Office Department to other Departments of the Government.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is in harmony with the precise line of argument which I have laid down. This action of Congress was predicated upon the simple idea that there should be an annual appropriation from the Treasury to compensate for the use which the Government makes of the mail. They should pay for its use as the citizen pays, and there should be an annual appropriation.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is, the Government should pay like other people.

Mr. HAMLIN. Like other people. I have already shown that the estimates for the coming year are about $1,200,000 to pay the postage of the Departments.

I was referring to the views of different Postmasters-General. I have given you those of two eminent men, well known by nearly all of us: Judge Collamer and Judge Holt. Let me now present extracts from the reports of other heads of this Department. In the report for 1843 Postmaster-General Wickliffe says:

I concur in the correctness and justice of the position that the Post-Office Department should not be regarded as a source of revenue to the Government; that if its receipts were greater than its expenditures the rates of postage should be reduced, and the annual surplus, if any, should not be carried into the Treasury.

It seems to have been a principle, at the foundation of the mail system of the United States, that the Department should sustain itself by its own income. Of the soundness of this principle I am fully persuaded, and should regard its abandonment as impolitic at any time, particularly at the present moment, when the national income is unequal to the ordinary demands upon it.

In his report for 1844 the same officer said:

For reasons obvious to those who founded the post-office system of the United States, the principle that it must sustain itself by its own operations was ingrafted into the first and has been adhered to in every subsequent act of legislation concerning the Department. While it has ever been required to sustain its own expenses, unlike the system in some other countries, it has not been regarded as a source of revenue to the general Treasury.

* * * * * * *

If the Department is to be continued under the control of the General Government, as it should, I cannot imagine any mode by which its expenses can be met more equitable, more just, than by the collection of as much postage, and no more, upon the matter which passes through the mail as will be equal to the demands of the service.

It is to the fact that the Post-Office Department has been compelled to rely upon its own energies and resources that its great and rapid extension and usefulness are mainly to be attributed.

The head of this Department, feeling his responsibility to the public, would not permit the service to expand without a correspondent increase in its receipts, which would at the same time furnish evidence of extended usefulness. His responsibility to the Government and a just regard for his own reputation would admonish him so to regulate the service that, while it gave the greatest possible benefits to the country, it should produce an amount of revenue equal to its wants.

In the report for 1848, Postmaster-General Cave Johnson said:

Under these circumstances, shall a further reduction of the postages be made? The means which a well-digested cheap mail system affords of a rapid interchange of ideas between different and distant sections of the country, and the consequent increase of knowledge; its influence upon society, but little, if any, less than that of printing; its importance to every interest, social, commercial, and political, would justify the answer that a lower rate of postage should be adopted, if it can be done without a departure from that principle heretofore maintained in the country, that this Department should be sustained from its own resources.

Postmaster-General Aaron V. Brown, of Tennessee, says in his report for 1858:

The Post-Office has of late years been made the instrument of accomplishing many things of great national importance not within its original scope and purpose of merely sending letters and newspapers from one place to another.

* * * * * * *

The exact principle of justice on this whole subject I conceive to be that, in conducting its ordinary business of transmitting correspondence, it should be thrown entirely on its own revenues.

Coming down to a recent period, Postmaster-General Creswell, in his report of 1869, says:

When I accepted at your hands the position of Postmaster-General, I propounded to myself two questions: How can the postal service of the country be made most efficient? and, How can it be relieved from the heavy deficiencies annually charged against it? Knowing it to be your desire that the Department should be restored to a self-sustaining condition as rapidly as a faithful discharge of its duties would permit, I have diligently sought the true answers to the above questions.

I have thus shown an almost unbroken current of opinion and judgment on the part of the distinguished men who have administered that Department that it ought to be self-sustaining.

Mr. THURMAN. If I do not interrupt my friend, before he leaves the question of the Department being self-sustaining, may I ask him whether, if you make the Department self-sustaining, you do not necessarily make the letters pay very much more than their fair proportion?

Mr. HAMLIN. We do that now; and it is a part of the design of the committee to reduce, as I said, the postage on letters to two cents. There is a surplus of between four and five million dollars now from the postage on letters; and I think social and business correspondence is entitled to as much consideration as anything else that can go through the mail.

Mr. MAXEY. I will ask the Senator from Maine to state if the whole of the surplus of between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000, created by the postage on letters, is not consumed by second and third class matter, and many millions besides? I wanted to get at the theory upon which the committee seek to equalize the rates of postage.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is precisely what I propose to do when I come to speak of the bill. I have been stating the object of establishing the Post-Office Department and the general idea upon which it was for half a century and ought now to be conducted. Now I come to the bill we have reported, which is in harmony with the doctrines I have laid down. In discussing this proposition I propose to show what is the existing condition of the Department; and in doing that I will answer both what the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Ohio have alluded to.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to ask him whether in response to his inquiries of the Department, and in the investigation of the committee, it was not shown that all laws anterior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution in 1787 had reference to carrying intelligence alone, and if that was not upon investigation shown to have been the law of Great Britain also prior to the adoption of that instrument?

Mr. HAMLIN. That is so; and I think it was very many years before Congress would admit a pamphlet into the mails.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will allow me, I think the statement is not absolutely correct; for in 1757 the British government provided for the carrying of samples of merchandise in the mails. It is not absolutely correct, but it is substantially so.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will state the fact precisely as I think the Senator from Massachusetts and myself understand it. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution I have stated the object and have quoted authorities to sustain my position showing the purpose for which the Post-Office Department was created. When we formed our Constitution, and put into it the clause to establish post-routes, we looked to England for the construction of what was meant by the language there used. From the information submitted to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, we find that nothing but letters were transmitted through the British mails except packages of merchandise weighing two ounces.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will allow me, they were samples; nothing but samples.

Mr. HAMLIN. They were samples and they were designated as samples. There is the authority by which we admitted, as we did in our first law, merchandise under the title of "samples of merchandise," corresponding with what was the practice of the English government.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I do not interrupt my friend, I wish to call his attention to a fact which was entirely unknown to me, and which will be perhaps of some information to him, that up to 1847 each Department and each House of Congress kept an account with the Postmaster-General of its postage, and it was paid out of their contingent fund. Therefore they went on the theory that every branch of the Government should pay its share of postage, each branch keeping its accounts with the Postmaster-General, and as that became rather inconvenient they aggregated it.

Mr. HAMLIN. They aggregated it. That is so. In that way we began. Before we aggregated it and made a general appropriation, I was aware that we had made specific appropriations, recognizing the doctrine by law that the Post-Office Department ought to be self-sustaining, and that each Department should pay for its own use as citizens pay precisely.

Mr. SHERMAN. Each Department to pay for itself.

Mr. HAMLIN. Each Department to pay its appropriate proportion.

Before proceeding to discuss the provisions of the bill before us, I deem it appropriate to allude to the amendment increasing the postage on third-class matter made at the last session of Congress, this being the first and only opportunity when I could appropriately do so. There has been, I think, great misunderstanding in relation to it. What are the facts in relation to that amendment? I will state them.

On the 18th day of February, 1875, the Postmaster-General communicated to the Senate a letter which I have here, printed, stating the condition of the Department, the vast amount of third-class matter that was being transmitted through the mail, showing that we were not receiving one-half of the net cost to the Government of transmitting it, inviting the attention of the Senate to that condition of things, and recommending "that the rate of postage on merchandise should be doubled; that is, the rate should be one cent for each ounce or fraction thereof, instead of one cent for each two ounces." That letter was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. They gave to it a careful consideration. On the 1st day of March the chairman of that committee presented to the Senate and had printed two amendments; first, one reducing the weight of third-class matter transmitted through the mail; the other increasing the postage. There has been a great cry that it was a measure in the interest of express companies. Who says that? The men who are seeking to put their hands into your pockets and into mine and then into the Treasury, and who are asking us to pay for transmitting their mail matter. It was a measure designed wholly, purely, and solely in the relief of your Treasury, to save the people from a taxation that never ought to be imposed upon them. That was the object of the amendments. No member of the Post-Office Committee ever heard any express company. No member of any express company ever approached that committee. With a view of relieving the Treasury and people from an onerous taxation that should never be imposed upon them, the committee considered the subject and obtained such information as was possible from the Department and from contractors carrying the mail, and facts of a very extraordinary character were presented to the committee. Upon some small routes where the mail was carried by a single horse the contractor was compelled to double his force solely to carry merchandise transmitted by mail. On other routes the weight of the mail became so much increased that the contractors were obliged to abandon the service. One most remarkable case was upon the route from San Diego, in California, to Tucson, in Arizona. There merchandise was transmitted by the ton. Large quantities of harnesses were manufactured in Massachusetts and transmitted in four-pound packages through the mail, and many articles of dry goods and groceries packed in the same way were transmitted at the insignificant rate of eight cents a pound from Massachusetts and New York to Arizona. The distance between San Diego and Tucson is about eight hundred miles, and the regular price of transportation by men who hauled it with their teams was sixty cents a pound. Upon this condition of things, presented in a variety of cases, it became evident to the committee that there must be some remedy. If the contractors should be able to continue their service, it was very evident that a large increase of the compensation would necessarily have to be made on renewal of their contracts. It could not be otherwise. The two amendments were therefore presented to the Senate to partially remedy this evil.

I may add here that information communicated to the committee during the present session of Congress shows that merchandise is still transmitted over various routes in quantities oppressive to the contractors and contrary to what it was supposed the law would impose. The Postmaster-General has been obliged to authorize the contractors upon some routes to leave quantities of merchandise to enable them to forward the letter and newspaper mail. Within a very few days past the contractor upon the route from San Diego to Tucson informed your committee that on a single day one hundred and sixty-five packages of merchandise of four pounds each were delivered to him for transportation upon said route.

I did not happen to be in committee on the day that the amendments were agreed to, and why? God never made a man who could be in two places at one and the same time. I was in the Committee on Foreign Relations doing my duty as well as I could. I was not with the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The two amendments were prepared and laid upon the tables of Senators; first to reduce the weight of these packages, and, that failing, to increase the rates. The then Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, (Mr. Ramsey,) offered the first amendment. The Senate refused to adopt it. Then my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] came to my seat and said to me, "Mr. HAMLIN, will not you offer the other amendment; it will show a little more interest on the part of the committee if the amendments come from different members?" I declined. Senator Ramsey had offered the first amendment as chairman of our committee, and I thought it would be uncourteous for me to offer it, and said so to my friend DORSEY. He went from my seat to the Senator from Minnesota and immediately returned to me, and stated that it would be highly gratifying to the Senator from Minnesota if I would offer the amendment. I said that if that was the case, concurring in the amendment, as I understood it related only to merchandise, I would offer it. I went to the Senator from Minnesota and he said it would be agreeable to him if I would do so. I said, "Very well; I will offer it." Now, I committed one error. I did not turn to the statute to see what was embraced in the third class. I did not think it increased the rates on transient newspapers and magazines; and they came so near the object of the Department for promulgating intelligence that I would not have included them in that amendment if I had so understood it. But I offered the amendment and it was adopted. That is the whole history of that amendment about which so much has been said. There was no catch upon the Senate. It was before the body for weeks. Everybody could understand it. Its object was to relieve the Post-Office Department from embarrassment and to increase its revenues.

Before considering the subject-matter of this bill, by direction of the Post-Office Committee I addressed a letter to the Postmaster-General, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, January 24, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to request that you will furnish the committee with such information as you may be able to give in response to the following interrogatories:

What are the relative proportions of the different classes of mail matter?

What revenue is derived from each class of mail matter?

What proportion of the expenses of the Department is justly chargeable to each class of mail matter?

What proportion of these expenses are chargeable to transportation?

What comparison is there between the revenue derived from and the expenses chargeable to each class of mail matter?

What proportion do the different articles of third-class mail matter bear to each other, distinction being made between transient printed matter and other articles of third-class mail, such as come under the head of merchandise or express packages?

Give the revenues and expenses of the Department for each year, with the amount of the deficiency or surplus.

Give the rates of postage that have obtained in the past years.

The answers to these questions should be as much in detail as the information of the Department will permit.

Respectfully yours,

H. HAMLIN,
Chairman of Committee.

Hon. MARSHALL JEWELL,
Postmaster-General.

In response to that communication the following reply was submitted:

During four weeks in December, 1874, a detailed statement was made of all classes of mail matter originating in fifty of the largest offices in the United States. This was followed in January, 1875, by a similar statement from two hundred and nine large offices.

These statements are the only reliable information that the Department has upon the relative proportions of the different classes of mail.

From these statements a table was compiled by the general superintendent of railway mail service, which is herewith submitted:

Tabular statement of the cost, revenues, and comparative profit and loss of carrying the different classes of mail matter for the period of one year.

Class of mail matter.	Total number of pieces of mail matter of each class originating in the United States.	Percentage of each class to the total of all classes.	Total weight of each class of mail matter originating in the United States.	Percentage of each class to the total of all classes.	Number of pieces of each class of mail matter to each pound.	Revenue from each class of mail matter in the United States.	Percentage of the revenue from each class to the revenue from all classes.	Revenue from each piece of mail matter.	Revenue from each pound of mail matter.	Cost of transportation, handling, &c., of each class of mail matter.	Percentage of cost of each class to the whole cost.	Cost of each piece.	Cost of each pound.	Total profit or loss on each class.	Profit on each piece.	Profit on each pound.	Loss on each piece.	Loss on each pound.

It is not claimed that this table is exactly accurate in all its figures. It is, however, as nearly so as it is possible to make it, and the comparisons as to the different classes of mail matter are doubtless very nearly absolutely correct. This is clearly shown by the following facts:

The information upon which the table is based was gathered from 258 fairly representative post-offices, from which about 50 per cent. of the entire revenue of the Post-Office Department is collected. The estimates from these actual examinations, compared with the actual facts so far as reported by the proper Bureaus of the Department, are found to be approximately correct. Thus: the total number of pieces of first and third class matter is shown by the table to have been 866,266,432, while by the official report the number of stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards issued for the same period was 905,451,305, leaving 39,184,873 pieces for packages upon which more than one stamp was used, which is believed to be about in accordance with the actual fact. The figures as to the weight of the matter are based upon actual weighing, and are almost exactly correct.

For the figures showing the comparative cost and revenue of the different kinds of matter long and searching examinations were made; and the deductions therefrom for the year, being compared with official reports so far as they exist, were found to be correct. The table, therefore, forms a proper and just basis for any deductions that may be made therefrom.

This table shows that the first-class mail matter consists of letters only, and that there was 629,185,386 letters transmitted through the mail for the year. Those letters weighed in round numbers (the table will show the exact figures) thirteen million pounds, and they constituted of the weight of the whole mail but 12.1 per cent. The revenues received from those letters were nineteen and one-half million dollars. The expense of transmitting, delivering, and everything connected with delivering these letters was $15,384,000, yielding a surplus revenue to the Government of $4,212,309.70. The fact is presented to us, first, that all the letters transmitted through the mail composed only 12 per cent. of its weight; that they paid 70 per cent. of all the revenue of the Department.

I pause here, Mr. President, to ask Senators why is it that social and business correspondence is not entitled to as high a consideration as any other matter that goes through the mails? I pause again to ask if we shall not exclude even other matter if it is to be a tax upon social and business correspondence?

I come next, then, to the second class, which is composed exclusively of newspapers and periodicals sent from the office of publication to the subscribers. It has been the policy of the Government—and I hold it to be a wise policy—to maintain and afford all the facilities for as cheap a transmission of newspapers through the mails as is possible and consistent with the just rights of all others. Newspapers were admitted into the mails, I think, up to 1851, at one cent within the State for every weekly publication and one and a half cents without. In 1851 and 1852 those rates were changed. Mark, again, the point I make. Those rates were reduced 66 per cent. Between 1851 and two years ago, 1874, the rates fluctuated, but were not materially changed. In 1874 we again reduced the postage on newspapers to two cents a pound, and on periodicals to three cents a pound, to actual subscribers; this was a reduction of 50 per cent., and allowed transient newspapers to go through the mails at a rate of one cent for two ounces, while the Postmaster-General tells you that it costs fourteen and a quarter cents to carry every pound of them, taking the long and the short distances together. What are the facts in relation to that class of mail matter? We find that there were over 155,000,000 newspapers and packages of newspapers carried, weighing 55,000,000 pounds, 50 per cent. of the whole weight of the mail carried, yielding a revenue of $976,000, while it cost the Government $7,969,000 to do the service, leaving a deficit of $6,993,000. In other words, while reducing your postage 66 per cent. in 1851 and 1852 and 50 per cent. two years ago, we are now called upon to contribute $7,000,000, as what? Plain, naked subsidy, and nothing else. You cannot make anything else out of it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question? Do I understand that that applies to newspapers and periodicals issued from the office and going into the mails from the press?

Mr. HAMLIN. I mean precisely those periodicals and newspapers that go from the office of publication to the subscriber directly. I have no controversy with the newspapers, and I approve of every proper criticism, but trust I am indifferent to that criticism which is improper and unjust. If we have not got a school of disinterested, benevolent philosophers here the world has never produced them and will never produce them. I want to make one comment upon the consistency of the newspaper press in relation to his body. I voted to abolish the franking privilege, and I did so consistently for years, because I wanted to get rid of it; but I think, and Senators will say whether I am right or wrong, that that result was produced by the clamor of the public press. With what consistency does that public press array you, Senators, for transmitting replies to communications received by you from your constituents, and which are as much official as communications received or replied to by the several Departments? They say "$7,000,000 to subsidize us, but not one mill to let a member of Congress transmit official communications between himself and his constituents." I have heard something said about consistency being a jewel; and what a jewel it is!

Mr. President, we have had the newspaper men before the committee; we have had the book men before us; we have had the publishers before us; we have had the card and envelope men before us. We have had the attorney of the express companies and who sought to exclude all merchandise from the mail. Your committee, shortcoming as it may be, have sought lights from every source possible. We have had them all there, but we have seen nothing so striking in transcendent benevolence as that which marks the newspaper press, that says, "Subsidize us at the expense of $7,000,000, but do not let a Senator send a communication officially between him and his correspondents." If the Senate shall adopt the views of your committee, if they shall join with us, there are other measures to follow this in the line of reform and in the line of retrenchment. I hail this as a common cause upon which we can all unite unaffected by partisanship. It is a common question in which we have a common interest, and in which your Post-Office Committee come before you as a unit.

We want to reform your Post-Office Department by reducing its tariff of compensation to some of its employés. A report was required of the Department, and they have made it to the House committee, and it has not reached us. We are ready to act when it comes. We want to reform the Department by providing against that sum which we are paying annually in excess of the cost by distributing stamped envelopes for letters and newspaper-wrappers. We want to reform the Department in every possible way; and I have thought that if we can have the candid judgment of the Senate, free from all influence from outside clamor that has mainly self-interest in it, we will reform that Department, we will put it in a condition which shall make it self-sustaining, and enable the citizen to transmit his private communication to the utmost confines of the Republic for two cents.

I come, then, to the third-class matter with which we are dealing. The table shows 237,000,000 pieces, weighing 42,000,000 pounds, being 38 per cent. of the weight of the whole mail, yielding a revenue of $4,658,000, and carried at a cost to the Government of $8,772,000; leaving a deficiency of $4,113,000 at the rate of one cent for two ounces. This, Senators will bear in mind, is composed of matter which has been admitted only as a favor and convenience, and there is a deficiency of more than $4,000,000, to pay which you must absorb the surplus derived from business and social correspondence or take it from the Treasury. This bill is designed to provide a remedy, and if adopted, then third-class matter will be sure to pay its own expenses. Shall this be done? What do equity and justice require? If you fix the rate at one cent per ounce uniform all over the country, there will still be a deficiency very near $2,000,000. Therefore it has been that your committee, and I think on the suggestion of my friend from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] agreed on two rates in the bill.

I ought to be a little more analytical. The first section states what shall be third-class matter, and provides that it shall pay at the rate of one cent per ounce postage for one thousand miles and two cents above. One cent per ounce will not cover the cost.

Now, there is a very severe criticism all over the country in relation to different rates. The world is coming to an end; nobody can tell where the thousand-mile line will be! Mr. President, the opposition on this point reminds me of the individual who on returning to his home solemnly affirmed that if his dinner was nicely cooked he would not eat it, and if it was not cooked he would give his wife a severe scolding. If we had fixed a uniform rate of one cent and a half, although it is objectionable to have a fractional part of a cent, the howl would have been, "Are you going to charge for transporting merchandise from one town to another, simply across a bridge, a cent and a half an ounce? It is outrageous!" Would a man making such a complaint ever allude to the fact that the same rate would allow him to transport it from my State to the State of California? No, not he. The complaint would continue to be made that you had fixed a rate that would not allow him to transmit it reasonably within a short distance.

I agreed with the committee. If I could have had my own way I should have had one more scale of three hundred miles within which I would have the rate half a cent an ounce, because the Government can do it for that; it is most desirable I know to have one rate; it is more desirable to have two rather than three. As a matter of convenience and as a matter of accommodation, and inasmuch as the Government could do the service within three hundred miles, I would have fixed that rate for that distance; but the committee thought otherwise, on careful consideration, and fixed two rates.

Now mark the criticism. I answer it here because it is all over the land, some of it unjust, some of it ungenerous. First, different rates are recommended, as you will have seen, by the Postmaster-General in the extract from his letter which I have already read. Second, up to 1851 we had five rates on letters and various rates and qualifications on newspapers, and there was not that woful degree of ignorance in our postmasters that would not enable them to execute that law; it was executed. And, what is a peculiar fact as applied to this matter which I denominate merchandise, that when you admitted into the mail in 1861——

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question? I do not know that I understand the point precisely. Is it that formerly rates were graduated on distance?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly. My colleague knows it as well as I do. I am not so much older than my colleague that he will not well recollect. He remembers as well as I do when he paid postage on his letters at five rates, according to distance; and that they were five, ten, twelve and a half, eighteen, and twenty-five cents. These men are now finding a good deal of fault because we propose two rates, according to distance. I find on turning to the statute that when you admitted merchandise into your mail you made rates for two distances—charging for fifteen hundred miles one cent, and above fifteen hundred miles two cents.

Mr. DAVIS. Will my friend allow me to ask him whether the rates he speaks of were for distances on all mailable matter, or only on letters?

Mr. HAMLIN. At that day we had not made such progress in the march of improvement as to admit all this stuff into the mail; there were different rates for newspapers, for letters, for everything that went into the mail, and when you put merchandise into the mail you provided in terms that it should pay for the first fifteen hundred miles one cent and above that two cents. Our amendment differs only that we fix the rate of one cent for one thousand miles and over that at two cents. That is all.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? He has not read the receipts and expenditures of the third class.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir, I have. I will read them again if the Senator wishes.

Mr. BOGY. Perhaps my attention was called off at the time.

Mr. HAMLIN. The receipts were $4,658,000; the expenditures $8,772,000, or, to speak practically, about one to two, leaving the deficiency over $4,000,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. The purpose of this bill being to graduate postage on third-class matter according to distance, why, if the principle be correct, should we not return to the old system of making the postage on letters depend on the distance?

Mr. HAMLIN. I answer the Senator; you make a uniform rate on letter postage of three cents for each half ounce or fraction thereof. The weight is so small that it does not constitute an element in the cost of transportation. You may therefore transport a letter across the continent for three cents; but when you make a uniform rate for packages of four pounds, the weight does become an element of cost; for in the compensation for transporting the mail $9,000,000 out of $15,000,000 is based entirely upon weight, and on the remainder weight is an essential element of the cost. If you were to exclude all the third-class matter there would be probably a reduction in the expenses of the Department equivalent to all the revenue received from that class of mail matter. But, besides that, there is the element of weight that enters into the transportation of the mail off the railroads. The man who transports it in his coach by horses estimates about what he is to take over the route and makes it an element. It adds to the handling; it adds to the official expense; for you will find in comparing the official expenses of the Department from 1851, when all this matter went into the mail at low rates, that all the branches of expense have run up pari passu with the increase of your mail, showing that every article you put in the mail calls for additional aid, labor, clerks, and transportation.

In transporting letters you may have a uniform rate. But what would my friend from Oregon do to-day as a business man?—and I am disposed to adopt the suggestion of the Postmaster-General, that the Post-Office Department ought to be conducted on business principles. What would my friend tell me? Can you carry four pounds two thousand miles as cheaply as you can one hundred? He will naturally tell me he cannot. I was for making more grades and more rates; but I agreed with my committee, because this was their judgment, and I am going to stand by such a good committee. I will not agree to change it. The reason why we adopted a scale of rates upon merchandise, and not upon letters, is because weight is that element which demands it in the one case, and does not in the other.

Mr. MITCHELL. The question is whether we ought not to apply a rule that would enable my friend from Maine to transact all his business, whether it has reference to letters or to first-class mail matter, for a certain rate that will operate differently on me because I happen to live at a distance remote from the persons with whom I am brought in contact in a different way.

Mr. HAMLIN. I answer again that the difference is so inappreciable that the Senator from Oregon must be a vastly better mathematician than I am to discover the fraction of it.

I want to state here that the fractional parts of letters for which the Government gets full pay enables it to collect $1.46 per pound for every pound of letters that it transports, while if every letter was of just full weight it would receive only ninety-six cents a pound. We therefore receive $1.46 a pound for transporting our letters through the mail.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? There are now three classes, first, second, and third. The third class embraces many matters that are not—I will use the word—homogeneous, pamphlets, publications, and many other printed matters which are put in with roots and scions and merchandise of every description. Now, suppose we keep in the third-class printed matter pamphlets, newspapers, &c., and make a fourth class, and put that class as far as possible at a self-sustaining rate, would not that be the way to obviate this great difficulty and relieve printed matter, which is called intelligence or information, from the burden of carrying merchandise?

Mr. HAMLIN. My answer to the Senator is that nothing enumerated in the third class is that kind of intelligence which was designed to go into the mail by its founders. It is knowledge, I grant; but it is not current intelligence or current news. They come within the category of merchandise. At most, all that can be said is that when you make an examination of each article named as third-class matter there may be a little difference of degree; but I will state to the Senator from Missouri that the best reason in the world requires that it should be there, because it imposes a tax on the Government to do a service for which it ought to be paid, and it cannot be done at any rate lower than that named in the bill.

Mr. DAWES. As the Senator has been interrupted, I hope he will permit me to suggest that there is another reason. There is no fractional currency so small as to make payment in it for each one of these pamphlets or transient newspapers at any less rate. To require any currency that we issue would make them pay a great deal more than they now do in this class.

Mr. MAXEY. I will ask the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to state, as there seems to be some misunderstanding, that the two rates for distance have no application whatever to first and second class matter, which is properly intelligence, but apply alone to the third-class matter, which is common-carrying business, and is regulated by the Post-Office Committee, on the idea that the rules of common carriers should govern that.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Texas is perfectly right, and I thought I had just stated to the Senator from Oregon precisely that fact.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand it only applies to third-class matter.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, perhaps I have detained the Senate longer than I ought; and yet there is one other consideration to which I wish to invite attention. Our mail is transported to-day over 70,000 miles of railroad routes; by post-coaches, single-horse wagons, and on horseback, 192,000 miles; and 15,000 miles by steamboat. If we had a postal service running all over the country by railroad, we could do this service; but such burdens as those imposed by the transportation of third-class matter cannot be performed by wagon or coach service, much less by horseback; nor can it be performed in any way at rates less than those named in this bill.

If there were nothing but railroads transporting this matter, and they run all over the country, weight would not be so important an element; but we must protect ourselves and the service. And here I want to say that it is the frontier settlements, it is the new States that are more interested in this question than the old. They have got their mail service; nobody designs to take it from them; but when you make the Post-Office Department a tax upon our Government, you must look for a curtailment of your service in the Postal Department, though that service may have been originated in the legitimate line and object of the Department.

Mr. President, I may be a little sensitive in this matter. I was an early pioneer in the doctrine of cheap postage; I am for it now; but I do not want a class of men to come in and crowd out the social correspondence of this country from the mail or make it tributary to the service which they receive. I aided in making third-class matter mailable; I am for keeping it there if it will pay the simple expense. It may be said the expense is more than it ought to be. I have no controversy upon that point. I wish it could be less. I know what the actual cost is; and, knowing that, I ask that it shall contribute to the revenues of the Department a just and adequate sum for the service which it receives.

If the Senate shall agree with the committee upon this subject, they will propose other remedial measures which I hope will enable us to arrive at the result which I have named. Individually I have no thought or care upon this question beyond that which attaches to me as a Senator. It is one of great and grave importance. If we will meet it as becomes us, with that intelligence which ought to belong to this body and with that manly firmness which ought to mark our course, I can see the day when we shall bring the Post-Office Department back to what our fathers intended it should be, to what it ought to be in principle, having a just regard to the rights of all. It is a matter which we commit to the consideration of your judgment, Senators.

We propose to abolish the governmental stamps, which give forty thousand office-holders a right to their use, under which all the abuses that ever existed under the old sytem of congressional franking sink into utter insignificance.

I repeat again, Mr. President, that perhaps I have occupied your time too long, and I now commit the bill to your good judgment.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not hear the whole of the Senator's interesting speech, but I heard much of it, and in the portion which I heard I did not understand him to state the amount of additional revenue which would be produced by the operation of this bill if it should become a law; how much of the gulf it would fill up; how much of the $8,000,000 deficiency it would prevent.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is a question which cannot be answered with certainty, because we do not know how much of the matter that would go in the mail at half rates will not go if full-paying rates are established. But I will say that, taking the letter of the Postmaster-General, who has gone into a detailed scaling of the price of carrying it various distances, I think these rates will pay; for whatever does go in the mail we shall get full rates. Less matter will go and we may have less revenue, but we shall have less to pay for transportation. But I will say, as a matter of opinion, that I believe when they find we are not to be driven to let all merchandise pass through the mails at half what it costs it will be used by everybody, and the amount to go will be much larger and the amount of revenue will be much larger.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it is a fair observation that even if we pass this bill we still leave the great cause of deficiency untouched; that is, the enormous cost of transporting the newspaper mail.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is one of the subjects which, if the Senate are disposed to adopt the ideas of the committee, we may present.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have heard most of the Senator's speech, and have been very much interested in and profited by it. I beg to ask him one question before he takes his seat, though I am sure he must be fatigued: Was there any special reason which moved Congress to admit merchandise into the mail at all; and, if there was, is there any reason why we should not carry through the mail six pounds or ten pounds or twenty pounds as well as four?

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the original reason for admitting merchandise in the mail was that of convenience. I never heard any other argument, and when it went into the mail, as I have already stated, it went in with the limit of twelve-ounce packages, at one cent an ounce. Now the deficiency has arisen by heavy packages at low rates. My friend from North Carolina may carry a given amount upon his shoulders and go off straight with it; but he cannot carry double as much. We may carry merchandise to a limited extent in weight in the mail, but we cannot carry all articles of merchandise. We cannot carry a hogshead of molasses very conveniently by mail. Therefore the limitation at first was twelve ounces. It was increased to four pounds and the rates reduced. But why were the rates reduced? Mainly upon the same argument that we reduced them on newspapers. We secured prepayment. Before that time prepayment had not been made compulsory; but when we changed the weight from twelve ounces to four pounds we provided for prepayment; precisely the argument made when we changed the postage on newspapers from the subscriber to the publisher and reduced the rate one-half on the allegation that we should get twice as much revenue, while the fact shows that we do not get as much.

Now, Mr. President, I leave the question for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. HARVEY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and eighteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 5, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MENOMONEE RESERVATION, WISCONSIN.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior in relation to the proposed legislation to authorize the sale of pine logs on the Menomonee reservation, in Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CHEROKEE INDIAN LANDS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the subject of taxes on lands belonging to the Cherokee Indians in North Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MONEY PAID TO NEWSPAPER WRITERS, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to House resolution of the 3d instant, asking for a statement of moneys paid to newspaper writers and others in the matter of whisky frauds in Saint Louis, Milwaukee, &c.; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Saint Louis Whisky Frauds, &c.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair inquires whether there is objection to the presentation now of bills on the Speaker's table for appropriate reference?

There was no objection.

BANKRUPTCY.

The bill (S. No. 332) to amend and supplement an act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SALARY OF PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The bill (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us pass that now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope this bill will be put on its passage at once.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let it go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RUSK. The committee can report it back at any time.

The SPEAKER. The bill cannot be put on its passage now except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let it go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. With leave to report at any time.

Mr. HURLBUT. The committee has that leave now.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill might as well be acted on at this time. I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking up the bill for consideration now?

Mr. HURLBUT. I object. I have no objection to its being referred to the Committee on Appropriations with leave to report whenever they choose.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. With leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The committee has that right at any rate.

Mr. RANDALL. Not as to a bill of this nature.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with leave to report at any time.

There was no objection.

CHAPTER 166, LAWS OF SECOND SESSION FORTY-THIRD CONGRESS.

The bill (S. No. 692) to amend chapter 166 of the laws of the second session of the Forty-third Congress was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HARVEY LULL.

The bill (S. No. 608) to enable Harvey Lull, of Hoboken, New Jersey, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of letters-patent for a self-locking shutter-hinge was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

SPENCER F. BAIRD.

The bill (S. No. 598) to authorize Spencer F. Baird, assistant secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, to receive from the King of Sweden a diploma and decoration, constituting him a member of the royal Norwegian order of St. Olaf, the same being a literary and scientific order, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CAPITOL AND NORTH O STREET RAILROAD.

The bill (S. No. 258) to amend the charter of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

BUILDING LAWS FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. STEVENSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be directed to inquire whether the building laws and regulations for the District of Columbia have been violated; whether any part of the avenues or streets of Washington have been appropriated to private use, and, if so, by whom and to what extent; and whether in the erection of dwellings or other houses in blocks or separately the laws and regulations to protect life and property have been observed; with power to send for persons and papers, employ an expert, and report at any time.

JAIL ACCOMMODATIONS FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. STEVENSON also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That the Committees for the District of Columbia of the Senate and House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire what additional jail accommodations are required and should be erected for the use of the District, and to make a joint report in respect to the same.

TREASURY EXPENDITURES FOR FUEL, LIGHT, ETC.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to furnish to this House an itemized account of the amount expended under the item of $300,000 appropriated by the act of March 3, 1875, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes," for fuel, light, water, and miscellaneous items, for buildings under the Treasury Department, together with a statement of the quantity of each article used and price paid therefor respectively, and whether said articles were purchased by contract or in open market.

Mr. O'NEILL. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question as to the form of this resolution. I hope the resolution will be answered in detail in reference to each post-office in the principal cities of the country as to the expense of each—that is, a detailed statement in reference to the New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and other principal post-offices. And while I ask that question, if he will permit me, I will state that in Philadelphia business men and merchants tendered to the postmaster of that city payment of the expense of keeping that post-office lighted during the night and during the day when needed. The very intelligent, active, and energetic postmaster of that city, Mr. Fairman, telegraphed at once to the Secretary of the Treasury to know whether he should accept that proposition. Of course the Secretary could not give him the liberty to accept that offer, but told him to act on his own responsibility. Intelligent, prompt, and active as Postmaster Fairman always is, in reply to the merchants he informed them the Secretary of the Treasury advised him that he must act on his own responsibility; and he did take the responsibility, as he always does in every proper way in discharge of the duties of his office to meet the convenience and wants of the commercial city of Philadelphia.

I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will insist that the expense of lighting and heating each one of these offices in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and other large cities shall be enumerated in detail when the Secretary comes to reply to this resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope he will do that so we may see how economically and efficiently the post-office of the city of Philadelphia is carried on, and that, too, while the postmaster there receives much less compensation than the postmaster of the city of New York, the latter receiving $8,000 a year while the postmaster at Philadelphia receives only $4,000. My question is, when will the appropriation be made available, as every day is important?

Mr. RANDALL. It is needless for me to say to my colleague that I am prepared to indorse all he may say in behalf of the efficiency of the postmaster of the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. O'NEILL. Of course I know it, and every one cognizant of the facts must indorse the prompt and energetic conduct of the postmaster of the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say on this subject that $300,000 was appropriated for these objects at the last session of Congress, and that was all the money estimated for by the Treasury Department. It comes now to be seen that in nine months the Department has expended for this purpose the entire amount, and requires, in order to carry them through the year, 25 per cent. more than was estimated for.

The object of the resolution is to know how this money has been expended; whether this fuel has been purchased in open market, or by contract as it should be; whether gas companies have been contracted with as private individuals sometimes do contract with them; and whether the water is paid for by the year, as water taxes in the principal cities generally are.

The committee on yesterday made this appropriation under a sort of duress, without full information, and without knowing certainly or not it was necessary in view of the manner in which the appropriation heretofore has been expended. We did not know whether this $300,000, which was all that was estimated for by the Department, had been expended properly or not.

By some contrivance this matter had been carried under the control of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and I am anxious to know—and I offer this resolution on my own responsibility—exactly how this $300,000 has been expended. Gas bills are usually paid by the month, and water bills by the year, and I cannot bring myself to believe but there is plenty of fuel in every one of the cellars of these public buildings to keep them warm.

The purpose of the committee was to insert this in the general deficiency bill, which we will be ready to report to the House to-morrow. There was no occasion to make a deficiency bill especially for this, any more than for the payment of witnesses. We propose to bring in the deficiencies in one general bill, as heretofore has been the custom.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will ask the chairman of the committee another question, if he will permit me.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL. I presume the House would allow the gentleman to offer a deficiency bill to accomplish the purpose desired in reference to these large post-offices and custom-houses in the principal cities of the country. Would it not therefore be well for him now to move an appropriation sufficient to meet this deficiency? Because one day's stoppage of the mails, the cessation of one night's work in the large post-offices, will lead to the greatest inconvenience and disadvantage to the people of the whole country. I know from letters received by me this morning that even the threatened interruption of the business in the Philadelphia post-office has been the cause of the greatest alarm among those having extended business operations.

Mr. RANDALL. I regret very much my colleague is in such a fright about this matter. I do not apprehend any danger myself.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not think my colleague ever does think of danger. I do not charge him with it.

Mr. RANDALL. I think by to-morrow we will have everything ready. The bill is really ready now, and only awaits transcribing. It is composed of a few items, and can be passed promptly. In the meantime I think gas and water will be furnished by somebody.

Mr. O'NEILL. Knowing the public spirit and readiness of Philadelphia business men, of course he knows that the Philadelphia post-office will not suffer either for gas or water.

Mr. RANDALL. That was very clever on their part. It was part of the "hurrah boy."

Mr. O'NEILL. It was not part of the "hurrah boy," but a part of the activity and energy of the business people of Philadelphia in behalf of every matter affecting the interest of the Government in their locality and elsewhere.

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HURLBUT. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is demanded, and the morning hour now begins at twenty-five minutes to one o'clock. The call of committees for reports of a public nature is now in order, the call resting with the Committee of Elections.

There were no reports from the Committee of Elections.

RECEIVERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. COX. I am authorized by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report back the bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes. This bill was recommitted to the committee and is now reported back with amendments. There are some merely verbal, and one is to strike out a section. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever any national-banking association shall be dissolved, and its rights, privileges, and franchises declared forfeited, as prescribed in section 5239 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or whenever any creditor of any national-banking association shall have obtained a judgment against it in any court of record, and made application, accompanied by a certificate from the clerk of the court stating that such judgment has been rendered and has remained unpaid for the space of thirty days, or whenever the Comptroller shall become satisfied of the insolvency of a national-banking association, he may, after due examination of its affairs, in either case, appoint a receiver, who shall proceed to close up such association and enforce the personal liability of the shareholders, as provided in section 5234 of said statutes.

SEC. 2. That when any national-banking association shall have gone into liquidation under the provisions of section 5220 of said statutes, the individual liability of the shareholders provided for by section 5151 of said statutes may be enforced by any creditor of such association, by bill in equity, in the nature of a creditors' bill, brought by such creditor, on his own behalf, or on behalf of himself and other creditors of the association, against the shareholders thereof, in any court of the United States having original jurisdiction in equity for the district within which any of the shareholders may reside or be found, or in which such association may have been located or established.

SEC. 3. That whenever any association shall have been or shall be placed in the hands of a receiver, as provided in section 5234 and other sections of said statutes, and when, as provided in section 5236 thereof, the Comptroller shall have paid to each and every creditor of such association, not including shareholders who are creditors of such association, whose claim or claims as such creditor shall have been proved or allowed as therein prescribed, the full amount of such claims and all expenses of the receivership, and the redemption of the circulating-notes of such association shall have been provided for by depositing lawful money of the United States with the Treasurer of the United States, the Comptroller of the Currency shall call a meeting of the shareholders of such association by giving notice thereof for thirty days in a newspaper published in the town, city, or county where the business of such association was carried on, at which meeting the shareholders shall elect an agent, voting by ballot, in person or by proxy, each share of stock entitling the holder to one vote; and when such agent shall have received votes representing at least a majority of the stock in value and number of shares, and when any of the shareholders of the association shall have executed and filed a bond to the satisfaction of the Comptroller of the Currency, conditioned for the payment and discharge in full of any and every claim that may hereafter be proved and allowed against such association by and before a competent court, and for the faithful performance and discharge of all and singular the duties of such trust, the Comptroller and the receiver shall thereupon transfer and deliver to such agent all the undivided or uncollected or other assets and property of such association then remaining in the hands or subject to the order or control of said Comptroller and said receiver, or either of them; and for this purpose said Comptroller and said receiver are hereby severally empowered to execute any deed, assignment, transfer, or other instrument in writing that may be necessary and proper; whereupon the said Comptroller and the said receiver shall, by virtue of this act, be discharged and released from any and all liabilities to such association and to each and all of the creditors and shareholders thereof; and such agent is hereby authorized to sell, compromise, or compound the debts due to such association upon the order of a competent court of record or of the United States circuit court for the district where the business of the association was carried on. Such agent shall hold, control, and dispose of the assets and property of any association which he may receive as hereinbefore provided for the benefit of the shareholders of such association as they, or a majority of them in value or number of shares, may direct, distributing such assets and property among such shareholders in proportion to the shares held by each; and he may, in his own name or in the name of such association, sue and be sued, and do all other lawful acts and things necessary to finally settle and distribute the assets and property in his hands. In selecting an agent as hereinbefore provided, administrators or executors of deceased shareholders may act and sign as the decedent might have done if living, and guardians may so act and sign for their ward or wards.

SEC. 4. That the Comptroller may, if in his judgment the interests of creditors or of shareholders of national banks which are in the hands of receivers will be promoted thereby, invest the money of such associations which may be on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, subject to the order of the Comptroller, in interest-bearing bonds of the United States, which may be subsequently sold by him, and the interest accruing on such bonds, together with the principal thereof, be distributed among the creditors and shareholders, with the avails of the other assets, as prescribed by law.

SEC. 5. That the last clause of section 5205 of said statutes is hereby amended by adding to the said section the following proviso:

"And provided, That if any shareholder or shareholders of such bank shall refuse, after three months' notice, to pay the assessment, as provided in this section, it shall be the duty of the board of directors to cause a sufficient amount of the capital stock of such shareholder or shareholders to be sold at public auction (after thirty days' notice shall be given by posting such notice of sale in the office of the bank and by publishing such notice in a newspaper of the city or town in which the bank is located or in a newspaper published nearest thereto) to make good the deficiency, and the balance, if any, returned to such delinquent shareholder or shareholders."

SEC. 6. That no association shall be liable beyond its common-law liability for the exercise of ordinary care to make good any deficiency, loss, or damage which may hereafter arise in any special deposit made with such bank for safe-keeping, unless a receipt shall have been given by such bank to the owner or person making such deposit specifying a different degree of care or liability.

SEC. 7. That all United States officers charged with the receipt or disbursement of public moneys, and all officers of national banks, shall stamp or write in plain letters the word "counterfeit," "altered," or "worthless" upon all fraudulent notes issued in the form of, and intended to circulate as, money which shall be presented at their places of business; and if such officers shall wrongfully stamp any genuine note of the United States, or of the national banks, they shall, upon presentation, redeem such notes at the face value thereof.

SEC. 8. That all savings-banks or sayings and trust companies organized under authority of any act of Congress shall be, and are hereby, required to make, to the Comptroller of the Currency, and publish all the reports which national-banking associations are required to make and publish under the provisions of sections 5211, 5212, and 5213 of the Revised Statutes, and shall be subject to the same penalties for failure to make or publish such reports as are therein provided; which penalties may be collected by suit before any court of the United States in the district in which said banking company may be located. And all savings or other banks now organized, or which shall hereafter be organized, in the District of Columbia under any act of Congress which shall have capital stock paid up in whole or in part shall be subject to all the provisions of the Revised Statutes and of all acts of Congress applicable to national-banking associations, so far as the same may be applicable to such savings or other banks: Provided, That such banks shall not be required to have a paid-in capital exceeding $100,000.

SEC. 9. That so much of section 553, Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, as authorizes the organization of savings-banks within said District, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In section 5, line 14, after "any" insert the words "shall be;" so that it will read: "to make good the deficiency, and the balance, if any shall be returned to such delinquent shareholder or shareholders."

Strike out section 6.

In section 8, line 12, after the word "said" insert the words "savings-banks or savings and trust companies" and strike out the words "banking company;" so that it will read "which penalties may be collected by suit before any court of the United States in the district in which said savings-banks or savings and trust companies may be located."

Mr. COX. This bill, reported unanimously by the Committee on Banking and Currency, was originally framed by the Comptroller of the Currency and sent to our committee. We had several conferences with the Comptroller in relation to it, and occupied several sessions of the committee in the endeavor to perfect it in accordance with what we supposed to be the practice under our national-banking system.

The committee, with the consent and approbation of the Comptroller, struck out the sixth section, or report as an amendment that that section be stricken out. It provides that no association shall be liable beyond its common-law liability for the exercise of ordinary care to make good any deficiency or loss on special deposits. The reason why we struck that out was that in nearly all, or I may say in all the decisions of cases referring to special deposits the courts have held that such deposits were not within the banking law; in other words, as the courts say, they were ultra vires; and a strict construction of the banking law settled all those litigations in reference to that matter, so that men who are suitors in reference to special deposits have their remedy at law, and must pursue it in the courts, without any further amendment of the banking law as at present existing.

The object of this bill is not to aggrandize the national-banking system in any respect. In its first section, however, it does give the Comptroller some power to appoint receivers, which he has not now, and that power is in the interest of liquidation, in the interest of closing up insolvent banks. I have a communication from the Comptroller, giving specific cases wherein he cannot now exercise that power by reason of the existing law. He asks for this amendment of the law in order that when banks do go into liquidation they may be honestly and speedily closed in the interest of the public as well as of the shareholder and the stockholders. In the second section——

Mr. CONGER. Before the chairman of the committee leaves the first section of the bill, I desire him to explain one point in connection with it. I wish to ask him whether the provision that a creditor may institute proceedings in any district in which any of the shareholders may reside, is a new provision of law?

Mr. COX. That is a new provision of law and received the approbation of the committee after a long and careful consideration of it.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman by discussing that point now, but I wish to be heard on it a moment when he is done.

Mr. COX. I shall have no objection to hearing the gentleman after I shall have made a short explanation of the bill. The first section, as I have stated, simply gives the Comptroller full power to appoint receivers in cases of insolvency properly ascertained by the courts, and in other cases, as the gentleman may see by looking at the section.

In regard to the second section, I am satisfied that the law now prevents a creditor from seeking, in his own name, a remedy under section 5151 of the Revised Statutes. That is perhaps the point to which the gentleman from Michigan referred, the remedy against stockholders and debtors of the banking association. We have undertaken in this bill to give the public that remedy against the party liable wherever he may be found. As regards the third section, I may say that certain insolvent banks have not paid their creditors in full. Six of them are reported to us by the Comptroller; three of them are now in receivers' hands for collecting assets. This section provides that when the creditors have been paid under section 5236 of the Revised Statutes the balance remaining after the distribution and satisfaction of all the creditors shall be paid over to the shareholders. That is the object of this legislation. The United States and its officers are relieved from all liability, and a settlement is made by the receiver of any bank that is in difficulty turning over the rest of the assets that remain after satisfying the creditors to an agent to be selected by the shareholders themselves.

The fourth section provides for the investment in United States bonds of certain assets which may be lying idle in the Treasury during the pendency of the litigation.

The Comptroller is authorized, if in his judgment the interests of creditors or of shareholders of national banks which are in the hands of receivers will be promoted thereby, to invest the money of such associations which may be on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States subject to the order of the Comptroller in interest-bearing bonds of the United States, which may be subsequently sold by him, and the interest accruing on such bonds, together with the principal thereof, shall be distributed among the creditors and shareholders with the avails of the other assets as prescribed by law.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Suppose the bonds fall below par?

Mr. COX. There is no danger of the bonds falling below par certainly in this country at present. It is satisfactory at least to know that the bonds while they remain in the hands of the Treasurer will be producing something instead of nothing in the interest of the creditors and shareholders.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. But he purchases the bonds not at par but at the market price, and when he sells them he sells them at the market price. Now if the value of the bonds changes 1 or 2 per cent. in value both shareholders and creditors suffer thereby.

Mr. COX. But the interest is accruing all the time. I think the gentleman's own experience will justify the providing of securities as provided in the fourth section. We have stricken out the sixth section, and I shall ask to have read a statement of the Comptroller in reference to that matter. But I have omitted to refer to one section here with reference to the stamping of counterfeit, altered, or worthless notes, which provides that all United States officers charged with the receipt or disbursement of public moneys, and all officers of national banks, shall stamp or write in plain letters the word "counterfeit," "altered," or "worthless" upon all fraudulent notes issued in the form of, and intended to circulate as, money which shall be presented at their places of business; and if such officers shall wrongfully stamp any genuine note of the United States or of the national banks, they shall, upon presentation, redeem such notes at the face value thereof.

That is not a new thing in this country, although it is new as applied to our national-bank notes. Several laws of the New England States formerly contained a provision like this. Such a law would prevent the circulation of counterfeit or altered or worthless notes, and if such notes should be wrongfully stamped the officer doing the same is required to redeem them at the face value. I am told by gentlemen from New England, and especially by gentlemen from Massachusetts, where a similar law prevailed in reference to the banking system of that State, that it works admirably, doing no harm to the bank, its officers, or the public.

In relation to the last section referring to the savings-banks of the District of Columbia, I ask the Clerk to read the concluding clause of the letter of the Comptroller which I send up with reference to that subject.

The Clerk read the portion of the communication referred to. [See communication printed in full at the close of the debate upon this bill.]

Mr. COX. I will now call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. FORT. I would venture to suggest an amendment to the first section, to insert after the word "days," in the twelfth line, the words "and that no valid appeal has been taken therefrom."

I suppose there will be no objection to that.

Mr. COX. The committee considered that very question, and voted it down unanimously.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to offer an additional section, to which I think there will be no objection, and then to say a word upon it if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. COX. I will hear it.

The Clerk read the additional section, as follows:

Any banking association may deposit in the Treasury any bonds of the United States or of the District of Columbia as security for deposits made in such bank, and the bonds so deposited shall be registered in the name of such bank and shall be held as security for the depositors making such deposits; each bank shall be entitled to proper certificates from the Secretary of the Treasury for the bonds so deposited, and the bonds may be withdrawn when it is shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that all deposits made on the security of such bonds have been paid.

Mr. COX. I am not authorized by the committee to accept any amendment. We are going a little out of the purview of this bill. I cannot consent to the admission of that amendment. I call the previous question on the bill. The bill is being matured for a special purpose, which requires a little urgency. I do not want it re-referred to the committee.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman to allow me a moment.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish the gentleman would hear me too.

Mr. COX. I cannot withdraw the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman stated when I interrupted him during his remarks that he would hear me when he had concluded. I wish only to refer to one or two points in the bill.

Mr. COX. I will yield to the gentleman for a moment, but not for an amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I speak on the merits of the second section of this bill. Section 5220 of the Revised Statutes says that any association may go into liquidation and be closed by a vote of its shareholders holding two-thirds of its shares. This bill says:

SEC. 2. That when any national banking association shall have gone into liquidation under the provisions of section 5220 of said statutes, the individual liability of the shareholders provided for by section 5151 of said statutes may be enforced by any creditor of such association by a bill in equity, in the nature of a creditors' bill, brought by such creditor on his own behalf, or on behalf of himself and other creditors of the association, against the shareholders thereof, in any court of the United States having original jurisdiction in equity for the district within which any of the shareholders may reside or be found, or in which such association may have been located or established.

Now, I submit to this House that this section is one by means of which, upon the vote of the shareholders that their bank will go into liquidation, any creditor may sue any and all of the shareholders, and may bring one, twenty, or a hundred suits in as many different districts against as many shareholders, before any notice is given to the public of this liquidation, and thus secure to himself, perhaps by collusion with the shareholders, the right to take all the avails which by the provisions of this law are given to the creditors. I think it is unjust to the creditor. I think there should be a receiver, and only a receiver to secure this amount for the benefit of the creditors, and not open the way for one creditor, perhaps by collusion, to secure all that might be obtained. That is my objection to this provision which is new and unusual.

Another provision of this bill to which I object is one which has been very fully discussed in this House in a former Congress, and was condemned by a large majority of the then members of the House. I refer to the provision which requires all United States officers charged with the receipt or disbursement of public moneys, postmasters, pension-agents, all officers charged with the receipt and disbursement of public moneys, to stamp or write in plain letters the word "counterfeit," "altered," or "worthless" upon all fraudulent notes issued in the form of, and intended to circulate as, currency. The power given to these thousands of officers throughout the country to write or stamp upon the note of the individual citizen, whenever it is presented to them for payment, the word "worthless," or "counterfeit," or "altered" is a power that never should be vested in any such officers, the power to deal with the private property of the individual citizen. To be sure this bill says that if that citizen shall go to work in a legal manner and establish by proof sufficient, and a decision of the courts that the particular bill so marked was not counterfeit, or worthless, or altered, then the officer shall pay him back—what? Not any damages for the loss of his property or for the expense he has incurred in proving it to be good, but shall pay him back the face value of the note.

Mr. LAWRENCE. There certainly can be no property in a counterfeit bill.

Mr. CONGER. No; but if the bill is good, and that private property of the individual citizen is stamped as counterfeit, or worthless, or altered, by any one of these thousand officers, who may not even be able to judge whether it is counterfeit or not, in order to recover the value of his property he must prove it is not counterfeit or worthless. When he has proved that, what is his remedy? Not damages from the officer having destroyed the use of his property, but only the face value of the note. I submit that that is a provision which should not be adopted by this House.

Mr. COX. As for the first objection of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to the second section of this bill, the House will understand that the law now, in section 5154 of the Revised Statutes, prevents the creditor from seeking in his own name any remedy against the stockholders, &c. This section is intended to give him his remedy in his own behalf or on the behalf of himself and other creditors of the association. It is therefore a protection to the creditor, and I think there is no danger of collusion, except the chimerical one raised by the gentleman from Michigan. That right now exists as to all other corporations, and why should it not exist as against national banks?

As to the other objection of the gentleman, he says the subject was once before this House and was defeated. So it was; but it was not lost by a large majority, as the gentleman said. It passed the House once, and was then reconsidered by a small vote. The provision has been well considered by the Comptroller of the Currency; nothing of harm can come from stamping a worthless or counterfeit note. If a note is wrongfully stamped the remedy is plain for the innocent holder. The experience of New England, as I have said, where there has been a refinement of this system of bank circulation in that regard, compels me to say, as it compelled the Comptroller of the Currency from his knowledge and experience to say, that this section is invaluable and should be incorporated in the bill. I now call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. COX. Before that question is taken I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD, as a portion of my remarks, the entire letter of the Comptroller, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. CONGER. I object; the gentleman has called the previous question, and let him abide by it.

Mr. COX. I am entitled to an hour after the previous question has been ordered. I do not propose to occupy that time, and in the place of remarks by myself I ask that this letter be printed in full in the RECORD.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

The communication from the Comptroller of the Currency is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, March 6, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant inclosing copy of H. R. No. 244, a bill authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes, for any suggestions which I may desire to make in reference to said bill.

Section 5239, Revised Statutes, provides for the forfeiture of the rights, privileges, and franchises of national banks for violations of law. Such violations, however, must be determined by the circuit, district, or territorial courts of the United States in a suit brought for that purpose by the Comptroller of the Currency. The section does not provide for the appointment of a receiver, either by the court or by the Comptroller, in the event of the dissolution of the association; and the first clause of section 1 of the bill introduced by you is for the purpose of remedying this deficiency in the Revised Statutes. The section also provides for the appointment of a receiver by the Comptroller whenever a judgment shall be obtained against any national bank and application is made to him for such purpose accompanied by a certificate from the clerk of the court, stating that such judgment has been rendered and has remained unpaid for the space of thirty days. The Comptroller is also authorized to appoint a receiver of a national bank when he is satisfied, from an examination of such bank, that it is insolvent.

Forty-four receivers have been appointed since the organization of the national-banking system: thirty-eight of these upon the protest of a circulating note, as provided in section 5234 Revised Statutes, and four for failure to make reserve good for thirty days after notification, as required in section 5191 of said statutes. Only two banks (the National Bank of the Commonwealth, New York, and the New Orleans National Banking Association) have been placed in the hands of receivers for any other violation of law, and in these latter cases receivers were appointed for certifying checks of depositors when the amount of money certified was not on deposit.

The law provides that receivers may be appointed when associations fail to pay up their capital stock or to restore the same when impaired; also, for failure to sell the stock of the bank purchased or acquired within six months from the time of its purchase; also, for failure to select a redemption agent; but no action of this kind has thus far been taken for such violations of law. Section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, provides for the deposit of circulating notes of a national bank with the Treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $9,000, and the withdrawal of the bonds on deposit as security for such circulation, and section 5222 provides that national banks in liquidation shall, within six months from the date of the vote to go into liquidation, deposit with the Treasurer lawful money sufficient to redeem its outstanding circulation and withdraw the bonds on deposit. A bank may therefore give notice of liquidation and deposit lawful money for the full amount of its outstanding circulation in the Treasury, after which its notes will be paid upon presentation to the Treasury. In such a case no protest of the circulating notes of a national bank can happen, and in any other case where a national bank is insolvent the stockholders of the bank can prevent the appointment of a receiver by keeping a sufficient amount of money on deposit with the Treasurer for the purpose of redeeming any notes that may be presented or by redeeming in legal-tenders any notes of the association which may be presented at its place of business. If an association shall fail for thirty days after notification by the Comptroller to make good its reserve of lawful money, a receiver may be appointed; but if an association should make its reserve good for any one of the thirty days included in the notice, then a receiver cannot be appointed. It follows, therefore, that shareholders of national banks, even if insolvent, can prevent the appointment of a receiver by the Comptroller, although the necessity may exist for such an appointment. The last portion of section 1 of the bill is intended to authorize the Comptroller to appoint receivers of national banks in all cases of insolvency of such institutions, and experience has shown that such a provision is necessary.

Section 5151, Revised Statutes, provides that shareholders of national banks shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such associations to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares; and the Supreme Court of the United States (Kennedy vs. Gibson, 8 Wallace, 505–6,) has decided that "it is for the Comptroller to decide when it is necessay to institute proceedings against the stockholders to enforce their personal liability, and whether the whole or a part, and, if only a part, how much, shall be collected. These questions are referred to his judgment and discretion, and his determination is conclusive. * * * This action on his part is indispensable whenever the personal liability of stockholders is sought to be enforced, and must precede the institution of suit by the receiver. * * * The claims of creditors may be proved before the Comptroller or established by suit against the association. Creditors must seek their remedy through the Comptroller in the mode prescribed by the statute; they cannot proceed directly in their own names against the stockholders or debtors of the bank."

In several cases of banks in voluntary liquidation a small amount of indebtedness remains unpaid. Under existing laws the Comptroller has no power to appoint receivers in such cases; but it is necessary under the decision of the Supreme Court for him to appoint a receiver in order that the personal liability may be enforced. If the creditors could bring a suit in their own name against the shareholders, it is probable that the amount of indebtedness in every such instance could be collected without the necessity of the expense of a receivership. If the bill under consideration should become a law, any creditor in his own behalf, or in behalf of himself and other creditors, might enforce the individual liability against shareholders of national banks.

By reference to page 104 of my last annual report, it will be seen that six insolvent national banks have paid their creditors in full. The affairs of three of these associations are, however, still in the hands of receivers for the purpose of collecting the remaining assets, and distributing them among the shareholders of the bank, as provided in section 5236, Revised Statutes. Section 3 of the proposed bill provides that, after all claims of creditors which have been proved shall have been paid in full, the remaining assets of the bank shall be placed in the hands of an agent appointed by the shareholders for distribution among them. Such an appointment would facilitate the settlement of the affairs of such insolvent banks, would save expense to the shareholders, and relieve the Comptroller from all responsibility in connection therewith.

In some instances the affairs of insolvent national banks become involved in litigation, and considerable amounts of money which have been collected remain on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States. Section 4 of the proposed bill provides that such moneys may be invested in United States bonds, thus giving the creditors of the bank the benefit of interest while such litigation shall continue.

Section 5205, Revised Statutes, requires that, when the capital stock of a national bank shall have become impaired, such bank shall, within three months after notice from the Comptroller, pay the deficiency by assessment upon the shareholders pro rata for the amount of capital stock held by each. It also provides that the Comptroller may appoint a receiver if such association shall refuse to pay up its capital stock or go into liquidation within three months after receiving such notice from the Comptroller. In almost every instance where an attempt has been made to enforce the provisions of this section it has been found that a small minority of the shareholders have refused to respond to the assessment. Section 5 so amends the act that such shareholders are required to pay such assessment, or in default thereof their stock may be sold for that purpose.

The laws of several of the New England States formerly contained provisions applicable to State banks similar to those contained in section 7 of the proposed bill. Such a law would prevent the circulation of counterfeit and worthless notes which had been once presented at the Treasury or at the counter of a national bank. If such notes should be wrongfully stamped, then the party stamping the same is required to redeem and be at the expense of sending such notes to the Treasury for final redemption.

Section 4 of an act to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia by general law, approved May 5, 1870, provided specially for the organization of manufacturing, agricultural, mining, and mechanical corporations. This act was amended by a subsequent act of June 17, 1870, so as to provide for the organization of savings-banks within the District of Columbia. (Statutes at Large, volume 16, page 153.) Section 9 of the proposed bill repeals this provision, so far as it applies to the organization of savings-banks. The first clause of section 8 of the bill provides that all savings-banks organized in the District of Columbia shall be required to make reports to the Comptroller at the same times and in the same manner as national banks are required to report. The second clause requires that all savings-banks having capital stock shall be subject to all the provisions of law which are applicable to national-banking associations, except that such banks shall not be required to have a paid-in capital exceeding $100,000. Only one bank is in existence in the District without capital stock, and that bank is organized under a special charter. Four other banks are in existence, two of which were organized with a capital of $25,000; one of which has a capital stock of only 50 per cent. of that amount paid in. The remaining banks are organized upon a capital of $200,000 and $50,000, respectively. The proposed bill provides that the first-named bank, having no capital stock, shall be required to make reports to the Comptroller, and that the four other banks, having capital stock, shall re-organize in accordance with the provisions of the national-bank act, except that their capital need not exceed $100,000.

The general corporation act under which four of these banks have been organized authorizes the organization of such banks without any restriction as to the amount of capital, and requires that 50 per cent. of the amount shall be paid in in one year and the remainder within two years, and that such banks shall publish a report annually, in some newspaper of the District, which "shall state the amount of capital, and the proportion actually paid in, and the amount of existing debts," which report shall be filed in the office of the recorder of deeds of the District. The act contains few, if any, restrictions which are applicable to such institutions. By subsequent legislation (Revised Statutes, § 323) the Comptroller is authorized to examine these banks and to report to Congress, if he deems advisable, the results of such examination. It is important that all institutions organized within the District of Columbia should be subject to the same restrictions as are provided for national banks, and that banks shall hereafter be prohibited from organizing under the general corporation act before referred to.

I inclose herewith a communication from the receiver of the First National Bank of Mansfield, Ohio, in reference to section 6 of the proposed bill. The receiver is of the opinion, as will be seen from his letter, that this section should be stricken from the bill. If, in the opinion of the committee, the adoption of the section would have the effect suggested by the receiver, it would, in my judgment, be better to defer legislation upon this subject for the present.

Very respectfully,

JNO. JAY KNOX,
Comptroller.

Hon. S. S. COX,
Chairman Banking and Currency Committee,
House of Representatives.

The question was then taken upon the passage of the bill as amended; and upon a division there were ayes 79.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. CONGER said: I think the House had better express its opinion upon a bill which I consider very dangerous.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COX and Mr. CONGER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 102.

Mr. CONGER. I am satisfied the bankers are too strong for me, and I will not call for a count on the other side.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, their Secretary, announced that the Senate was organized for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and was ready to receive the managers at its bar.

NATIONAL RATE OF INTEREST.

Mr. HUBBELL, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1226) to fix the legal rate of interest on national money throughout the United States at not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum and affixing penalties for its violation, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the bill just reported, instead of being laid on the table, be referred to the Committee of the Whole to be placed on the Calendar for future consideration.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HUNTER, there were—ayes 54, noes 56.

Mr. HUNTER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. The taking of the yeas and nays will consume a very considerable portion of valuable time. It certainly can do no injustice to let this bill go to the Calendar. I ask unanimous consent for that arrangement.

Mr. HUBBELL. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. We are consuming very valuable time over this matter.

Mr. HOSKINS. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUNTER] that he allow the question to be taken by tellers. It is so much quicker.

Mr. HUNTER. Let gentlemen who are not in favor of limiting the rate of interest to 6 per cent. put themselves on record.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, so that the House may understand intelligently what it is.

Mr. HOSKINS. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the question now simply upon referring the bill to the Calendar; not on its passage?

The SPEAKER. That is all. The proposition is that it shall be placed on the Calendar, instead of lying on the table, as moved by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] on the part of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. HUBBELL. I make this proposition to the gentleman: To allow the bill to go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUNTER. And make it a special order; otherwise it will never be reached.

Mr. HUBBELL. I cannot consent to making it a special order.

Several MEMBERS called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HUNTER. I think we had better take a vote on the question.

Mr. COX. Is it in order to ask the condition of the question?

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUNTER] to refer the bill to the Calendar.

Mr. COX. It is not generally understood, Mr. Speaker, that this is an adverse report from the committee.

The SPEAKER. It was so announced by the committee distinctly.

Mr. COX. I raise the point of order, then, that the motion to refer the bill to the Calendar is not in order after an adverse report and a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. HUNTER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and I insist that they shall be called.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to make the point raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. I tried to get the ear of the Chair some time ago to make the point.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to make it now.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no person or persons shall hereafter, within the United States of America, take, receive, reserve, or charge, directly or indirectly, a greater rate of interest than 6 per cent. per annum, which may be taken in advance for periods of three months or over, for the sale, discount, hire, use, or loan of United States notes, United States Treasury notes, United States fractional currency, national-bank notes, gold or silver coined by the United States or by its authority; and every person or persons who shall knowingly receive, reserve, or charge, directly or indirectly, a greater rate of interest than is provided as aforesaid for the sale, discount, hire, use, or loan of his or their money as aforesaid, composed in whole or in part of United States notes, United States Treasury notes, United States fractional currency, national-bank notes, gold or silver coined by the United States or by its authority, as aforesaid, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be fined in any sum not less than $100, to which may be added imprisonment in the penitentiary of the State or Territory where the case may be tried for any period of time not less than six months, within the discretion of the court or jury trying the case. Where it is not the first offense, imprisonment in the penitentiary shall be a part of the punishment inflicted upon the person or persons so convicted as aforesaid. And every direct or indirect means used or resorted to by any such person or persons as aforesaid to evade the provisions of this section, in order to procure a greater amount of money in the shape of interest, exchange, profit, or gain than is provided as aforesaid for the hire, discount, use, or loan of his or their money, as aforesaid, consisting in whole or in part of United States notes, United States Treasury notes, United States fractional currency, national-bank notes, or gold or silver coined by the United States or by its authority, as aforesaid, by using or allowing the same to be used in any other manner than in bona fide loans or discounts, at the rate of interest as herein provided as aforesaid, shall be prima facie evidence of a willful violation of the provisions of this section, and such person or persons so guilty of a violation as last aforesaid, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor as aforesaid, and, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished as provided in this section for punishing persons convicted of a misdemeanor. And the words "bona fide" loans or discounts, as used in this section, shall be construed to mean only such loans or discounts where the person or persons making or causing the same to be made parts with his or their entire interest in the money aforesaid, consisting in whole or in part of United States notes, United States Treasury notes, United States fractional currency, national-bank notes, or gold or silver coined by the United States or by its authority, as aforesaid, so used or allowed to be used by him or them as aforesaid, in making or causing to be made such loans or discounts as aforesaid, without any intention, understanding, hope, or expectation of receiving any benefit or profit therefrom, either directly or indirectly, except the notes, draft, bill of exchange, or thing of value received or to be received in exchange by such person or persons as aforesaid for such money as aforesaid, used in making such loans or discounts as aforesaid, at the rate of interest as herein provided as aforesaid. And every note, draft, bill of exchange, contract, or other evidence of indebtedness, which shall be knowingly made or executed for the purpose of being sold, loaned, given, discounted, or in any way exchanged, either directly or indirectly, for said money as aforesaid, consisting in whole or in part of United States notes, United States Treasury notes, United States fractional currency, national-bank notes, or gold or silver coined by the United States or by its authority as aforesaid, at a greater rate of interest or discount than is allowed by the provisions of this section for the hire, discount, use, or loan of money as aforesaid, with intent to evade the provisions of this section as aforesaid, the same is hereby declared usurious and absolutely null and void. And every person or persons who shall knowingly make, receive, hold, keep, or use any such note, draft, bill of exchange, contract, or other evidence of indebtedness, so made or executed as aforesaid, for the purpose of being used to evade the provisions of this section as aforesaid, or who shall knowingly use any such note, draft, bill of exchange, contract, or other evidence of indebtedness so made or executed as aforesaid, to evade the provisions of this section as aforesaid, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished as is provided in this section for punishing persons convicted of a misdemeanor. And every sale, exchange, or transfer of property of any kind, character, or description, whether real or personal, which shall be made for said money, composed in whole or in part of United States notes, United States Treasury notes, United States fractional currency, national-bank notes, or gold or silver coined by the United States or by its authority, as aforesaid, for the purpose, either directly or indirectly, of evading the provisions of this section, by enabling any such person or persons as aforesaid, by means of such sale, exchange, or transfer last aforesaid, to procure, either directly or indirectly, a greater rate of interest, discount, or profit for the use, hire, or loan of his or their money, as aforesaid, than 6 per cent., as aforesaid, such contract so made as last aforesaid shall be absolutely null and void. And every person or persons who shall knowingly make, execute, or receive any such contract as last aforesaid, or who shall knowingly advise the same to be made, executed, or received as aforesaid, for the purpose of evading the provisions of this section, as aforesaid, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished as is provided in this section for punishing persons convicted of a misdemeanor. And every person or persons who shall pay any money or thing of value upon any note, bill of exchange, draft, contract, or other evidence of indebtedness, made or executed for the purpose of evading or violating any of the provisions of this section as aforesaid, where a greater amount of money is paid or received as interest, discount, exchange, or profit of any kind, for the loan, discount, hire, or use of money as aforesaid, composed in whole or in part of United States notes, United States Treasury notes, United States fractional currency, national-bank notes, or gold or silver coined by the United States or by its authority, as aforesaid, all such money so paid, including principal and interest, shall be recovered back by the person or persons paying the same, and in case of his death, by his or their heirs or legal representatives, by suit at law in any court having jurisdiction, provided the suit shall be brought within six years from the time of such payment as aforesaid. The statute of limitations for all misdemeanors, as provided for in this section, shall be six years. It shall be the duty of every judge of the United States courts, within each State and Territory of the United States, at the opening of such court in each of said States and Territories, to specially charge the grand jury of such court to inquire into violations of this section, and to present indictments against all persons violating the same. In construing this section, the words "person or persons" shall be construed to include corporations, companies, and assoc ations of every kind and description, also attorneys, agents, and officers of such person or persons, corporations, companies, or associations. The words "legal representatives" shall be construed to include "successors in office" and "associates," when a corporation, company, or association is a party to any suit, as provided for in this section. The words "his and him" shall be construed to include "hers and her." Words in the singular shall be construed to include the plural, and words in the plural to include the singular.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Indiana on the table.

Mr. SPARKS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HUNTER. I object to the motion of the gentleman from New York. The yeas and nays have been called and ordered, and that motion comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the morning hour has expired.

Mr. COX. Will my motion be entered?

The SPEAKER. No, sir; it was not recognized.

Mr. CONGER. Can the call for the regular order interrupt the calling of the roll when it has been ordered?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the question goes over.

Mr. CONGER. There is a division going on upon a call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The process of division has not been reached.

Mr. CONGER. The vote was being taken, and a further vote was demanded.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour arrests further progress in this matter. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] is entitled to the floor upon the special order.

IMPEACHMENT OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

The managers appointed by the House to conduct the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, appeared at the bar of the House, when

Mr. LORD said: Mr. Speaker, the managers beg leave to report that in answer to the summons from the Senate they proceeded to its bar, and that the Senate has fixed Monday, the 17th of this month, as the day on which the process against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, shall be returnable.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN OFFICE TO WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to proceed with the consideration of the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 2677) to transfer the Office of Indian Affairs from the Interior to the War Department.

The motion was agreed to.

The Committee accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2677) to transfer the Office of Indian Affairs from the Interior to the War Department.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration has come from the Committee on Indian Affairs, receiving the votes of a majority of its members. I would say further, that this same subject has been acted upon by three important committees of this House, namely, by the Committee on Appropriations, who have reported substantially this bill, and, I am informed, agreed to that report with but one dissenting voice; by the Committee on Military Affairs, who have reported a bill now pending on the Calendar nearly identical in form and substance with this, and reported it unanimously, as I am informed; and, lastly, by the Committee on Indian Affairs, who have reported this bill as I have stated by a majority of that committee. I say this, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of directing attention on the part of this Committee of the Whole House to the nearly unanimous voice of three committees who by their actions are committed to the passage of this bill. I think I am warranted in suggesting that with three important committees of this House so thoroughly agreeing on a question as they have in case it should command the respectful attention of the members of this House.

This, Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, is a subject demanding careful consideration. It is certainly a very grave question. Indian affairs have very materially interested the people of this country ever since its settlement. Sir, think of it. It was only about two hundred and fifty years ago that the Indian was building his wigwam on the site of Boston; about the same period we find him bartering with the Hollanders for the sale of Manhattan Island, and less than two hundred years ago treating with William Penn for the sale of the site of Philadelphia. Within the recollection of men now living he roamed undisturbed over the whole of the State of Illinois, a State now containing a population of three millions of people; and within the recollection of men of middle age he was taking scalps within what is now the corporate limits of the city of Chicago, now containing half a million of people.

The Indian as civilization has approached him has gradually receded from it. It has failed to convert him, it has failed to hold him, to fasten or fix him, and as it has advanced he has receded. All of these changes affecting him in his relations to the civilized white man have been effected by a rapid process. A few years ago when the Indian was driven upon what is now known as the plains country, it was believed the Indian difficulty was pretty well settled. There was a vast expanse of territory, (and, by the by, not a very good territory,) and it was supposed to be beyond the range of settlement; but very shortly afterward California was acquired and our settlements began to grow on the Pacific coast. Emigration then commenced progressing from the west to the east, and still from the east to the west, so that to-day the Indian is confined within a territory of the United States bordered on the west nearly entirely by the Sierra Nevadas, and on the east by a line running somewhere from near the west end of Lake Superior southwesterly through to the Gulf of Mexico.

Now, the question is what is to become of him? This territory he cannot hold. This is not his territory. I think it is well we should be frank about this. We do not recognize it as his. Our emigration pouring in from the east is demanding it, and the emigration also coming up from the west demands it.

Now, what are his rights in and his relations to this territory? I understand our courts have decided his claim to be simply a right of "occupancy," a kind of "possessory claim." It is frank to say, Mr. Chairman, in this view of it, that the enterprising spirit of civilization is not only demanding this territory, but that this tide of emigration now pouring in upon it will have it. That is the living, practical fact, sentimentalize upon it as much as you please.

In that event, sir, what is to become of the Indian? In my judgment he has either to adopt the system and the habits and customs of civilized life and come within the rules and order of that life, or be trampled out of existence by this on-rolling tide of emigration and civilization.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Indian must give up his nomadic, rambling, wild life. He has to quit scalping and plundering, and he must be settled down somewhere in a fixed habitation and be kept there. This is to be done, I think, in the interest of humanity, (for he is human,) and done by the Government of the United States. Our people will not allow him to have a fifth part of our territory to roam over wildly and to commit his depredations upon our frontier. The frontier settler and the emigrant demand protection, and this Government is strong enough, and it must give them that protection. The Indian also demands protection and should have it, and the Government has the power and the will to give him that protection; but he must consent to be settled on reservations and be kept there.

Now, sir, in what I have stated thus far I meet with no opposition. There is a concurrence in these sentiments by those for and those opposed to this bill. Then how are we to accomplish that object, how are we to fix the wild tribes of the country upon reservations, feed them, clothe them, educate them, civilize and christianize them with the least cost and so as to insure the protection of the white man and of the Indian? How are we to do all this best?

The answer to this question, in my judgment, solves this whole Indian problem. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me ask, has the present system in the Interior Department, known as the "civil management of the Indians," or the "peace policy," as it is commonly called, been a success? Has it been efficient and has it been productive of no more cost than was absolutely necessary? In my judgment, it has been neither. It has not been efficient and it has been extravagantly costly. In arriving at this conclusion I must rely upon proofs. Of myself, I know but little of it; but, going to the proofs to see whether or not the system has been efficient of itself, I think it is demonstrable that it never could have succeeded at all without the aid of the Army; and, on the subject of cost, the men who control the Department themselves, as well as others, must admit its extravagance.

I have in my hand the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1875, in which he suggests that all of the transportation of supplies to the Indians (which is a large item) could be done by the War Department more efficiently. He says also that the War Department is better arranged to manage the whole question of supplies, purchases, inspections, transportation, &c., which make up the main items of the whole expenditures of the Indian Bureau. I call the attention of the committee to this report of the Commissioner for 1875, page 20, and ask the Clerk to read the passage which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

There is, however, a sphere of service now undertaken by this Bureau which might to its great relief be transferred to the War Department. The supplies of clothing and subsistence required to be purchased for the Indian service amount to about $2,000,000. Much the larger portion of this sum is expended in purchasing for the Sioux and several other tribes a few articles in large amounts. The Indian Bureau has never had an adequate appointment for making such large purchases and for transportation of the articles to the distant parts of the country. The Quartermaster and Commissary Departments of the Army have such appointments in complete organization, through which the War Department would be able to purchase, inspect, and transport the goods and supplies required to subsist Indians and fulfill the treaty obligations with much more regularity and system than is possible for this Bureau as at present organized; and, while a comparison of purchases made by the Army with those made by the Indian Bureau of the same article at the same place does not indicate that the transfer will on the whole tend to economy of funds, but rather otherwise, it will yet tend to allay suspicion, and will furnish checks and tests for ready application whenever charges of fraud in the service are made, either on good grounds or for partisan or selfish purposes or by persons of repute and acting in good faith who are themselves victims of such purposes on the part of others.

Mr. SPARKS. With reference to this matter of managing that Department of itself and its powerlessness to succeed in that, I quote also from the report of the board of Indian commissioners for 1874. Speaking of the effort made by the board or by the Bureau to manage the Indian Department purely upon the peace principle, they say:

The experiment was made in the belief that by the removal of what was regarded by the Indians as a standing menace in the presence of a military force their good faith could be relied on for the execution of the treaty stipulations entered into by them with the Government; it was not followed by a successful result.

Hence it may thus be seen from the report of the peace commissioners themselves that without the aid of the military they are powerless to contend with this grave question. The passage I have read is on page 3 of the sixth annual report of the board of Indian commissioners for 1874.

Again, I direct attention to a letter in the same report, on page 24, of Governor Potts, of Montana Territory, on this same point, namely, the inefficiency of this Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

In reply to your note I will, as requested, give you my views briefly upon the subject of the act of Congress of June 22, 1874. The present Indian policy, while successful in many respects, has failed to secure competent men as Indian agents; and, until better men are selected, the said act of Congress must remain a dead letter. The church authorities (unintentionally I am satisfied) have signally failed to select proper men for Indian agents, which failure has tended to impress the people unfavorably with the policy. I am quite confident I can demonstrate to the satisfaction of your honorable board that the agents generally selected by the churches for the Montana Indians have been total failures.

Mr. SPARKS. Mark, he says "generally selected."

The men selected may have been fair men at home, but they are without business ability or experience in the business world, and have little or no knowledge of men and things. Such men invariably fall victims to the wily machinations of corrupt sharpers that are always to be found around Indian agencies. It is apparent to me that unless better men are selected as agents the policy must be voted a failure in Montana.

The question with me, Mr. Chairman, is, how could it be otherwise than a failure? The very means by which these men are selected are sure indices that failure must result from their mode of selection. They are selected now by religious organizations; then formally nominated by the President, and also formally confirmed by the Senate. Does that system strike a sensible, practical business man as the one calculated to get efficient servants for the discharge of duties involving large money transactions and other grave questions of interest? I apprehend the religious organization will select the man having influence in his church, a good class-leader perhaps; a man who is of good standing as a church member, but who would prove a total failure when you apply the touch-stone of practical business life to him. Now, sir, the bill under consideration proposes to put the management of Indian affairs under the control of the War Department; and that, allow me to say, Mr. Chairman, is the special subject that I proposed in the outset mainly to discuss.

I am not the champion of the military. Its championship constitutes no part of my brief history. I have not been regarded by them or by those who are regarded as most favorable to them by any means as their special defender. But here is a grave and responsible subject-matter demanding service on the part of some Department of the Government; and the question occurs what Department of the Government can best discharge that service? Looking to the Treasury, looking to the general good, to the protection of the white man and the red man, to the civilization, enlightenment, and advancement of the Indian—in view of all this I favor this measure. But we are met here with the argument that this bill proposes to put the Indians entirely at the mercy of the strong arm of the military. "That if you mean war and the extermination of the Indians, your policy is correct," &c. "But that if you mean to civilize and make something of them, you must keep them away from the War Department," &c.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we propose frankly to meet these issues as well as all others connected with this subject. And here again we are compelled to rely upon the proofs. I myself, sir, I have had no practical knowledge upon this subject; but I will state to the committee that of over sixty officers of the Army examined by the Committee on Military Affairs and three civilians—am I right? [addressing Mr. BANNING, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs]—

Mr. BANNING. Yes.

Mr. SPARKS. All of them concurred in this transfer except one person; and, sir, as I must rely upon proofs on this question, it has been my desire to get the testimony of practical and competent men to advise me as to the direction that my vote should be cast upon it. The report of the Committee on Military Affairs upon our desks shows that of over sixty officers of the highest grade, none lower than that of colonel, and three civilians, there was but one voice against this proposed transfer; all of them except only one advocating it. I will also state to the committee that the Committee on Indian Affairs examined twenty-nine persons, or have, in the way of letters and examination, the opinions of twenty nine parties, twenty-seven civilians and two military men, (General Sherman, the head of the Army, and General Stanley,) and that out of these twenty-nine persons twenty-three of them advocated this transfer.

Now, when you take the witnesses that were before these two committees together, we have an aggregate of nearly one hundred practical and able men, disinterested, and seeking to give the best advice for the benefit of the whole country—the Indians included—and the almost unanimous voice of all of them in favor of this transfer, it seems to me certainly a very strong argument in favor of the passage of this bill. I will also state that in regard to the character of the civilians who were before the Committee on Indian Affairs, it was the object of that committee to select gentlemen of the most extensive practical experience on this subject—such men as General Denver, now in civil life; General Pike, an old pioneer, who for a great number of years has been experienced in Indian matters; and Mr. Sanborn, a very eminent gentleman from Minnesota, and many others. And then, sir, we made it a point to select as witnesses gentlemen in this House who represent territory bordering upon the Indian Territory. I would mention as among the gentlemen who appeared before the committee the distinguished gentleman from Texas, Governor THROCKMORTON, Judge HANCOCK, Mr. SCHLEICHER, and Mr. MILLS, of Texas: Mr. STRAIT, of Minnesota; Colonel GUNTER, of Arkansas; Judge WILSHIRE, of Arkansas; and the Delegates representing the Territories of Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico—Messrs. KIDDER, MAGINNIS, STEELE, PATTERSON, and ELKINS; and also two of the Representatives from the State of California, Messrs. PIPER and LUTTRELL, and the Representative from the State of Oregon, Mr. LANE.

We made a point to select gentlemen who represent districts bordering upon the Indian territories. Among all of these gentlemen there was a concurrence of sentiment in favor of the transfer, except Mr. WILSHIRE, of Arkansas.

Mr. YOUNG. If the gentleman will allow me, I will make an inquiry.

Mr. SPARKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. YOUNG. I would ask the gentleman how many Indians were examined before the committee and what their views were?

Mr. SPARKS. We had none before us. I found strewn upon the desks here a few days ago what is called an extract from the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in which the main argument that I presume is to be relied upon here by the opposition is presented. It is "that the control of Indian affairs under the military arm of the Government or under the War Department is to produce war." There are some novelties about this extract to which I beg the attention of the committee. I have in my hand the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs from which this document to which I refer is extracted. I prefer to read from the book containing the report (report of Commissioner of Indian Affairs, 1868) rather than from the pamphlet which is extracted from it. The author, N. G. Taylor, on page 8, says:

Our true policy toward the Indian tribes is peace, and the proposed transfer is tantamount, in my judgment, to perpetual war.

This pamphlet, placed on our desks and from which I have just read, is a letter of Commissioner N. G. Taylor, incorporated into the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1868. He was president of the board of Indian commissioners, and this pamphlet is a copy of his letter. He goes on in the letter to charge all the Indian wars upon the regular Army. He charges our wars with the Seminoles, the Sacs and Foxes, and the trouble with the Creeks and Cherokees, and the Cheyenne war, and the Chivington or Sand Creek massacre, and the Sioux war, and all the Indian wars upon the Army.

Now, in reference to this Mr. Taylor, I want to direct the attention of the committee to a report signed by that same gentleman. It was the report of a commission consisting of Mr. Taylor, Mr. Henderson, General Sherman, General Harney, Mr. Sanborn, General Terry, Mr. Tappan, and General Augur.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, and I will do it now, unless he prefers that I should wait until he gets through.

Mr. SPARKS. I will hear the question.

Mr. HEREFORD. Do I understand that this bill interferes with the present organization of the legislatures or judiciaries, or the rights, laws, privileges, or customs of the Choctaws, Chickasaws, or Creeks?

Mr. SPARKS. It does not change them at all in any sense.

Mr. HEREFORD. Not at all?

Mr. SPARKS. It would make an Army officer their agent, instead of the present agent; that is all. I now read from the report signed by Mr. Taylor, on page 48:

That there are bad men connected with the service cannot be denied. The records are abundant to show that agents have pocketed the funds appropriated by the Government and driven the Indians to starvation. It cannot be denied that Indian wars have originated from this cause. The Sioux war in Minnesota is supposed to have been produced in this way.

What? This man has just stated "that if you put the control of Indian affairs under the War Department you would have perpetual Indian wars;" "that all the wars with Indians had come from the military." Yet in this report, in order immediately following and signed by him and others, he says that "it cannot be denied that wars have originated from bad men connected with the Indian Bureau pocketing the funds belonging to the Indians," &c. He goes on to say that "the Sioux war in Minnesota is supposed to have been produced in this way." That is one of the wars mentioned by him as having been caused by the military. He says further:

For a long time these officers have been selected from partisan ranks, not so much on account of honesty and qualification as devotion to party interests and their willingness to apply the money of the Indians to promote the selfish schemes of local politicians. We do not doubt that some such men may be in the service of the Bureau now.

I presume this pamphlet was put upon the desks of members to influence the sentiment of the House upon this subject. It is a strong document, and, if you believe it, it would seem that to put the control of Indian affairs under the Army would lead to the destruction of the Indians. This Mr. Taylor, as I have before stated, is the author of that pamphlet, and yet he, with the full commission, says also as follows about the cause of Indian wars, on pages 48 and 49 of the report:

No governor or Legislature of States or Territories should be permitted to call out and equip troops for the purpose of carrying on war against the Indians. It was Colorado troops that involved us in the war of 1864-'65 with the Cheyennes; it was a regiment of hundred-day men that perpetrated the butchery at Sand Creek, and took from the Treasury millions of money.

In the pamphlet, the Cheyenne war and the Sand Creek butchery are mentioned as being caused by the Army. This report of the commission, and signed by Taylor, says that "it was Colorado troops that involved us in the war of 1864-'65 with the Cheyennes;" that "it was a regiment of hundred-day men who perpetrated the butchery at Sand Creek," that all of this hurrah is made over.

A regiment of Montana troops last September would have involved us in an almost interminable war with the Crows, but for the timely intervention of the military authorities.

That is an "Indian war" that would have been upon us, it seems, but for the "intervention of the military authorities."

If we must have Indian wars, let them be carried on by the regular Army, whose officers are generally actuated by the loftiest principles of humanity, and the honor of whose profession requires them to respect the rules of civilized warfare.

That is in the report signed by this same N. G. Taylor, who is also the author of this pamphlet which makes it appear an outrage and cruelty to put the control of Indian affairs in the War Department. It is just suggested to me by a friend that the Chivington or Sand Creek massacre (so called) was conducted by a minister of the Gospel. I do not know that that makes it any worse, but I hope for the sake of the prospect I may have for a better world that all the ministers of the Gospel are not like him.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. SPARKS. I would rather not.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I desire to make a statement.

Mr. SPARKS. Very well.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Mr. Taylor, to whom the gentleman refers, is a citizen of my State. I do not agree with him in regard to the transfer of Indian affairs to the War Department. What I want to say, however, to the gentleman is, that Mr. Taylor is affiliating with his own party, and was appointed Commissioner of Indian Affairs by Mr. Johnson.

Mr. SPARKS. What was the gentleman's question? I did not understand fully the point in the close of his remarks.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I propounded no question. I simply made a statement.

Mr. SPARKS. What was it?

Mr. THORNBURGH. The gentleman seemed to be making an attack on Mr. Taylor, and I only stated who Mr. Taylor was.

Mr. SPARKS. I do not know that I have made any onslaught on Mr. Taylor; he seems to have been making an onslaught upon himself. He charged in this pamphlet here, which the opponents of this bill have evidently circulated for the purpose of producing prejudice against it, that the regular Army have produced all the Indian wars. I then have shown from a report in order immediately following his letter, of which this pamphlet is a copy, that he himself with the other commissioners attributed the Indian wars to other causes, and that they wind up with the highest encomiums upon the military.

Now, sir, will it produce Indian wars to transfer the control of Indian affairs to the War Department? What is the inducement to war? If the control of Indian affairs is put in the War Department, why should there be Indian wars? Are these military men disposed to war with the Indians? Is there any glory in an Indian war? Is there any military capital to be made out of an Indian war? Do men risk life and reputation without some inducement? And now, sir, on this point I ask gentlemen to give attention to what is said upon this subject by General Sherman, (the General of the Army:)

The idea which prevails with some that the Army wants war with the Indians is not true.

That is the military way of putting it.

Such wars bring exposure, toil, risk, and privation, with no honor. Therefore it naturally wants peace, and very often has prevented wars by its mere presence; and if intrusted with the exclusive management, a control of their annuities and supplies as well as force, I think Indian wars will cease and the habits of the Indians will be gradually molded into a most necessary and useful branch of industry, the rearing of sheep, cattle, horses, &c. In some localities they may possibly be made farmers.

That is what General Sherman says about it. He also says:

The Indians can be cheaper and better managed by the War Department than by the Interior Department, because we have the Army at our command, the machinery which brings us directly in contact with the Indians themselves; and I contend that the Army is more kindly disposed toward the Indians than the citizens generally, and that if the country demands an extremely charitable treatment of these Indians it can be accomplished by and through the agency of the Army better than by and through the agency of those persons who approve more charity than we do, but do not, I believe, practice as much.

General Harney, a man of perhaps forty or fifty years' experience among the Indians, says:

I never heard of any difficulty being brought about by the Army. It is the whisky sellers and the Indian agents that make the difficulty. Indian agents go out there to make money and do not care about the Indians, but take care only of their own interests.

General Sheridan says on the same subject:

It has been my belief that if the Indians had been under the charge of the War Department, we never would have had any considerable wars with the Indians. I believe that if the Indians were in the hands of the War Department the Indian expenses would be reduced one-third or one-half.

General Pope, in answer to the question whether or not the transfer would conduce to war, says:

My answer to that is that there are no men in the country who are so emphatically peace men, so far as Indians are concerned, as the officers and soldiers of the United States Army. There lives are passed in that forlorn, desolate country, insufficiently sheltered, with nothing whatever of what is agreeable in life around them, and with the bare necessities of existence and shelter from storms furnished to them.

They are bound by every interest and consideration that can influence men to preserve the peace. A state of war means for them continual and harassing service. On the one side denounced by the worthy people of the East, who have but small understanding of the condition of affairs on the frontier, if they do anything to hurt an Indian, and denounced on the other side at the West by the western men if they do not hurt the Indians, they are of all men in the most unhappy and unfortunate condition. Peace to them means association with their wives and children. It means freedom from continual exposure and hardship; and it means what perhaps is quite as valuable to them, freedom from outrageous and unjust slander. There is, therefore, I say, no set of men who are more in favor of peace with the Indians and of preserving it and doing all they can to make it, than the officers and soldiers of the United States Army.

I take it, sir, that the proofs I have adduced and others which I have not taken time to present, together with this testimony taken by the Military Committee, and that taken by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and all concurring in the same sentiment, will certainly convince this Committee of the Whole House that, so far as regards the supposed danger of producing war is concerned, there need be no apprehensions of danger from this transfer.

But it is said, "that it will demoralize the Indian." Is it a fact that the transfer of Indian affairs from the Interior to the War Department will demoralize the Indian? This pamphlet which is being circulated here says that in this respect "the effects will be terrible." Again, sir, I must rely not upon the statements of sentimental philanthropists, men who live many hundreds of miles from the Indian country and who never saw an Indian; but, sir, I prefer to rely on practical men, who know something about this question, to tell me whether or not the influence of the Army over the Indians is any worse than the present system of managing them.

I refer to the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, published in 1874. This question was put to General Nelson H. Davis:

What is the character of the troops at the post you inspected? Have they or not a demoralizing influence on the Indians?

He answers:

My experience as to the influence of the troops upon the Indians generally is that it has been the reverse of demoralizing. The Indians have more respect for and they trust further in the troops than in any other people they have anything to do with. They have repeatedly asked, and have almost demanded, that they shall have officers of the Army for their agents. They say, [of the soldiers:] "You punish us when you are ordered to, but when you are not fighting us you are our friends; and you never cheat us, but give us what the Government sends us." That has been the case for years and years—for over twenty years of more or less experience among the Indians. As to any demoralizing influence exercised by the troops upon the Indians, if there is any charge or accusation of the kind, I think there is no truth in it, except that you may find an exceptional case where something has been done that you may call demoralizing or improper. If such be the case, a little investigation will perhaps show more bad results from other sources.

I next direct attention to the testimony of General Stanley. When he was upon the stand before the subcommittee on Indian affairs and was speaking of demoralization, this question was put to him: "Would that demoralization be increased or diminished by this transfer?" He answers:

I would say that the effect would be to diminish it; for the Army officer would not undertake to break up any connection that he found existing now; but if he was stationed as an agent he would prevent anything of that kind taking place, and, if necessary, would send a file of soldiers to drive off all those bad white men from the reservation. The Indians have more respect for a military officer than any other. They will leave an agent at any time to go to a commanding officer of a post for advice. The Indian respects a man that has power to make him respect him.

Mr. Chairman, I direct attention next to the testimony of Dr. Burleigh, formerly a Delegate in Congress from Dakota Territory, an old plains man who has had experience in the Indian country for many years. He says:

My experience goes to show that the morality, subordination, and advancement of Indian tribes, when controlled by officers of the regular Army, is equal, if not superior, to those same tribes when under the management of the civil department of the Government.

Among the Sioux, Ponca, and Winnebago Indians on the Missouri River, I feel safe in asserting that, of all the illegitimate Indian children whose paternity can be traced to white men, more than nine-tenths of the fathers belong to civil life.

How now, sir, about the demoralization?

Then on this question of protecting the Indian, giving him the advantage of education, &c., he says:

Schools and churches for the benefit of the Indians would be better maintained under military than under civil control, from the fact that the commanding officer has at all times the necessary means at his disposal to enforce the rules of government established for his agency, and the same is true so far as educating the Indians in agriculture and the mechanic arts is concerned.

On that question allow me to direct your attention to what General Hazen says. I ask the Clerk to read that which is marked from the testimony of General Hazen.

The Clerk read as follows:

There is but one justifiable course to be pursued toward these wild men. Place them in charge of the Army; compel obedience; and it can be obtained in no other way. The veteran officers of the Army know thoroughly the Indian character, and will not be deceived by them, nor will they wrong them, but know exactly what steps to take, and when and how to prevent outbreaks. At the same time, they are their protectors when desiring it. Then fast as practicable place humane men over them to direct and instruct them, and use all the humane elements of civilization to better their condition and make them self-supporting; but never give this purely moral element the leading place with the wild and unconquered, as failure will always follow. This is erecting your mill without a dam, your church without an audience; in fact, to do a good work before securing the materials out of which it is to be wrought. Here, coming after, never before, should be seen the Quaker, the philanthropist, the religionist, and all those moral forces that have for the past six years wrought so worthily and laboriously, but with so meager results.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SPARKS. I would like a few minutes more for the purpose of concluding what I have to say on this question.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the gentleman have his time extended for twenty minutes to finish his speech.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SPARKS. I am much obliged for the courtesy, and think that is as much as or more time than I will need. I have tried, sir, to make the point, mainly by reading extracts from these books, that the change of this Bureau from the Interior to the War Department would not conduce to war. I have shown by the testimony of men acquainted with the subject that it would not tend to any greater, if as great, demoralization than now exists under the present system, and that it would have a tendency to encourage civilization fully as well, if not better, than the present agents are able to give to that subject.

Now, sir, I propose to direct attention precisely to what this bill means. How are these Indians located and how situated? There are a great many tribes of Indians known to all of us who need no control of either or any Department. I would say that the five tribes in the Indian Territory certainly do not need any. I would further say that all the Indians in North Carolina need no control. If anything ought to be done with them, they should be put under State government, given in charge to the State. Those in New York certainly need no control. I apprehend those in Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota would be much better cared for if controlled under those States. These are peaceable Indians. These are men many or all of whom ought to be now put upon the standard of citizenship. Then I would mention a large class of Indians, in fact the great body of them so far as numbers of tribes are concerned, who need no restraint; no control further than to have an agent whose duty it would be to pay them their annuities, to have a general supervision over the affairs of the agency, and in that way protect them.

Now, sir, who can do that? Just grant, if you please, that the men appointed as they are now by the Interior Department would do it as well as the military officer, (but certainly no better,) I ask this committee, then, why not use the military officer when you have him? He has nothing to do; you have educated him; you now pay him; he can do this service, and why hire another man to do it? Answer me that. In all these agencies of peaceable Indians that I have mentioned, the agent would have no soldiers with him, no more than the present agent has. Is he going to demoralize them? Who is he? A captain in your Army, a major, a colonel; and is he not as moral and upright a man as Agent Saville? Is he not competent to receive so many thousand dollars a year in annuities, supplies, or money and pay it out to these Indians as well as any civil agent? If he can do so and as we already have him, and as he belongs to us, and we must pay him anyhow, why hire anybody else to do this service? Why not let him do it? Nay, sir, why not make him do it? We have plenty of them to perform this service. Sir, to tell me that the Army officer would be a worse man and less competent than the agents appointed in the way they are now appointed, is treating our Army with great disrespect as also the system under which it is organized.

Now, how do you get your Army officers? Young men are selected with great care, rigid examination mentally and physically is gone through with, and they are educated carefully at the expense of the Government. Their profession I have always thought, with their surroundings, made them a class of men certainly equal to the ordinary standard of professional men if not superior to it. If that be so, and you have fifty agencies where you want peaceable agents, and you have these men paid by you who have nothing to do, I ask why not give charge of these agencies to them? Why do you want to hire others to do it.

We are told that these men are not morally fitted for the discharge of these duties, and that their employment will have a tendency to produce demoralization. If that be the fact, I suggest, then, that you burn up and demolish West Point and discharge the Army. And it is said they would not civilize the Indian; that they would not educate him as well as the present agents. Why, sir, the agent does not civilize or educate anybody. The agent is merely there to dispense the annuities and to take general charge of the agency. Your teachers educate and your missionaries preach and civilize and christianize the Indian. The officer will do the agent's part as well as anybody else can do it, and it will be a saving to the Government in the simple item of pay to these men, as I have estimated it, of about half a million of dollars annually.

But there are some of these tribes that are wild. Now, sir, allow me to suggest that in every one of them they have already got the Army. Hence, if the Army is demoralizing it is demoralizing now, and you cannot get along without it. These commissioners in their reports all show the necessity of a military force in the country where the wild tribes are. If that be so, why not give the entire charge to the military and let them be your agents? At the agencies they will fill the places of the present agents, and then there is the power back of them and under their immediate control that says to the Indian, "Here is your reservation; we propose to feed and clothe you, to educate you, to civilize and christianize you; but you must stay at home and behave yourselves, for we have a force back of us to make you." I think that will be better, and it will save much cost. And, sir, the Army will be used only where it is now used. No more, no less. Under this bill we do not expect to use the Army except where we are using it now, among the wild and warlike tribes; but we do propose to supply agents from it, and the chairman of the Military Committee will tell you that you have a great number of Army officers qualified for that duty and having nothing else to do.

Will the Chair please inform me how many minutes I have left of my twenty minutes' extension of time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has ten minutes unused.

Mr. SPARKS. I hope to get through in that time.

I now wish to call attention to the last section of the bill, the section making provision for the protection of all the agencies that can be brought to bear upon the Indian touching his civilization and christianization. With my views and my sentiments with respect to these matters, I must say that I could hardly favor any proposition in which could be seen a possibility of an impediment being thrown in the way of civilizing, christianizing, and educational influences being brought to bear on the Indian. I am for this, and I think this bill makes provision for it better than has ever been made for it in any bill ever before presented to Congress. And I think that the educated, high-toned, honorable Army officer, colonel, major, captain, or first lieutenant, who is at his station with the power behind him to protect, will protect the missionary in his clerical garb and with his Bible and the emblems of his holy office in his hand in front of him. Sir, I would feel sadly out of joint with respect to the Army officer if I did not feel that he would do this. He will not be the missionary; neither is the present agent. He will not be the educator; and neither is the present agent. But he will be a gentleman and the official who dispenses the annuities, discharges the duties devolving upon that station, and gives countenance and protection to these agencies that are at work in front of him by persons chosen to educate, by farmers chosen to educate in agriculture, by mechanics selected to educate in the mechanic arts, by teachers selected to educate in books, and by missionaries who go there to prosecute their high calling.

This bill makes provision that all Christian organizations shall "equally and alike" have the right to be represented there. I will read section 9:

That it is hereby provided that all Christian churches shall enjoy a free and equal right to erect and maintain church and school buildings on any or all Indian reservations, and shall not be molested in their religious or philanthropic efforts to advance the Indians in moral, religious, and literary culture, but shall all equally and alike be perfectly free and encouraged in the prosecution of their christianizing, civilizing, and educational efforts.

I charge that your present system does not do that, and I am prepared to make the charge good. The Constitution of our country of course covers this. Under it there is no doubt that the missionary has the right to go anywhere and everywhere. But under the present Indian management these agencies or reservations are divided or parceled out among the Christian organizations by an arbitrary rule under which the religious teacher may go and exercise his functions as a missionary and erect school-houses and churches upon the reservation to which he is assigned, and not otherwise. Now, sir, I want to encourage these religious instructors to go into any or all of them,

I proposed that question to the late Commissioner of Indian Affairs in this city, the gentleman who occupied that position at the beginning of this session. He said to me that the system "did not preclude anybody from going upon the reservations and exercising his functions as a minister, but that it practically amounted to that." In a word, where a reservation was given, if you please, to the Presbyterians, Presbyterianism only was allowed to be taught in it and all others had to leave it alone. Now, sir, that will not do. He said that it "practically amounted to that." Why of course it does, and it must "practically amount to that" when the Methodists select their agents and have their particular reservations, or where the Presbyterians select theirs, or the Baptists, or the Quakers, or the Catholics each select theirs. What we want to do is to encourage all; and, if the Indian cannot be converted under the preaching of the one, I would like that they may have the opportunity of hearing and being converted by some of the others. I would like for it to be understood that all have the right to take charge of him; and let them all exercise their best influence upon him.

And on this subject I have here a letter addressed to General Charles Ewing by Hon. E. P. Smith, late Commissioner of Indian Affairs. It is in relation to the erection of a building for a Catholic mission-school at Standing Rock agency, Dakota Territory. He says:

You will understand, however, that the Government cannot surrender its control over any matter connected with the Indian service, nor commit the religious instruction of the Indians, except for a temporary period, to any religious or other body, but retains as trustee for the Indians all rights over the property and buildings supplied at public expense used for school or religious purposes, and reserves the right to change the religious and educational management when it shall consider such change desirable in the best interests of the Indians.

The Commissioner is doubtless an excellent gentleman, but perhaps with this power conferred upon him he would compel the Indians to take just what religion he prescribes or have none. Now, sir, this bill under consideration says that the reservations shall be free to all.

Again, here is another letter addressed by Ex-Secretary Delano to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in which he says:

Perfect freedom should be allowed to the Indian population to attend such schools and churches as they prefer, but the right should be reserved by the Indian Office and the Department, in case of difficulty or contentions in consequence of allowing more than one religious denomination to have schools and churches on the same reservation, to require one or the other to leave it, as in their judgment might be deemed best.

Sir, I demur to that. This bill makes special provision that the religious teaching of the Indian shall be free to all, and then, sir, if rivalries exist, let them exist, but let it be distinctly understood that the field is free to all to exercise their religious functions among the Indians. In my judgment, that, and that only, is the correct rule. I have no time to argue it, and in fact it needs no argument. Had I the time, sir, it could be shown that difficulties have occurred under the present system, wherein it had been attempted to prescribe that upon the reservations particular denominations alone have exclusive control.

And again, sir, and in conclusion, allow me to suggest that there should be no partisanship in this matter; and the bill under consideration conserves that view of it. The Army is not supposed to be partisan. Its officers are not appointed for a year or two (in the language of General Stanley) to "feather their own nests" and then retire, but they hold their offices for life or during good behavior. They are educated by us, paid by us, and good sense and common justice to the millions of tax-payers of the country demand that we shall use them in these capacities rather than continue the inefficient and expensive system that is now upon us.

The committee informally rose, and Mr RANDALL took the chair as Speaker pro tempore to receive a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 627) making an appropriation to pay the claim of Butler, Miller & Co.; and

A bill (S. No. 697) authorizing the sale of logs cut by the Indians of the Menomonee reservation in Wisconsin, under the direction of the Interior Department.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 2800) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay judgments provided for in the act approved February 15, 1876, entitled "An act providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress;" and

A bill (H. R. No. 2678) to authorize the sale of the Pawnee reservation.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN BUREAU.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. VAN VORHES. I had the honor to present the minority report on this bill, and the committee have generously given me a portion of the time; but not being in a condition to address the House to-day, I will yield my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox.]

THE INDIAN—WHERE SHALL HE GO?

Mr. COX.

Rushing westward o'er the mountains,
Stumbling westward down the mountains,
To the door-ways of the west wind,
To the portals of the sunset,
To the earth's remotest border,
Where into the empty spaces
Sinks the sun, as a flamingo
Drops into her nest at night-fall
In the melancholy marshes.—Hiawatha.

Mr. Chairman, "Give them hell" was the expression written upon a slate by a chivalric officer in the Mexican war as he breathed his last. Consciously or unconsciously, he expressed in one terrific monosyllable the horrors of war.

Well may the gentleman from North Carolina rush to Paradise Lost, and, as he surveys the Indian seeking to escape from his sad and unhappy environment, exclaim for the Indian, with the fallen archangel:

Which way I fly is hell; myself am hell;
And, in the lowest deep, a lower deep,
Still threat'ning to devour me, opens wide.

If the present system is hell and the Indian himself is hell and the lowest deep is in the Interior Department, where is the lower deep, lower even than the lowest, threatening to devour him, unless it be found in the War Department?

The bill before us, reduced to its last analysis, would transfer the Indian Bureau from the benignities of peace to the waging of battle. It would lift among the 300,000 Indians who are spread over 200,000 square miles of our territory some other banner than that of white. It would not merely give military supervision over the wild Indians of the West, but over the civilized tribes now organized in lawful communities. It would, to use the phrase of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] place the latter under "general supervision" of a military officer. It would reverse the progress of our age and the civilization of centuries. It would give incentive and provocation to force and destroy those elements of peace which belong to a new and better order of society.

We have boasted since the Alabama treaty with England of the great value of arbitration in settling disputes between nations. We have condemned the umpirage of war. We have boasted of those principles which are blessed as peace-making, and yet, to still subdue the already subdued Indians of our plains and forests, we renounce the principles of peace to offer our devotions before the wrathful Moloch of hate.

NO GOOD WAR OR BAD PEACE.

Even a heathen writer has declared that he preferred the "unjustest peace to the justest war;" and Dr. Franklin acknowledged, on signing his name to our treaty of peace with England, "that there never was a good war nor a bad peace." But if the spirit and provisions of this bill are sustained every example and precept which would enchain the worst passions of our nature are discouraged; and that, too, for a war in which there can be no glamour of glory for its participants. The appeal to arms for the maintenance of peace with our Indian tribes is a solecism. Cedant arma togæ, was the expression of olden times, when wars ended. This bill would reverse the motto, and hide arms under the toga.

I hold it to be the duty of civilization, as represented by a Government based on the concord of our States, to restrain the natural tendencies to causeless violence and inequitable dominion. The philosopher, Thomas Hobbes, has many chapters upon the tendency of mankind in this direction. He holds that there is perpetual war which even victory does not end. Our own civil war has shown that the conqueror is subject to danger, and the strongest in mere force, except by a miracle, closes his life without many years. No man reasoning purely can believe that the pleasures, beauties, and felicities of life can come without peaceful society. Make those who are weak and in your power your enemies and you ask in vain for those auxiliaries of happiness which are the law of our highest nature.

TRIBAL CONFLICTS—TAMMANUND.

What is war, Mr. Chairman, but force against force; and if that be the case, how little time remains for us on earth which may be called peace. With but few exceptions since the discovery and settlement of our colonies or our continent have the native tribes enjoyed repose. Their traditions indicate that before our discovery war was their natural state.

It may be asked why a representative from the great metropolis should take such an interest in this Indian business. Perhaps it might be suggested that it was because I was associated with the Tammany wigwams. [Laughter.] And in this connection may I say that there is one tradition, however, which may be worth referring to as exceptional. It is said that Tammanund, after whom a very belligerent society has been named somewhat familiar to our politics, was a chief of many days because he was a wise and merciful sachem. He fought the malignant forces of nature, the malaria, the reptile, and the monsters of the elder world. Torrents, inundations, and, what was worse than all, the hearts of the tribes were turned against him, while brethren were arrayed against and slew brethren in civil war. How did he give peace? "We are children," said he, "of the same Great Father. Go to your desolate wigwams and wasted fields to repent, work, and amend." His descendants forgot his teaching; and we, too, have forgotten the moral of the legend. But why should not that moral be applied to the descendants of these tribes who still remain with us? Why should we not in practical legislation find means for so wise a purpose?

If history were read aright it would be seen that the indictment which Milton made against war in its every count is, alas! too true. Under what favorable condition soever war may be waged, whether you hide the sword beneath the toga, or give the laws of humanity to conflict, the counts in the indictment are only varied by the words: rob, spoil, burn, slaughter, enslave, and ruin. From the earliest wars of Joshua down to the last of General Reynolds against Crazy Horse's village, this indictment can be proved. Vices, robberies, rapes, treacheries, spoils, cruelties, and crimes, not to speak of the vast taxation, losses, and expense of armament mark the red foot-step of battle.

EUROPEAN DISARMAMENT DEMANDED.

The best men of Europe are to-day considering how by prevention and conference to disarm the great powers which so oppressively tax the wages of workingmen. They do not indulge in the sentimentality or dream of brotherhood and universal peace, nor languish over the orphan's desolation or the widow's tear; but they would give the oppressed peoples of Europe those peaceful triumphs, in home, field, workshop, study, arts, science, and labor, which are more renowned than those of war. They would start the shuttle of that magic loom that weaves concord between the nations. They talk not of a golden age, but they talk practically of an age of freedom from the slavery of public debt and the exactions of insatiate rulers. Four millions of men in the flower of their age, supported by the industry of the rest of the population, with the large armaments and bustling preparation constantly going on, is a reproach to progress and a crime against humanity. Military establishments, and especially in the purchase of subsistence and clothing, are more expensive than other service, unless we except naval armaments. Turkey bought a lot of ironclads. They talk of selling those vessels now to raise money enough to pay their July dividends. Austria-Hungary this year shows a deficiency in the military budget of about twenty-five millions, reduced to dollars.

Statesmanship would reverse these onerous evidences of the philosophy of Hobbes, and create international interdependence. It would substitute co-operation for competition. It would thus establish the normal condition of civilized communities. Cannot these high thoughts now wrestling with the irrational elements of power and the national vanity of kings and states be applied with equal reason, on a less scale, to our relations with the red man? Fresh as we are from our own civil conflict, it is unnecessary in this Congress, where the repetitions of our great calamity are so frequent, to refer to the billions which have been wasted and to the distrust and animosity that have been engendered.

QUESTION OF DIGNITY TOWARD THE WEAKER.

There is no good rule, Mr. Chairman, which can be applied for the preservation of peace between civilized nations which should not obtain between the civilized and barbarous. Indeed, for a stronger reason, we can well afford to do that toward the weaker which cannot be done without some sacrifice between nations of equal position. Is there any question of dignity involved between those who are unequal? Is there anything contemptible in yielding for the general good to mere barbaric fury? Is it not a sign and source of strength in the superior to refuse contest with the inferior nation? What historic nation that is wise that did not regard the fighting of savages as folly, and the warring upon barbarians as fruitless? What mean our treaties and our presents and our annuities to the Indian tribes? Are they not intended to cultivate compliance with reason, and cannot that be done without degradation, even when the most insolent and unreasonable terms are urged?

PENN—HIS POLICY AND ITS VIOLATION.

The best portion of our Indian history is not that of war. I know that gentlemen who represent our Territories and border States laugh at the law of love as a rule of conduct between the Federal Government and the Indians. They laugh at the best examples of that conduct in our own nation. If I should quote William Penn as an example they would sneer at his efforts to subject savage nations by gentle manners and civil association. The picture of the great Quaker beneath the spreading elm forming the treaty of friendship with the Indian is to them a theme for leers and jeers; for to them is not the Indian only a treacherous savage, to be subdued by carnal weapons? Are not his lands to be wrested by violence or acquired by fraud, and not by free will and honest purchase? The doctrine of coercion in a Christian state dealing with savage neighbors is that which Mr. Sumner once called "the flinty hardness of the pilgrims of Plymouth Rock," whose "coarse and earthly" treatment of the Indians stands out in such brave and gentle contrast with the policy of Penn. The splendid State of Pennsylvania, as a philanthropist has said, became armed without arms, strong without strength, and safe without the ordinary means of safety. Unlike other colonies, which spent their money in forts and arms, not merely for the provocation of war but in anticipation of danger—Pennsylvania during the administration of Penn had no Indian quarrel and no war. Her record is stainless, at least during such peaceful rule.

But, sir, history paints another picture of Pennsylvania, which only makes by its dark background the shining contrast of its founder more resplendent.

Leaving Western Pennsylvania and going beyond the limits of the Ohio, ay, and beyond the bounds of right and the law of love, following the peaceful track of the Moravian missionary to Gnadenhütten, in my own native Muskingum Valley, her white marauders ravaged the peaceful towns of the simple Christian Indian, and massacred and burned men, women, and children without discrimination, leaving a peaceful Arcadian village in ashes without a survivor to tell the terrible story.

JEFFERSON'S VIEW—SHEEP AND WOLVES.

Glancing to-day into Jefferson's Notes of Virginia, I found his significant article on the aborigines of his State. In 1607, from the "Pawtowmac to the most southern waters of the James, and from the sea-coast to the mountains, the country was occupied by upward of forty tribes of Indians." Their names are metrical poems; from the Mannahoacs and Chiccahominies to the Tuscaroras and Nottaways. Their names only live in stream and valley. Nor is the interest in the Indian or his fate less interesting to me because of the speech made by Logan, the Mingo, reported to or by Jefferson himself, and which every school-boy has read. There are other associations running along the early border of Ohio and Pennsylvania which give their added interest to these narratives of Mr. Jefferson. He wrote kindly of the red man. He knew the injustice they suffered from the "Big Knives" and "land-jobbers" of that early day. He thought it strange that the Indian was not even made a subject of natural history, like the beasts that perish. He detected their art even in drawing, and their "astonishing strokes of sublime oratory, such as proved their reason and sentiment strong, their imagination glowing and elevated." He regarded their laws with his philosophic eye, and in his Notes (page 100) he says:

> Imperfect as this species of coercion may seem, crimes are very rare among them; insomuch that were it made a question whether no law, as among the savage Americans, or too much law, as among the civilized Europeans, submits man to the greatest evil, one who has seen both conditions of existence would pronounce it to be the last, and that the sheep are happier of themselves than under care of wolves. It will be said that great societies cannot exist without government; the savages, therefore, break them into smaller ones.

Were he called upon to vote upon this bill, where would he find the sheep, and where the wolves? Would he allow the sheep to be transferred to the care of the wolves?

The seeds of hate, sown very early in our annals, have brought forth their legitimate fruit in recent times upon our border. The bloody massacres known as the Chivington, Piegan, Black Kettle, Camp Grant, and others have their originals in other times, and have created more distrust and loss than all our three hundred and seventy-two Indian treaties can remedy in a century.

DOUBLE POLICY—KILLING AND CARESSING.

The permanent alarm and warfare upon our borders are not to be attributed to the savage quality of the Indian so much as to our own policy; for has not part of our policy been founded on the idea that the Indian was a beast of prey? Is he not to be hunted, fired upon, and dragged about at the will of the superior white man? And then, again, by a sudden caprice of policy, has he not been nursed as a ward of the nation, and given missionaries and agricultural implements and guns for the chase? Is it not time that we had a settled policy which would treat him with something else besides whisky and trinkets, gewgaws and cards? Bad liquor and bullets may not always find their proper substitute in pantaloons and plows, but if we treat the Indian as the worst of animals or of men, as a sort of chimpanzee or a dropped stitch in the garment of humanity, it is not so politic or wise as the other extreme which caresses, feeds, clothes, and patronizes him. There is certainly a better side to the red man than we are apt to see from the representations of our border men. I would not paint him as Cooper's lofty, poetic, generous Uncas; but is he always found the dirty, thieving, drunken savage, who allows his squaw to work with her papoose strapped to her back while he slumbers ingloriously in his wigwam or dances the war-dance with its pagan orgies? The good men upon our border, like Bishop Whipple or Bishop Hare, the Methodist, Quaker, and Catholic, who have gone out to talk with him for the highest and holiest purposes, do not confirm the statements made by the dishonest and selfish who prey upon him. We read of Bishop Hare's sojourn among the Oneidas, of their twenty thousand cultivated acres, of their frame-houses, neat table, healthy food, and we wonder why all the tribes should have such general odium. He found among the Cherokees, Creeks, and Choctaws 50,000 law-abiding and moral people. The Santees were earning their own living, surrendering their rights to annuities, rations, &c., while schools were overcrowded and honest faith and friendship prevailed. Mr. Janney, in his letter from Loudoun County, Virginia, dated "Twelfthmonth 23, 1873," reliably describes the self-reliant and self-supporting condition of the Santee Sioux, to which I can only refer. Can these be the beasts and demons too often confounded with the worst of the wild tribes who have come in contact with our blessed civilization? Some one has said that every savage can be made a "Friday" if you choose a Robinson Crusoe as his companion.

CANADIAN SYSTEM.

Why, I ask gentlemen who are urging the transfer of this peaceful Bureau to that of war, has the Canadian policy been successful as compared with our own? Why has Canadian policy been cheap and good while ours has been expensive and bad? Has civilization been stopped in Canada by the presence of the Indian? Does not the Canadian government get along comfortably with him? Why have they not wars and rumors of Indian wars there? The Canadian Indians number 85,379; the Indians under our own Bureau, not counting the wild Indians, are 115,000. In 1874 the Canadian bureau cost $199,000 in gold, or $2.35 for each Indian under its care. Our Bureau in 1872 and since has averaged six or seven million dollars a year, or about $60 for each Indian. Solve the Canadian Indian question, and you may possibly strike a policy of peace and economy for ourselves. Is it successful because the Canadian agents are more honest and capable than our own, or is it because they treat the Indians as the governor-general, Lord Dufferin, has so often expressed to the Indians themselves, as an integral part of the British empire, to be legislated for as others of the human race?

BELLIGERENT SPIRIT IS WAR.

Let us remember that a state of war does not consist merely in fighting. The belligerent will and spirit is in the nature of war. Its existence implies destruction. It is said that "it is not foul weather which gives us a shower or two of rain; but it consists in an inclination thereto many days together; and so the nature of war consisteth not in the actual fighting but in the known disposition thereto during all the time there is no assurance to the contrary. All other time is peace." We know too well that under military espionage and protection over the Indian the spirit of hostility continues even under a peaceful exterior. It is almost as if we were in actual battle. As in days and years of menace and unrest like those which followed Alsace and Lorraine after the Franco-German war, though not to the same extent, similar consequences follow. Industries cease, because the fruit is uncertain. There is little or no culture of the earth; scant navigation, transportation, and the use of commodities; no building of houses, no dissemination of knowledge, no commerce, no letters, no society; continual fear and danger. So "the life of man is solitary, poor, brutish, and short." This describes well the condition of the Indian and settler upon our border from the beginning of our Government down to our present and recent experiences, under our changeful and capricious policy.

HOW EUROPEAN BARBARISM WAS ERADICATED.

The "unrelenting vigor" with which General Ord would pursue the Indian, the exterminating spirit of Sheridan and Sherman, and the military élan which belongs to the Army hereafter to be proved, would lead us to infer a priori that to commit the Indian to the care of the soldier is to write his sentence of death. Certainly this is not in the spirit of those laws of progress which have redeemed our kind from barbarism. We are apt to forget that our ancestors were once no better than the Modoc, and far inferior to the Choctaw. I open Keightly's History of England, and read its first paragraph. It is based upon Roman authority of two thousand years ago. It calls upon us to behold the isle of Britain as it was then! It is a region covered with forests, and spreading into marshes. Its inhabitants are a rude, barbarous race. They subsist on the milk and flesh of their cattle. Their towns are mere inclosures in the woods. Their dwellings are rude, wicker cabins; not so good as the stone or cane huts of the Kabyles. Their only vessel, the coracle; a boat of frame-work and skins. Or, as the historian says, they were nearly as low in the scale of humanity as our colonists in after times found the aborigines of the New World. When they fight they do so in puris naturalibus, and their fighting is like a war of kites and crows. They are tattooed like the savages of the southwestern seas, and on their bodies—wonderful antitype of our ensign—is punctured the red, white, and blue, or, as the historian says, they were tattooed with "the stars and stripes." [Laughter.] Now behold that little island! Its valleys and plains are blooming with cultivation; its cities and towns are animated with the activity of commerce and manufacture. Its fleets ride triumphant on the most distant ocean; and its institutions are the wonder of the world. Its queen is just made empress of two hundred millions of subject races in a distant continent, held in perfect peace to a distant throne by the defender of another faith, whose Kohinoor in the imperial crown reflects the prismatic brilliance of farthest "Ormus and of Ind."

Dressed in beads and flowers, with weapons of bone and flint, clothed in the fur and wool of cats and rabbits and sheep, the condition of the British barbarian was no better than that of the indigenous Gaul and German who through many cycles of time have ruled by their policy and their refinement of civilization. In the time of Tacitus the Germans were barbarians. They had a warlike subtlety equal to our Indians, and the Romans acknowledged their skill in war. The Rhine and the Elbe were to them what the Missouri and Yellowstone are now to us. Mountains and forests were full of these barbarians. Their yellow-haired children had no cradles and no swaddling-bands. True they gambled with dice and allowed their women to work in the field; but it was from this cradle and by the very lack of the swaddling-bands that Rome was overcome by arms, only to overcome the barbarians in turn by arts.

From the family or the clan or the tribe, mere seedlings of progress, the early European nations have grown into a tree whose shadow covers many nations, and of whose magnificent bloom, fragrance, and fruitage our nation is a part.

ROMAN LAW VS. ROMAN EAGLES.

What was the cause of this growth in civilization? These barbarous tribes had their conquerors and their wars. But their conqueror was Roman, and Rome conquered more by her laws, language, fasces, and citizenship than by her eagles. A German chieftain once addressed the Romans thus:

Since I was made a Roman citizen by the divine Augustus I have had the conviction that the same thing is beneficial to both Roman and German, because I prefer peace to war, tranquillity to turmoil. I can become to the German people a useful advocate should they choose order instead of ruin.

DISHONEST AGENCIES MUST BE ERADICATED.

Who are the wise intermediaries between our superior Government and our savages? The squaw-men, the half-breed, the dishonest adventurer, the post-trader, the bar-tender, the vendor of sheet-iron spades, cast-iron axes, paper-sole brogans, shoddy and glue blankets, iron spoons, two-inch mirrors, gimlets, Jew's-harps, hair-oil, finger-rings, and elastic garters. [Laughter.] Alas! too many such selfish and scoundrelly evidences of civilization intervene against the law by which the greater should teach, civilize, and ennoble the weaker. "You tell me," said Little Raven to the good missionary, "that all good men, red and white, will go to heaven, and all bad ones to hell. Good notion; heap good; for if all the whites are like those I know, when Indian gets to heaven few whites trouble him there."

But is there any reason, Mr. Chairman, why abuses in the Indian service should be abated with a firm, strong hand, rather than increase them by other policies? Reprobating all the frauds so long continued in this service under every system; conscious that it is not an exceptional Bureau, and that purification and accountability are indispensable; yet how can one, overlooking the whole field, turn over the service to that destructive and expensive management which in the past forty years has cost five hundred millions, while the civil policy has cost but little more than one-tenth of this sum, including annuities, presents, purchase-money for lands, and all?

We have no reason to distrust safe and humane policies toward the Indian, if pursued by agents, without menace, force, or fraud. What we want is not the transfer of the Indian Bureau from one Department to another, but honest agents; not a partisan Bureau, but honest agents, even if under an independent Department. We have never yet seen in this service what the policy of peace can do when properly managed; for it has been so closely connected always with the military. We need not go to Canada, or to Algiers, or to William Penn for lessons. Is there not civil ingenuity and wisdom enough to devise remedies for Bureau mismanagement, purge our system of its putrescence, punish crime, and compel accountability without a transfer of the functions of civil government to the military?

ABORIGINAL CIVILIZATION.

Once the pioneers of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Florida had their conflicts with the Indians of the Savannah Mountains and valley. The fields of Talladega, Emuckfau, and Horseshoe, are they not associated with Andrew Jackson? The tomahawk and scalping-knife are not alone associated with the Pequots, the Delawares, or the Modocs. The beautiful land of the South had its Indian orgies and war-dances. Now go to the land provided for the Choctaw, Cherokee, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole, and, although you may find some relic of the superstitious and barbarous element, yet their average intelligence and morality put to shame many communities of the pure white type. These tribes yielded to the advance of the whites from time to time and clung to their old habits until agriculture and pasturage took the place of the destroyed game, and they learned the arts of war no more. True, they were circumscribed in domain and properly so. The members of their tribes were localized. The idea of property and sale was introduced, and in the one-fiftieth part of the time it took to regenerate the barbarians of Britain and Germany they have demonstrated that for peaceful civilization, with its herd and field, its plow, loom, and anvil, its book, school, and literature, and its religion, they are intrenched beyond the possibility of retrogression. May we not infer that like causes will operate upon the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Apaches, Kiowas, Comanches, and even the Sioux, if affairs are properly administered? Referring to the Six Nations, said Oldmixon, "We entered their land and inhabited therein as safe as if there had been thousands of garrisons." What New York has done, through wise policy, for the confederated six tribes, other States have done and will do for the tribes within their borders. How much better to prepare for such local management than at once to open the flood-gate of distrust and destruction.

INDIAN PROTESTS AGAINST THE TRANSFER.

There has been laid upon the table of members a protest of the lawful delegates of some of these civilized tribes or nations of the Indian Territory against their transfer to military control. The delegation of Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Seminole, and other nations have honored me with a letter asking me to protest against the transfer of their race from the civil to the military rule "as unnecessary, impolitic, and unlawful." I do this, inasmuch as it was just answered here that not a committee hearkened to them. They only heard the Army officers, who "can be well spared" and have "nothing to do," according to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS.] Judgment is taken against them by default. Their protest is signed by the authorized delegates of some of these tribes. They have no representative here. The colored man has his Senator and his Representative and friends here, and the descendants of the Celt, the German, and the Englishman have their exponents, partial by blood and association; but these red men depend solely for their protection on the law of kindness, the treaties of faith, and the dictates of justice. Lord Chatham once commended the papers of the Continental Congress as unequaled in style and manner since the time of Thucydides. This equally commendable paper which I hold in my hand is an able, though brief, presentation in the interest of humanity and liberty against an infraction of our own Constitution, which disallows the quartering of soldiers in time of peace without consent or in time of war except by law. It is a protest against breaking contracts and treaties, and it appeals to us by the very genius of our hundredth anniversary against the avaricious and tyrannical designs of those who would prejudge—not for his own faults, but on account of the bad conduct of our own officials—the red man whom the United States have treated on equal terms.

SECTARIAN AND MILITARY AGENCIES.

It was argued by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] that the association of the Christian missionaries was in violation of the Constitution of the United States in relation to the free exercise of religion. It is not my purpose to defend the selection of sectarian agents. But this ought to be quoted from the testimony of Mr. Welsh, in this connection, as a full answer. He says to the committee:

I think the present policy is the best we can advise. No agent has the right to exclude any religious body from exercising their missionary operations on his reservation. They dissuade others from coming if he thinks the multiplication of them will be injurious. On three of the reservations in which we operate other religious bodies are at work as well as ours, and they are all equally favored by the agent, though it might not be promotive of the highest good, but inasmuch as there are more Indians than the religious bodies of this country are willing to undertake the care of, there seems to be an advantage in the system as at present adopted.

Much reproach has ensued because of these teachers and preachers; much more because of the partisan character of the agents, and still more because of the robbery and plundering, suffering and starvation of the Indian through the infidelity of the Indian agents generally. I do not extenuate in the least the fraud and corruption of the present system. I doubt not that the special report of Mr. Nesmith, quoted by the gentleman, is true as to the outrageous swindling of the Indians in their goods both in the quality and the prices. This special report of Senator Nesmith is calculated, without proper deliberation, to assist the transfer of this Bureau to the War Department, but I beg the House to pause before the fraud of the Indian Office is made a pretext of worse injustice. It is not the ills which the Indian now suffers from the Indian Office which should be considered merely, but the ills which may come to him that we know not of, when the transfer is consummated. I ask the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, who has served in war, not merely to recall his own honorable service and that of his compatriots, but to remember what the Army has been in connection with his section in time of peace during the last ten years. Has it not been used throughout the South to overturn established institutions from the ballot up through various gradations to the Legislatures of sovereign States? Must I rehearse to him the jealousy of arms in free countries, handed down in traditions, bills of right, and constitutions for our guidance in the pursuit of well-ordered civil freedom?

WAR DEPARTMENT HONEY-COMBED WITH FRAUD.

It is not necessary to refer to post-traderships and other recent illustrations of rascality. It is not necessary to hint that during many years this very War Department has been honey-combed with fraud, and that but a few of those officers on the frontier posts had the courage to announce these frauds to the public or to the Government. I know men now say that they knew of this abomination all the time; but why stand by fearfully subordinated without the nerve to call a halt upon this progress in vice and fraud? And yet, sir, in the face of these revelations, and while impeachment stands in terrorem over the late head of this very Department, and with a soldier Chief Magistrate reckless of just accountability, and his brother a convicted stipendiary of corrupt post-trading, we are asked in the open sunlight of these scandalous truths that have startled the nation and the world to place the Indian Bureau under a system which connects so much fraud with its force.

If the Indian service, which should be entirely peaceful in order to be economical and just, is to be transferred to the War Office because of the corruption of Indian agents and contractors, let us first purify the military service in the War Office. Let us sweep away the rotten débris before we build a new structure. Let us first ascertain the length and breadth of this confessed corruption. Let us be in no haste to give these Indians, against their protest, over to irresponsible force and unexampled fraud.

MILITARY OMNIPRESENT.

If, Mr. Chairman, the military should take charge of this civil service, why not have it in every branch of the service, as we have had it around the ballots and the Legislatures and the courts of the South? Is it not said to be constituted of most honorable men? Has it not stern systems of account and penalty? Are not its teachings rigorous and its officers unsullied? Suppose we grant all this, and what is the consequence? But how is it? Many of the officers in the Army are honest gentlemen, doubtless; but it is an insult to suppose that the only honest gentlemen in this country are educated at West Point. It is a mistake to imagine that every military officer is a modest, truthful, humane man. I will not go so far as an old writer, who said the Gods never made a polite soldier. The members of this House, who are ex-soldiers, forbid the ungallant remark. But this remark may be hazarded: that there are profanity and drunkenness and vice among Army officers as well as elsewhere. They are educated to exercise power; and Army officers in all ages and countries have not hesitated to exercise it harshly when it suits their whim or convenience. Is it claimed that they are more honest than other men? It is to be hoped that men who have been educated at a great expense to the Government and given positions of high honor and generous pay for life are not quite so likely to steal as poor devils who were never educated at all and who have no secured future; but is it possible that among the tens of thousands of young men who leave our families, seminaries, and colleges year after year, the sons of cultured, honored people, there cannot be found a sufficient number to fill honestly and faithfully the civil offices of the Government? If that be so, the sooner we establish schools to educate, at the expense of Government, boys who are to have a life-tenure of all the offices the better. But, if the Indian agencies are to be turned over to the Army simply because we cannot get honest agents in civil life, why stop there? Why not give the Army control of the Land Office or the collection of internal revenue? Why not have the mail contracts let by Army officers? If a warrior is to be chosen for peace, and the War Office is to be the organ of civilization, why may not the soldier be detailed as bank examiner or a troop of cavalry deliver letters in our big cities? Frauds are alleged to exist in almost all the Departments of the Government. Even the War Department, as I have said, is not free from suspicion.

O, yes; carry out the logic to its finality. Let us have a private at the light-house, a corporal to manage the boats of the life-saving station, a sergeant to watch the smuggler on the frontier, an adjutant to collect statistics, a sutler to run our Printing Bureau, a lieutenant to collect the whisky tax, a captain to run the custom-house, a judge-advocate to decide upon the Alabama claims and write letters about guilty witnesses, a drum major to distribute seeds, a quartermaster to issue patents for bee-hives, a commissary for Secretary of the Interior, a paymaster as foreign minister, a major as Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, a chaplain of the Army to pray for the Senate, a company to run the Bureau of Education, a battalion to man our iron-clads, a regiment in place of the girls in the redemption bureau, and, if it would not make too much of an innovation, a general and his aids to run the White House, while brigadiers by brevet should swell under the stoles of our supreme judges! [Laughter.]

PENSION TRANSFER.

It has already been suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JENKS] in a bill that we should employ the military for pension purposes, and perhaps this is the most sensible, if not economical, of all these recommendations. His bill will save us over a half million; and, as he so clearly showed us on the 15th of March, there is a close connection between pensions and the War Office, which would facilitate and cheapen the service. True, there are negligence and fraud in the Pension Office, but that should be cleared. It is not for that reason but for other reasons that I find myself an advocate of the plan of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

THE ECONOMIES.

In the present financial condition of the country it would be strange indeed if this suggestion as to pensions as well as to Indians did not meet with favor, since it has the flavor of economy in it; and I shall be much surprised if it be not pressed with energy by a class of men professing to be advocates of economy.

I am aware that the expenditures for the Indian service have increased rapidly in the last few years. I am also aware that the service is not in a satisfactory condition, and many persons believe that under what is known as the "peace policy" corruption has been and now is as prevalent as at any former period.

The bill under consideration, Mr. Chairman, is based on economy. The Committee on Appropriations seem to have accepted this bill, as well as the bill in relation to the transfer of the Pension Office to the War Department, as in the line of retrenchment. The chairman of that committee has left this proposition in the last clause but two of the legislative bill, so that Congress may pass upon the transfer before we make the appropriation. This is wise. Those who wish to assist the committee in its strenuous and laudable efforts for reform will be glad to hear a full debate of this subject before the short debates are concluded upon the legislative bill. I doubt not that the Committee on Appropriations will cheerfully concur in the action of the House on this bill, when that action is ascertained. It is no antagonism to the principles of retrenchment, but in my judgment a vindication of them, that leads members to hesitate before adopting this policy of transfer.

COST OF KILLING RED MEN.

I have read carefully the speech of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. THROCKMORTON,] whose superior sources of information and his locality near the border naturally color his views and give emphasis to his judgment. He has made a special study and statement of what may be saved by this transfer. I will not contest the exactness of his calculation. His saving runs into the millions by the proposed transfer, from his stand-point. But it seems to me, sir, that he mistakes in failing to estimate the expensive alternative should this transfer be made. Has he calculated what it will cost to keep up the Army for Indian warfare? It was stated some time since by a gentleman from Minnesota, in 1867, that it cost over $6,000,000 for a regiment in the Indian country. "One Indian was killed," said Senator WINDOM; "$6,000,000 for one Indian, and it is doubtful whether he is dead or alive." [Laughter.]

I have before me a statement of the cost of our Indian wars. Before, however, dilating upon that, allow me to say that in 1849 Congress created the Department of the Interior and transferred the Indian Bureau to that Department. Since that time the Army has had more or less connection with the Indian service; and the great bulk of the expenses of the Army has been in consequence of that connection. The entire military and civil cost of the Indian management under the present mixed policy, if we include the twenty regiments of soldiers, ten of cavalry and ten of infantry, will be a little short of $40,000,000 per annum, instead of the seven millions as represented in our Indian appropriation bills. If it costs $2,000,000 a year for a cavalry regiment and $1,000,000 for the infantry, the $40,000,000 can easily be made up from other details which it is not necessary now to consider.

Why did not gentlemen-economists cut down the Army? Was it because of such protests as this from Colonel Kautz, and addressed to the chairman of the Military Committee? Hear him:

> I should consider it very expensive in the end to reduce the Army further. A hundred thousand men would have saved the expenses of the late war, and what that war cost the country would have maintained such an army for more than a hundred years; in fact one-half the interest the country now pays on the national debt would support such an army throughout.
> Our Army is all on duty. Not a soldier of the cavalry and infantry but what is practically standing guard over from fifty to one hundred savages, while the two thousand five hundred artillery-men are taking care of the armament and fortifications for the protection of seven thousand miles of coast.

The reasoning of such officers did not prevail to keep up salaries; but they did prevail with committees to preserve the 25,000 rank and file and the supernumerary officers. What reasoning it is! It requires no answer.

CUT DOWN THE ARMY.

It must be remembered that it costs a little less than $1,000 a man in the Army. Why not, you economists of the House, strike off or cut down your Army? It will yet bear a reduction of 10,000 men. But the experiment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING,] however much we may applaud it, does not go to the root of the matter. It does not reduce the existing force at all. It provides for an Army of 25,000; more than double what is needed. I agree with the gentleman from Texas that the Rio Grande needs protection and that the forts need manning in the Indian country; but what other utility has this armed machine, with its constant wastes and its exposure to abuse? My friend from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] states that in 1874 Sheridan had 18,000 troops in the Indian service alone—three-fourths of the Army. May not this expense be lessened by other agencies and with benefit? Gentlemen differ, however, as to the saving by this transfer. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] estimates a saving of a million by the transfer; the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] reckons the saving at $300,000. It is easy to cipher out how much can be saved by striking off 10,000 privates; it is easy to reckon what utility can be subserved by dispensing with 10,000 bayonets in southern elections. If you would put the Army on a cheap footing, cut down not merely the salaries of the officers, but dismiss the supernumerary officers and men. The saving would be at least 5 per cent. on $350,000,000 of our bonds.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING,] for whose bill I voted, has not recognized the full extent of the reduction demanded by the people in these times of luxury among the few and suffering among the many. It was the hope of this House at its beginning that the implacable demand of our people for retrenchment would be heeded and that the military establishment would be brought down to a republican standard. We want no standing army either for the South or the frontier. We want no more partisan duty for the bayonet. We want no more Gatling guns to repress liberties and no swords drawn over legislators at the call of United States marshals or State governors. What we want is a restriction on the aggrandizement of the power of the War Department and of the Commander-in-Chief, who is President.

Does the House remember an order which I read to them issued by Mr. Belknap forbidding officers of the Army to give information as to military matters to Congressmen, or give advice for the conduct of military forces to legislators, except they were in harmony with the Department of War itself? Is such a Department, capable of issuing such orders without protest, handling so many millions of dollars and such immense patronage, the one to which we must ever defer as to the civilization and moralization of our Indians? Do we not know that the sound of our gun and the presence of uniformed soldiers upon the border and on the hunting-ground and reservation inflames, instead of conciliates, hostility? The recent Commissioner of Indian Affairs threw a little tub to the whale in his report, in which he recommended the War Department as preferable for the supply of subsistence and clothing, amounting to two millions. He gave, as General Sherman does, some plausible reasons for this recommendation.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us remember the law of human nature. If the military through the policy of economy is made to distribute the food and clothing to the Indians, will not the Indian cease to regard the agent and lose his respect for his authority? He will look at the donor perhaps with fear and trembling, but not with love and kindness, when that donor is the military man.

INDIAN WARS CAUSED BY SOLDIERS; THEIR COST.

I have said that our Indian wars have been under the direction and control of the War Department. I may go further and say that for more than half the period while the Bureau was under that control it was occupied in wars, more or less unjust, against the Seminoles, Sacs and Foxes; not to speak of troubles with the Creeks and Cherokees. It can also be shown that since the Bureau has been under the Interior Department the military stationed in the Indian country have been responsible for most of the wars. It was the cause of the Sioux war in 1852–'54. That war arose, like the fire at Chicago, from a cow; a lieutenant and his squad began the killing and wounding, and the expenditure of $20,000,000, besides hundreds of lives and immense loss of property, was the result.

The Chivington massacre, the Cheyenne war, culminating in the Sand Creek massacre, started with a lieutenant. Forty millions was its cost. The violation of treaty stipulations in Dakota cost us many lives and many millions of dollars. Was it not so with the Cheyenne war of 1867, the Navajo war in New Mexico, not to speak of others, all costing us millions in money and hundreds of lives? Let us, sir, separate the Army from the Indian in so far as is possible, unless we would have a repetition of the seven-years Seminole war, which cost fifteen hundred lives on our part and fifty millions in treasure. At the same Indian death-rate our 300,000 Indians when exterminated will have cost a million of dollars each, and at the rate of one Indian to kill per month it is calculated that he will be exterminated in 25,000 years, at an expense of three hundred billions of money. If our previous experience is to be reproduced, then twenty-five whites are to be slain for every Indian, which, by a similar calculation, will bring about the slaughter of 7,500,000 of our people.

But all this calculation is an absurdity. It is impossible for the American people long to acquiesce in a system of extermination without mercy. Allow your whites to break faith and push in on the Black Hills, allow your military to treat the Indian according to the code laid down by the chairman of the Military Committee of this House, and you break down all that has been done for the Indian in the past, and leave us without our ameliorating agencies and tendencies for the future, by which I mean agricultural and mechanical tuition, for which all agree the soldier is unfit. We must regard the Indians as they are. . With rare exceptions they seldom make war without provocation. But when the war comes, as come it will, under Army auspices; when it comes, and come it will when power seeks to aggrandize itself; when it comes, as come it will when the dispensation of patronage goes hand in hand with mere power, the necessity for war will be easily created to give employment to a Department that has no other raison d'être than force and slaughter.

LESSONS FROM ALGERIA.

Would gentlemen disdain to consult the policy of other nations, or the history of the treatment of other tribes by civilized nations, to reach a proper policy? I have been in Algiers. Time will not allow me to state the number and variety of the tribes with which the French for so many years have fought in that dependency of France. The long war of France against Abd-el-Kader and the Marabouts was intensified by the differences of religion, peculiarity of country and climate; and it never could have ended in the permanent subjection of even the most civilized under the finest military system then existing but for the arts of peace and the policy of persuasion. A marshal of France, once governor of Algiers, at a public dinner in Paris gave this toast: "To the pacific union of the great human family by the association of individuals, nations, and races! To the annihilation of war! To the transformation of destructive armies into corps of industrious laborers, who will consecrate their lives to the cultivation and embellishment of the world." In the spirit of this sentiment Algiers was reconciled; and the most warlike of their tribes, the Kabyles of the Atlas, were induced to take up the pursuits of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

Standing upon one of the mountain heights in Eastern Algeria I counted one hundred and seventy prosperous Kabyle villages.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSHIRE. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

No objection was made.

Mr. SPARKS. Before the gentleman proceeds, will he allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. COX. I must respectfully decline. It would be difficult for me from the mountain height on which I stood when my time expired to descend to the level of the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.] I know that he stands much higher than I do in one respect, and perhaps morally and intellectually too, but, if he had been on that mountain height, I think I might have overtopped him on this question, even as a pigmy upon an alp. [Great laughter.]

There was but one fort with five hundred soldiers amid 600,000 people. Markets for animals and fruits and coals and everything needed for comfort are held periodically. Thousands of the natives who attend these fairs go buzzing about their barter like so many bulls and bears in a New York exchange. Prosperity was on every hand. What was the secret? The native laws and customs were not interfered with. Their system was home rule. Their villages were made up of so many families, each electing a local legislator and a mayor yearly. They met en masse, voted viva voce. They had a parliament, whose speaker was the reponsible intercessor between the French and the people. I have seen these Kabyle mayors and legislators sitting serenely cross-legged in their courts giving advice and establishing justice, while hundreds of anxious suitors were waiting decisions as to their rights of person and property. The secret of this prosperity and peace was the promise, never broken, to conserve their domestic institutions, and on that promise the military rule was mitigated and French domination became elevating and honorable.

As in Algiers so in Canada, the military are not a perpetual menace, nor are the government agents a perpetual fraud. What warrant is there in history or in humanity for a nation which has enfranchised five millions of blacks for treating the Indian as a beast of prey? Why should our boasted civilization keep up the warfare upon the red race while trying to reconcile the blacks to new and better conditions? Why should hostility toward the Indians be encouraged?

OLD QUARREL BETWEEN CIVIL AND MILITARY, FOR INDIAN CONTROL.

At intervals for more than twenty years the military arm has made efforts to capture the Indian Bureau. During all that time it has thwarted the work of the civil department in its management of Indian affairs. Instead of acting in harmony with and properly aiding the officers in the civil service in charge of the Indians it has placed obstacles in the way. It has thus retarded the work of civilization, encouraged trespasses upon the Indians, resulting in hostilities and the sacrifice of the lives of the Indians and the contiguous frontier settlers as well.

In all these years Congress has signally failed to do its duty. Appeal after appeal has been made to it to legislate so as to protect the Indian in his rights and at the same time shield the honest frontier settler from the horrors of Indian wars. Occasionally a spasmodic effort has been made in Congress looking to some future action on this important subject, but before anything was accomplished, the subject was dismissed from consideration. Hence the years have passed and the interests of this race of men have been neglected. To-day it is the saddest sight on our continent to contemplate the condition of these helpless people.

In my judgment two elements have combined, and their influence has been potent in negativing every proper impulse that has heretofore shown itself in the halls of Congress. These elements are the Army, which has desired to wrest Indian management from the civil service, and the heartless, avaricious, and corrupt men who make plunder and gain from all the complications and disturbances that grow out of the unsettled condition in which our Indian affairs are kept.

NEGLECT OF CONGRESS.

In throwing open the country west of Iowa, Missouri, and Arkansas to the settlement and occupation of the whites, the United States should have made provision for the care and protection of the Indians. This was not done, however, and in 1856 the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in his annual report, dated the 22d of November of that year, called the attention of Congress to the necessity for such legislation as the exigency demanded. No heed was given to the suggestions of that officer, and the same fate has met all subsequent suggestions looking to a proper solution of our Indian affairs. The influence of the Army has always been against the views of the Indian Bureau when its efforts have been for the amelioration of the condition of the red man. I regret to say that the Bureau has not always stood up manfully against the impertinent interference of the military, and in all instances where it has failed the Army has made an aggressive movement and untold injury has resulted.

But I must return to the question of the transfer of the Bureau. It is time this question was settled and settled forever, for so long as it remains open for discussion it is pregnant with injury to the Indian and to all inhabitants adjacent to them. Both suffer and the Treasury of the nation is depleted as a necessary result.

The transfer of the Bureau to the War Department, then, means force in the management of Indian affairs; force begets outbreaks, and war follows. As an economic measure it is a delusion. If the Army was entirely withdrawn from the Indian country, economy in the Indian service would follow. A single Indian war on the smallest scale, as I have shown, will deplete the Treasury of millions. All such wars ought and could be avoided. But they never will be until the military is given unmistakably to understand that its officious interference will not be tolerated.

JOINT COMMITTEE AGAINST TRANSFER, 1866-'67.

About the close of the civil war Congress appointed a joint committee of both Houses, consisting of Messrs. Doolittle, Foster, Ross, Nesmith, Higby, Windom, and Hubbard, directing it to inquire into the condition of the Indian tribes and their treatment by the civil and military authorities. This committee made their report January 26, 1867, through Senator Doolittle to the Senate. It is a document of more than five hundred pages. It discussed this question, and its conclusion was in these words:

Weighing this matter and all the arguments for and against the proposed change, your committee are of the unanimous opinion that the Indian Bureau should remain where it is.

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS AGAINST TRANSFER.

On the 20th of July, 1867, Congress passed a law creating a board of commissioners the object of which was "to establish peace with certain hostile Indians; and said board was authorized to call together the chiefs and head men of such bands of Indians as were then waging war for the purpose of ascertaining their reasons for hostility, and, if thought advisable, to make treaties with them having in view if possible the removal of the causes of the war, and as far as possible to secure the frontier settlements and the safe building of our railroads to the Pacific coast, and to suggest or inaugurate some plan for the civilization of the Indians. I gather the substance of the duties of this commission from the text of their report. From my reading of the current history of the times, I would amend this text by substituting that the war was waged by the whites and not by the Indians, and that the latter were only acting in self-defense.

This peace commission was composed of N. G. Taylor, Commissioner of Indian Affairs; Hon. J. B. Henderson, Senator from Missouri; John B. Sanborn and S. F. Tappan, civilians; and Generals Sherman, Harney, Terry, and Augur, of the Army. On the 8th of January, 1868, this board of peace commissioners made a report to the President. It will be found in the executive document of that time, and to it I ask your attention. In it this commission treats of the question of the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department. Remember, Mr. Chairman, that the Army had a full and able representation in this commission. General Sherman himself, just quoted by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] concurred in this report. From this and other reports, which I have not time to read at length, I ask to be permitted to print an extract, which is as follows:

This brings us to consider the much-mooted question whether the Bureau should belong to the civil or military department of the Government. To determine this properly we must first know what is to be the future treatment of the Indians. If we intend to have war with them, the Bureau should go the Secretary of War. If we intend to have peace, it should be in the civil department. In our judgment such wars are wholly unnecessary, and hoping that the Government and the country will agree with us we cannot now advise the change. The military arm of the Government is not the most admirably adapted to discharge duties of this character. [To educate and instruct in the peaceful arts.] We have the highest possible appreciation of the officers of the Army and fully recognize their proverbial integrity and honor, but we are satisfied that not one in a thousand would like to teach Indian children to read and write or Indian men to sow and reap.

Again, and in the same report, the commission say:

We believe the Indian question to be one of such momentous importance, as it respects both the honor and interests of the nation, as to require for its proper solution an undivided responsibility. The vast and complicated duties now devolved upon the Secretary of the Interior leave him too little time to examine and determine the multiplicity of questions necessarily connected with the government and civilization of a race. The same may be said of the Secretary of War. As things now are it is difficult to fix responsibility. When errors are committed the civil department blames the military; the military retort by the charge of inefficiency or corruption against the officers of the Bureau. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs escapes responsibility by pointing to the Secretary of the Interior, while the Secretary may well respond that, though in theory he may well be responsible, practically he is governed by the head of the Bureau. We therefore recommend that Indian affairs be committed to an independent bureau or department. Whether the head of the department should be made a member of the President's Cabinet is a matter for the discretion of Congress and yourself.

I most cordially indorse the recommendation of the commission. Let the Indian service be confided to an independent department, and the head of it made a member of the Cabinet. This done, the service would at once be emancipated from its confused condition. Disturbances, outbreaks, and wars would then be the exception, and not, as now, the rule. The condition of the Indian could then in reality be improved, and his domestication and civilization assured, and a vast saving of money would assuredly follow this new relation. Could I reach the heart of every member of Congress I would implore each and all to unite in this measure of emancipation of the red race, confident in the happy results that would follow.

The question naturally arises, why did not Congress act on the subject and adopt the policy recommended by the commission created by it? In the commission the military was ably represented, and there was but one voice, and that was, to make the Indian service an independent department.

During the fall of the year 1867 this commission made treaties with certain tribes of Indians, among whom were the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, Comanches, &c., and, closing their labors for the season, repaired to Washington and made their report to the President, on January 7, 1868. But it had not then closed its labors, but had further work in view for the season of 1868. In 1868 various treaties were made, among which were those with the Sioux, Crow, Snake, and other tribes. On the 8th of October, 1868, the commission convened in Chicago, General Sherman and all his military associates being present. Commissioner Taylor and Messrs. Sanborn and Tappan were also present. Ex-Senator Henderson was absent. At the date of the Chicago meeting the Government had not taken a single step toward fulfilling the stipulations of the treaties made by the commission except that some few had been ratified by the Senate, though a number were not then ratified. The Indians had ceded their respective lands to the Government and in return were to be provided with reservations designated in general terms in the treaties, but none of the boundaries had been defined, no agency buildings provided, and, but for a right guaranteed in the treaties to the Indians to roam and hunt on lands adjacent to the reservations, they were without a place to dwell. It was, in my judgment, the duty of the commission to see to it that prompt action was taken by all departments of the Government to fulfill its obligations to the Indians as the same were expressed in the treaties. In the homeless condition of the Indians grave duties were imposed upon the commission, and how did it meet them?

THE BOARD RECONSIDERS ITS LAUDABLE ACTION.

In its deliberations at Chicago on the 8th day of October, 1868, by the vote of the military part of the commission, it was resolved that the treaties it had made with the Indians should be broken in this, that the clauses guaranteeing the right to roam and hunt outside of the reservations should be abrogated, the Indians compelled by military force to go upon their reservations, the boundaries of which had not then and to this day some have not been defined, and further, as the judgment of the commission, that the Indian Bureau should at once be transferred from the Interior to the War Department. This proceeding at Chicago is, you will observe, the work of the very same military gentlemen who united in the report of January 7, 1868, to the President. Such gross inconsistency has no parallel, that I am aware of. General Grant was at Chicago at the date of the meeting, and, it is said, concurred in the action there taken, whereupon the commission adjourned sine die, leaving its great work in an unfinished condition, not even, so far as I have seen, making a report of its doings during the summer of 1868.

Now what evil, malign influence operated to produce this extraordinary action on the part of this commission?

SHERIDAN ON HIS INDIAN RIDE.

In the spring of 1868 General Sheridan was transferred from New Orleans to the command of the Department of the Missouri. In a very short time after his assuming the command of that department he did not fail to condemn the work of the commission then treating with the Indians. He expressed it that the commission had pursued a mistaken policy; that, instead of treating with the Indians, they should be punished; as he during the season expressed it officially, the Indians should be "soundly whipped, their ponies killed, the ringleaders hung, and such destruction of their property as will make them very poor." That was his remedy and the mode he would adopt to civilize the red man. During the spring General Sheridan made a tour of inspection to the military posts on the Arkansas, and he found about Fort Dodge some of the Comanches, Kiowas, Cheyennes, and Arapahoes with whom the commission had made treaties the fall previous, and he states that the Indians asked him "to have an interview with them; which he declined, stating to them that he was simply visiting the military posts to learn their condition and that of the soldiers, and that he was not authorized to talk with them."

It is to be observed that the Indians who sought this interview with General Sheridan were the same Indians that by the treaty of Medicine Lodge Creek had ceded their country to the Government, and were to have as a permanent home a reservation set apart for them south of the State of Kansas, but nothing had then been done to prepare it for occupancy. He found them near a military post, not in a hostile attitude. He refused them an audience, but was willing to hear others, and says:

> From all I could learn at Dodge there appeared to be outspoken dissatisfaction on the part of the Indians to removing to the reservation assigned to them by the treaty of Medicine Lodge Creek of the previous fall. I learned from officers and others that all the tribes considered the treaty of no importance, save to get the annuities promised them in it, and that they did not intend to remove to the reservation.

I am satisfied that had General Sheridan allowed these unlettered men to tell their own story to him, he would have learned that they were awaiting some one to inform them when they could be placed on the reservation and that they were impatient of the delay on the part of the Government. But he would not hear, preferring to listen to those who had schemes of their own and whose views harmonized with his own. He had decided in his own mind that the Indians should be "punished," and to justify his action they must be adjudged hostile; and he immediately set about the work of preparing for a military campaign against them. By what authority he inaugurated his campaign I know not. His theory was to get ready by fall with a large force and make what he termed a winter campaign "against the hostile Indians south of the Arkansas," and prove to the Indians that they would be soundly whipped during the winter, their leading men killed, their property destroyed, the tribes reduced to extreme poverty, and thus the Indian problem be solved. These Indians were not hostile, but he determined they should be. Before the meeting of the peace commission at Chicago in October, 1868, General Sheridan had his military plans perfected, and five different columns of troops were in the field, covering the territory between the line of the Smoky Hill Fork and the Republican Fork toward the north and the Cimarron and Canadian Rivers on the south. This formidable military movement was in direct conflict with all that the peace commission had been and were then doing, and contrasts strangely with the views expressed by that commission in its report of January 7, 1868, to the President. Instead of rebuking this restless man, the commission, at its Chicago meeting, yielded to his views, encouraged his movements, repudiated its own work, and by a sine die adjournment left General Sheridan master of the situation. His campaign was a very expensive one, and its climax an outrage that has no parallel in barbarity: the assassination of Black Kettle's band of friendly Cheyenne Indians on the Washita River, where they were legally and peacefully dwelling.

In June, 1869, General Sheridan issued an order in which the following paragraph appears:

> All Indians, when on their proper reservations, are under the exclusive jurisdiction of their agents. They will not be interfered with in any manner by the military except upon the requisition of the special agent resident among them, his superintendent, or the Bureau of Indian Affairs at Washington. Outside the well-defined limits of their reservations they are under the original and exclusive jurisdiction of the military authority, and as a rule will be considered as hostile.

This order is without lawful authority; it is a gross usurpation. It is to this day in force, and under it Indians are punished even to death. And here we have this strange condition of things: A board of peace commissioners, of whom General Sherman is one, making treaties with the Indians by which the right is guaranteed to them to roam and hunt outside of their reservations, and when found in the exercise of this right they are, under General Sheridan's order, regarded hostile, and remorselessly killed. Who can justify such conduct? And what kind of custodians of the Indians would the officers of the Army be who are guilty of such flagrant injustice? In such a state of things who can expect the Indians to be passive or that Indian outbreaks will not occur?

PIEGAN MASSACRE.

Does the House desire further evidence of ruthless massacres? Read the history of the Piegans and their massacre. I have it before me and from it I quote——

Mr. MAGINNIS. By whom?

Mr. COX. By Colonel Manypenny, former Indian Commissioner under President Pierce.

Mr. MAGINNIS. What does he know about it?

Mr. COX. He has been following the scoundrels about the Indian Department from the time he left the service as Indian Commissioner. He fought the Army, too, when Jeff. Davis had much to say about Indian affairs from a military stand-point. He has never flinched from his duty as a friend of the Indian; and his authority with good men is absolutely true.

Mr. HANCOCK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. COX. No, sir; not now.

Mr. HANCOCK. I do not think he was in the service much.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Texas has his speech already handsomely attached to the committee's report. I read it with great interest, as I do everything which comes from a man who bears so distinguished a centennial name. I read his remarks about the Indians with more than ordinary interest; for does he not tell the committee that the Indian is capable of great things? Did he not find among the Mexicans Indian poets? Did he not find their best president, Juarez himself, to be a pure Indian? Did he not find that a large body of the best of the Mexicans were Indians; and does he not believe that they are capable of improvement? He actually believes, without the doubt expressed on this side by others, that the Indian is capable of advancement; but, alas! he would place him under the Army. He knows not what he does. Perhaps his judgment may be colored by his associations on the border. I know there have been ruthless, horrible Indian barbarities upon his border. I would not fail by my vote to protect that border, as he well knows from my previous conduct here, as well from the Mexican marauder as from the treacherous savage. But the border is not the place to settle this question in a philanthropic, statesman-like view of it, if he will allow me to say so. Every border-man, I suppose, is in favor of the extermination of the Indians, or nearly all.

Mr. HANCOCK. You do injustice to the border-men.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] yield?

Mr. COX. I must decline to yield. I do not mean all the border-men; I mean all the border Congressmen, [laughter,] except the one gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WILSHIRE] who so nobly stands up in vindication of the red man of his neighborhood.

Let me proceed with the Piegan narrative.

General Sheridan concluded in October, 1869, that in the civilizing treatment of the Piegan Indians it was necessary to punish them, and that it would be the best plan to let him "find out exactly where these Indians are going to spend the winter, and about the time of a good heavy snow he would send out a party and try and strike them. About the 15th of January they will be very helpless, and if where they live is not too far from Shaw or Ellis we might be able to give them a good hard blow. * * * We must occasionally strike where it hurts, and if the General-in-Chief thinks well of this I will try and steal a small force on this tribe from Fort Shaw or Ellis during the winter."

On the 4th of November, 1869, General Sheridan was advised from headquarters at Washington that his plan for punishing the Piegans was approved by the General of the Army; that is, by General Sherman.

Preparations were therefore commenced, and Colonel Baker was selected, General Sheridan informing General Hancock that he (Sheridan) had had a personal conference with Baker on the subject when the latter was at Chicago on his route to Fort Ellis. General Hancock was admonished that the greatest care should be taken to keep the Indians from gaining any information on the subject.

The result of the expedition is announced in General Orders No. 1, headquarters at Chicago, March 12, 1870, by General Sheridan, in which he "takes great pleasure in announcing to the command the complete success of a detachment of Second Cavalry and Thirteenth Infantry under command of Brevet Colonel Baker, of the Second Cavalry, against a band of Piegan Indians in Montana. He concludes the bulletin thus:

One hundred and seventy-three Indians were killed, three hundred horses captured, and the village and property of the band totally destroyed.

The Lieutenant-General cannot commend too highly the spirit and the conduct of the troops and their command under the difficulties and hardships they experienced in the inclemency of the weather, and as one of the results of this severe but necessary and well-merited punishment of these Indians he congratulates the citizens of Montana upon the reasonable prospect of future security for their property and lives.

Lieutenant Pease, who was for the time being the agent of these Indians, reported the result of the expedition, as he was in duty bound to do, to General Sully, then acting as superintendent of Indian Affairs, and the latter made report to the Indian Office, at Washington. From Lieutenant Pease's report it seems that of the one hundred and seventy-three Indians killed only fifteen were what might be called fighting men, that is, men between the ages of twelve and thirty-seven years. Ten were from thirty-seven to sixty years of age, and eight additional were over sixty years. Fifty children under twelve years of age were killed. The village had been suffering for over two months with the small-pox raging in it, and some half dozen were dying daily.

The band attacked and thus destroyed were Red Horn's band, against which no charges of hostility had been made, and General Sully remarks in his report that it was to be regretted, since it was thought necessary to chastise a portion of the Piegans, "that Mountain Chief's band was not the band that suffered;" but this band was across the line in the British possessions.

The report of General Sully, which was simply the substance of that of Lieutenant Pease, in fact the transmission of the report of the latter to the Indian Bureau, as it was his duty by the regulation to make, so incensed General Sherman that he wrote to General Sheridan that—

General Sully, by communicating by telegraph the particulars of the fight for the use of Mr. Collyer did an unofficer-like and wrong act, and this will in the end stand to his discredit.

I give this as a sample of military treatment of Indians. It gave General Sheridan pleasure to announce to the Army the complete success of Baker without, to be sure, going into "the particulars of the fight;" and, when these are given, the General of the Army, though approving of the deed, is indignant at the officer who in the discharge of his duty states officially the facts in the case.

If the policy of butchering peaceful bands of Indians, even to women and children, is good, then the victors make fame by the publication of such achievements. To approve and order this to be done and then to denounce it as an offense on the part of the officers who tell it, is to notify all such that the public must not be apprised of the actual facts, and if the Indians be under Army treatment such cruel acts will inevitably be smothered.

In every aspect in which I view this question I turn away from the idea of giving the treatment of the Indians to the Army. The Piegan matter will show the unscrupulous and heartless conduct of the "high military officers," and this runs down through all grades. There are exceptions, to be sure, but they are few and would have no place or influence in the new order of things.

ARMY INFLUENCES.

General Sheridan on all occasions urges the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department, and if the thing be accomplished, no man in the Army would exercise equal influence with him in the management of our Indian affairs. He believes in extermination. He never speaks of any other kind of treatment toward the Indians but that of force. They must be "punished;" they must be struck "a hard blow;" they must be "wiped out." Such expressions as these are favorite terms with him.

General Sherman holds that extermination is proper, having expressed the sentiment in an official paper thus:

We must act with vindictive earnestness against the Sioux, even to their extermination, men, women, and children. Nothing less will reach the root of this case.

With such sentiments as are held by the General and Lieutenant-General of our Army, how admirably they would minister President Grant's "peace policy!"

THE ARMED PEACE POLICY.

Practically, ever since the "peace policy" of the President has been in operation, the Army, under Sheridan's order of June, 1869, has had the discipline of all Indians found outside of the well-defined limits of their reservations, and he has administered to them such treatment as may be expected in the future should the tribes be turned over to the tender care of the Army. I might cite, too, the operations of the Army from year to year, and give some appalling facts in the way of showing how rapidly the Indian population, by the surprise of peaceful villages and their slaughter, is being decimated. I could cite the exploits of Custer, Carr, Crook, Baker, &c., and show how remorselessly a war of extermination has been waged; and I am pained to say that I look in vain for any proper remonstrance against these outrages on the part of the board of Indian peace commissioners of whom the Hon. Felix Brunot was president, or of the mission boards of the various churches to whom the selection of agents was remitted, or even the Indian Bureau itself. On the contrary, these humanitarian gentlemen have been lavish in their compliments to Army officers for their courtesies and aid, and some have expressed the opinion that such military gentlemen as Sherman and Sheridan are more in sympathy with the "peace policy" than the Christian churches.

BLACK KETTLE MASSACRE.

Before I close I must give an insight into the manner in which the Army officers present to the untutored Indian their view of civilization.

General Sheridan's formidable and expensive campaign of 1868, against what he called the hostile Indians south of the Arkansas, resulted in the destruction of Black Kettle's band of friendly Cheyenne Indians. In the official report of the affair, which General Custer calls "the battle of the Washita," Custer says that on the morning of the 26th of November, 1868, his command struck a "trail of an Indian war party" at a point where the Texas boundary crosses the Canadian River, the direction of the trail being toward the southeast. He abandoned his wagons, tents, and all impediments to a rapid march. From daylight until nine o'clock at night the pursuit was unchecked. The horses and men were then allowed one hour for refreshments, and at ten o'clock the march was resumed, and continued until half past one o'clock at night, when the Osage Indian trailers reported an Indian village within one mile in advance. This was Black Kettle's village, the inhabitants of which were quietly reposing in profound sleep and unconscious of danger. General Custer withdrew to a retired point to avoid discovery, and after reconnoitering the location of the village, he and his subordinates planned the order of attack which was to take place at a given signal about daylight. The troops were thrown around the devoted village, and at dawn of day, the band playing "Garry Owen," the attack was made. "It was a complete surprise." Men charged the village and reached the lodges before the Indians were aware of the presence of the troops. The report, which I ask leave to insert in full, says:

The Indians left on the ground and in our possession the bodies of one hundred and three of their warriors, including Black Kettle himself, whose scalp is now in the possession of our Osage guides. We captured in good condition 875 horses, ponies, and mules, 241 saddles—some of very fine and costly workmanship—573 buffalo-robes, 390 buffalo-skins for lodges, 160 untanned robes, 210 axes, 140 hatchets, 35 revolvers, 47 rifles, 535 pounds powder, 1,050 pounds lead, 4,000 arrows and arrow-heads, 75 spears, 90 bullet-molds, 35 bows and quivers, 12 shields, 300 pounds bullets, 775 lariats, 940 buckskin saddle-bags, 470 blankets, 93 coats, 700 pounds tobacco. In addition, we captured all their winter supply of buffalo-meat, all their meal, flour, and other provisions, and, in fact, everything they possessed, even driving the warriors from the village with little or no clothing.

General Custer admits that some squaws and some children were killed, but does not give the number. The fact is the slaughter was indiscriminate. About noon, and long after the "battle" had ceased, General Custer says that the Kiowas and Arapahoes under Satanta and Little Raven, who were encamped about six miles farther down the stream, came to attempt the rescue, hoping to recover the squaws and herd of the Cheyennes.

CUSTER'S PROCESSION AND SHERIDAN'S SCALP-DANCE.

General Custer made and transmitted his official report to General Sheridan on the 28th November, 1868, and then immediately set out to return to Camp Supply, the headquarters of General Sheridan, to receive in person the congratulations of that officer. So great was his haste, that he left the body of Major Elliott and a number of soldiers killed in the affair on the field unburied, to be the prey of wild beasts. Of course he gave no attention to the bodies of the slaughtered Cheyennes. His troops were wearied and exhausted and required repose, but they were pressed forward, and actually appeared at Camp Supply on the morning of the 1st of December, 1868. The column camped about ten miles distant the previous night, and a courier was sent in to herald the arrival of Custer the following morning. An eye-witness and ready writer thus describes the pageant:

Shortly after the sun had passed its meridian a cluster of dark and almost indefinable objects appearing upon the crest of the hill about a mile distant, simultaneously accompanied with shouts and the firing of musketry, announced the approach of the column. On the summit of the hill the head of the column halted for a few moments. Meanwhile General Sheridan took position in the valley to await the column which was to pass the commanding general in review. All the officers and soldiers not on duty assembled in the vicinity of the fort to witness the warlike pageant.

The column was now within a short distance of the commanding general, the Indians (the Osage trailers belonging to the expedition) shouted, the band reiterated the stirring tones of "Garry Owen," and the troopers cheered. In reponse rounds of huzzas from the troops of the fort shouted welcome and congratulation. In advance were the Osage Indian trailers. Before leaving camp this morning they had arrayed and decorated themselves in a manner becoming the importance of the occasion. Their faces were painted in the most fantastic and hideous designs. About their persons were dangling the trophies they had captured in battle. Spears upon which were fastened the scalps of their fallen foes were slung upon their shoulders; from their own painted scalp-locks were suspended long trails of silver ornaments and feathers; over their shoulders hung shields and bows and quivers full of arrows, while in one hand they held their trusty rifle and with the other grasped the reins.

Even the animals which the Osages bestrode were decorated with scalps and strips of red and blue blanket. At the head of the band rode Little Beaver, the chief, with a countenance as fixed as stone, yet in his bearing showing indications of self-glorification, which was apparently kept stirring and swelling higher and higher by the gesticulations and wild notes of the war-songs shouted by his warriors, intermingled with whoops and the discharge of rifles. In a moment of enthusiasm the chief shouted, "They call us Americans; we are Osages!" to which sentiment went up a responsive yell of approval. Conspicuous in this party was the young Osage warrior, Koom-la-Manche, (Trotter.) It was he, under the impulse of the highest ambition of Indian valor, that singled out the great chief, Black Kettle, the terror of all the Osages, as his victim. After a severe conflict he reached the crowning point of his efforts, and bore away the ghastly scalp of the terrible chief as the trophy attaching to his success. With a mark of special attention this scalp was carefully and fantastically decorated and hung prominently among the most sacred possessions of the young warrior.

Following the Indians were the scouts, led by California Joe, a veteran pioneer of more than forty years. Joe is a hirsute-looking specimen of humanity, exhibiting an altitude of six feet, a mat of red whiskers hiding two-thirds of his face, and a long, knotty head of hair, well powdered in a series of coats of dust, intermixed with stray blades of grass, leaves, and sticks, as the vestiges of his previous night's slumbers on mother earth. Joe was a suitable figure-head for the motley band of curiously-clad, brave, adventurous, and rugged men. Next came General Custer, riding alone, mounted on a magnificent black stallion, and dressed in a short blue sack-coat trimmed with the color of his arm of the service and re-enforced with fur collar and cuffs. On his head he wore an otter cap. When General Custer came within fifty yards of the commanding general he left his position in the column and dashed up to his chief, when a warm and hearty exchange of salutations was made between the commander and his distinguished and successful lieutenant.

Next followed the living evidences of the victory—over fifty squaws and their children, surrounded by a suitable guard to prevent their escape. These were mounted on their own ponies, seating themselves astride the animals, their persons wrapped in skins and blankets, even their heads and faces being covered, leaving nothing visible but their eyes. The mothers had their offspring mounted behind them, the papoose being visible only by its diminutive head peering up over the back of the head of its mother. As many as three were mounted on some of the ponies. Without a sigh, without a glance to the right or left, this remnant of the band of the once powerful Black Kettle followed with all the submission of captives. Following them came the keen-sighted sharp-shooters, commanded by Brevet Lieutenant Colonel Cook, and following the bravest men in the different companies of the regiment, in column by platoons under their proper officers.

On a separate line of march from the summit came the wagon-train pouring over the hill. In the lead were the ambulances conveying the dead and wounded. The regiment moved up the Beaver about half a mile from the fort and there went into camp.

The next evening after the arrival of this cavalcade at Camp Supply, the Osage trailers and some Kaw Indians gave a scalp-dance in honor of Custer's fete on the Washita, which is described by the same writer as follows:

The scene was one of savage effect. The burning logs in the center, the Indians painted and attired in war costumes, with spears, bows, shields, and all the trophies taken by them about their persons, performed their mysterious contortions of the body and whooped wildly as if about to engage their foe. One of the Kaw warriors stepping forward said he would be buried under the ground sooner than run from the enemy. This sentiment was received with a shout of approval. Each made his profession of bravery when he should meet the enemy. The dance lasted until a late hour. Generals Sheridan and Custer and a large number of officers witnessed the scene.

Can it be possible that treatment of our Indian population will ever be confided to the Army in which the highest officers are capable of participating in such cruel, wicked, and barbarous practices?

A PERMANENT PEACE POLICY.

The policy which should be pursued toward the Indians by the Government, not for one year, or for five, or ten, but as a permanent, well-defined, intelligent policy, should now be determined. If it is the intention of the advocates of this bill by its passage to settle the question as to the future treatment of the Indians, few if any graver questions can receive the consideration of this Congress.

The consideration of this bill involves the fate of a race. The main question in respect to it is whether the hope of the civilization of the Indian tribes is to be given up. If so, then we should adopt some plan by which we can most cheaply and efficiently protect the white people from Indian hostilities as the race gradually perishes. If it ought to be assumed, as many seem to assume, that the aborigines are destined to pass away as the buffalo is passing away, then perhaps the only question worth our consideration is whether it may not be cheaper for the Government to simply establish an efficient military police throughout the immense regions of the West to see that there shall be no flagrant violations of the peace, but allow the Indian to gradually succumb to influences for his destruction which will inevitably surround him.

A savage race always must fall before a civilized race unless the disparity of numbers is tremendously in their favor, or unless the civilized race protects and aids them. The survival of the fittest makes this result inevitable.

But does it become a great nation to assume that three hundred thousand people, who in many respects, both physical and mental, are the equal if not the superior of other races to which I have referred, which have been elevated from barbarism to civilization, are hopeless savages? If, in spite of every possible effort which we can make, that in the end should prove to be true, does it become us to assume it? Is it not our duty to make one honest, faithful, persevering, even very costly effort to avert such a doom? Do not our benevolence and fair fame demand that much?

For more than two centuries we have had an almost continual spirit, if not a state of war, broken by armistices with the Indian. He has been driven from his home, from one home to another, with little regard to his wishes and with no regard to his interests. He has retaliated for his own injuries, or supposed injuries, with savage brutality. But war, whisky, disease, and chicanery, backed by overwhelming numbers and the power of civilization, have at last put him into our power completely. He is at our feet and at our mercy. Everywhere, in every State and in every Territory, the white man is more numerous and ten times more powerful than the Indian. We have taken his land; we have destroyed his game; we have convinced him that he is powerless.

CONTRAST OF POLICIES.

Now, how shall we treat him? What shall we try to make of him? To any one not versed in the conflict on this topic the testimony collected by the Indian Committee in its report is a puzzle of contradictions. Even the members of Congress whose opinions are collated differ widely. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] insists that the Indian must be civilized. He traces the blood of the Indian in the veins of Mexican poets and presidents, and does not depreciate him as a human being, even when he would place him under the Army. The Delegate from New Mexico finds the Pueblo a man who works for wages and has ninety thousand sheep, and soon to be self-supporting. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GUNTER] and the Delegate from Montana evidently are afraid of the War Department. Other testimony is of a mixed nature; while another gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WILSHIRE] has no uncertain voice as to the demoralizing tendencies of war rule. The testimony of Dr. Dart (page 33) is almost conclusive as to this lamentable result.

There are two general plans of treatment proposed: The "peace policy," as it is called, is to put the Indian on limited reservations of land, protect him on that land from intrusion and spoliation, give to him instruction in the arts of peace, and provide him such assistance as his necessities most require. That he will need much assistance is beyond a doubt. It is a long road from barbarism to civilization, and if we undertake, in one or two generations, to raise the Indian to the level which it has taken our race a thousand years to reach, it will no doubt be very costly. But at each advancing step, if the attempt succeed at all, the cost will grow less. All the evidence we have (and, as the present able Indian Commissioner states, there is much more than usually seems to be supposed) tends to show that under favorable circumstances with full protection and adequate aid the Indians are rapidly acquiring the art of providing themselves with food. Some of the tribes already produce an abundance of corn, wheat, and cattle for their own supply. This is notably the case with the civilized tribes in the Indian Territory. Before the war they had hundreds of thousands of cattle, and in a few years they will be able to count them by the million. Doubtless these Indians have advanced more than most of the others, but rapid progress is being made in many places and among various tribes. There is a constant call upon the Indian Office for supplies of farming implements and seeds. This demand is so great that it can be met only to a very limited extent.

It is not claimed, it cannot be claimed, that the supplies actually furnished are always, if ever, used with the most care, intelligence, and profit. That cannot be expected. But the fact is beyond question that real substantial progress is made from year to year, and if the present peace policy is persistently pursued and its methods improved as experience may suggest, there is good reason to hope, if not to believe, that in a few more years it will be demonstrated that the Indian may in time not only become self-supporting, but that he may, as some tribes have already become, be elevated to respectable and useful citizenship.

This policy is in its infancy. No doubt it needs much amendment in administration. Time and experience will correct mistakes and errors. Inefficient and incompetent men will have to be got rid of. The confidence of the Indians as yet is only partially acquired. He grudgingly surrenders his wild independence. He very slowly and reluctantly abandons the idea that labor is degrading. He is as tenacious of his wild customs and as averse to toil as the Scotch highlander was two centuries ago. His superstitions, his traditions, and his personal tastes all have to be revolutionized.

DIFFICULTIES OF THE INDIAN SERVICE AND HOW MET.

One of the principal difficulties which lies in the way of the successful administration of our Indian affairs arises from the fact that very much of the greater part of the service is performed in the most remote and frequently inaccessible regions of the country. Our Indian agents are not and cannot be under the same sort of constant espionage and supervision that officers in other Government Departments are. There are and must of necessity be unusual facilities in the service for fraud. But as the management is perfected, as the country is opened up, as railroads, telegraphs, and mail facilities come into more frequent use, as the agents are brought more and more under the observation and criticism of the public it is fair to suppose that the public service will become purer and more efficient.

The aim of this policy is to throw around the Indian the best influences of a Christian civilization and sympathy. We aim to send to live with him at least one upright, virtuous family. We see to send him to aid and care for him a good physician in place of his ignorant, superstitious "medicine-man." We usually send to him a farmer to instruct him in the simplest processes of agriculture. We send him a teacher to teach those of his children who can be got into school, and it is gratifying to know that many of the schools are well filled with willing scholars. Joined to all this which is done by the Government is the active, earnest, efficient help of nearly all the religious organizations of the land. Suppose you turn over to the Army the control of the Indians. What is to be gained? Of course you must put into immediate and direct management of all the tribes men whose very presence is a menace. The Indian will understand that hereafter he is to fear and obey.

BAD CONTACT—DISEASE.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] has dwelt, with no pleasure in his kind heart, upon the demoralizing influences of the Indian system, which allows contact between the baser elements of the white and red races. But he should not forget the report made to us in 1868 by the Indian Commissioner. Let him remember the results of our establishment of military posts: six or eight hundred half-breeds vagabondizing around Fort Laramie. It is the same at the Missouri forts. Fort Sumner, in New Mexico, was an illustration. Massacres by wholesale, as at Sand Creek, are as nothing to the syphilitic poisons about military posts. In the report of the committee there is testimony on this point worth considering. Peruse the statement of Dr. Dart, (page 33.) He says, somewhat vaguely but all too suggestively:

You observe—perhaps you already know the fact—that, prior to 1850, for seventeen years the Indians were under the control of the Army; and if you will take the trouble to look at Mr. Taylor's report of that matter, he will show you the enormous cost of the indiscretion of the Army in the management of the Indians. I was first brought to the views that I have now in regard to the merits of the question by noticing the great number of half-breeds surrounding the military reservations. The number is astonishing. It would astonish any man to go into the country around the reservations and see the great number of half-breed children of all ages.

Those who are disposed to peace and who wish to have their wives, young men, and children grow up and hold the lands, says Mr. Kimball, are bitterly hostile to military government, and, as we can guess, for some other reasons than the constitutional inhibition against quartering soldiers.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. Chairman, we must purify our civil service. But still the service of the Government must be a civil service, except to the small and very limited extent where force is absolutely required to maintain the civil authority. I would in no case, except for that purpose alone and for the defense against a foreign foe, employ the Army.

But suppose you put an honorable, upright officer in charge of an Indian agency. What is the result? He must be surrounded with soldiers, at least as far as the employés are required. The command he will exercise over them must be despotic. What sort of farmers and millers and blacksmiths and teachers is he likely to get from the ranks of his company or regiment? In many cases, including families, there is now quite a little community of white people at the agencies, each one of whom is a missionary of civilization and culture. Can the officer with his dozen soldiers take their places? They could do so just to this extent: They could receive and distribute supplies of food and clothing, and they could compel the obedience of the Indians. The accounts might be rendered correctly. But the day this bill passes you close every Indian school. You no longer teach the Indian to farm or hold out to him the hand of encouragement and assistance. The private soldier in time of peace is, as every one knows, too often taken from the most ignorant and degraded classes of society; and these are the men whom you propose to put into daily and hourly contact with Indians of all ages and of each sex. What must be the inevitable result? The records before me show this too well and too sadly.

It may be that you can preserve the peace. But that, it is manifest, we can now do under the peace policy. Indeed, except a small band of Sioux, who have never acknowledged the Government at all, and whom the Army now is endeavoring to subdue, we are at peace with all our Indian tribes. That they are at last conscious it is better for them to remain at peace, whatever provocation they may receive, is proven by the fact that many hundreds of men are at this moment, in violation of treaty engagements, invading and occupying the reservation of the most powerful and warlike tribe on the continent without having so far excited an Indian war.

The Apaches of Arizona, numbering several thousands, who were three or four years ago at war with us, are to-day so profoundly at peace, that the agent not only has requested the withdrawal of troops from the reservation, but has organized an Indian police, who aid him in the most efficient manner in keeping in subjection to the authority of the Government those fierce warriors, and Arizona is to-day as safe to the white citizen or traveler as Maryland.

But, sir, this Indian question is not simply a question of policy. Is it not a question of statesmanship? Is it not a question of statesmanship as difficult as any which has risen in our history? For several generations we have been dealing with it in a fragmentary, desultory way, sometimes fighting the Indian at the cost of many millions and then buying a peace with him at the cost of many millions more. Sometimes we have treated him generously and sometimes meanly, rarely with justice. Sometimes he is the noble red man, dressed in all the glowing fancies of poetry; sometimes he is an unmitigated, barbarous, treacherous savage. He has done us infinite harm, and we have done him infinite harm. At last the way seems to be open to settle with him our long dispute. He is helpless; we are powerful. At last, in almost every instance, over half of our territory, he asks for peace and begs for kindness and help. Shall we turn to him a deaf ear?

The true way to deal with this Indian question is to make the "peace policy" more and more perfect. The Indian Office should have at its head a man of clear head and honest heart. He should have sufficient power and means conferred on him to do those things which in a wise discretion should be done. The duties of the office are to some extent anomalous. In every other Department our officers have to deal exclusively with civilized men. The Indian service is among savages and those who are just rising from the savage state. As I have already said, the service is remote. In the purchase of supplies and in the aid generally to the Indians a very large discretion has to be conferred. No other officer in the Government must necessarily have so large a discretion. The soundest judgment should be exercised, and doubtless even the soundest judgment will sometimes fail. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs should make himself thoroughly familiar with all the circumstances which surround each Indian tribe, and deliberately and intelligently decide what can be done to aid them most effectually without too much cost.

If you have an able man or can get one for this work, a few years will solve the problem I believe that, if you will faithfully fulfill all your agreements with the Indian; if you will keep white men from trespassing upon and abusing him; if you will give him a sure guarantee that he shall be protected in a suitable home; if you will keep whisky away from him, and give him for a few years intelligent aid, that he can be civilized. But at all events, whether we succeed or fail, I shall be ashamed of Congress and of my countrymen if we do not make a fair trial.

IN CONCLUSION,

Therefore, let me say, that by all the sanctions of economy, faith, justice, humanity, honor, statesmanship, and civilization, the peaceful policy is that which is kindest, wisest, and best. Besides, it is the policy of human advancement. If Rome made her mission grand by the rule of men "entirely great" who studied the arts of peace; if, in deference to classic morals and in the fulfillment of Hebrew prophecy, and as the consummate flower of the holiest of religions—we are to look forward to an era when material and moral devastation shall cease, and men shall learn that violence is chaotic and destructive; if mankind is destined to make this world better for living in it,—then let the very forests and plains of our land, where the Indian roams, echo the glad tidings of great joy which ushered into our fallen star with angelic anthems the Prince of Peace himself, by whom the beatitudes were so gloriously promised to the peace-makers!

Mr. COOK obtained the floor.

Mr. HURLBUT. In consideration of the lateness of the hour and as the House has to take a recess in less than ten minutes, I ask the gentleman from Georgia to yield to me to move that the committee rise.

Mr. COOK. I yield for that motion.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HOLMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2677) to transfer the Office of Indian Affairs from the Interior to the War Department, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BLOUNT for three days on account of business, and to Mr. CHITTENDEN for two days on account of a death in his family.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; which were signed by the Speaker:

An act (H. R. No. 1488) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railroad Company;

An act (H. R. No. 1580) granting a pension to Almon P. Graves;

An act (H. R. No. 2305) granting a pension to Melville H. Hudson;

An act (H. R. No. 2482) for the relief of Charles W. Mackey, late first lieutenant Tenth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Volunteer Corps; and

An act (H. R. No. 2800) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay judgments provided for in an act approved February 15, 1876, entitled "An act providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order of business, which, I believe, is the calling of the yeas and nays on the motion made just before we went into Committee of the Whole to refer a bill to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. LANE. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LANE] will not make that motion, but will let us have an evening session for the further consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. LANE. I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

A. J. PRICE.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3025) granting a pension to A. J. Price, sergeant of Company A, Sixteenth United States Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

RELATIVE RANK OF OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3026) to fix and determine the relative rank of officers of the several corps of the Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

OSCAR S. COLLINS.

Mr. EAMES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3027) granting a pension to Oscar S. Collins; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ADOLPH MÜLLER.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3028) for the relief of Adolph Müller, of Madison County, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-SHIP IN MASSACHUSETTS BAY.

Mr. FROST, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3029) to appropriate money to place a light-ship with steam-whistle attached upon Stelwagen's Bank, in Massachusetts Bay; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

VENEZUELAN INDEMNITY FUND.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, by unanimous consent, submited the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish this House, if, in his opinion, it is not incompatible with the public interest, with a statement of the amount of money in gold received from the republic of Venezuela since the 5th of August, 1868, in payment of the interest due on American claims, with the dates of such payments; and also to specify the percentage distributed in gold to the American claimants, with dates, and the amount in gold, if any, now remaining in the State Department applicable to the payment of said American claimants, with the reason why further distribution is withheld.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting a statement of the contingent expenses of that Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and moved that the same be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

The hour of half past four having arrived, the House, pursuant to order, took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The hour of half past seven having arrived, the House resumed its session, Mr. HOLMAN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. COX. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last night there was no amendment pending to this bill.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following:

For compensation to the following in the office of the President of the United States, namely: For private secretary, $3,150; assistant secretary, $2,250; one executive clerk at $2,000, steward at $1,500, and messenger at $980; in all, $9,880.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "one executive clerk at $2,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "three executive clerks at $2,000 each."

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by inserting "two" instead of "three." That was the understanding in the Committee on Appropriations, I believe.

Mr. HALE. Accept that.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well; I will modify my amendment so as to make it "two executive clerks."

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out "$980" and inserting "$1,200" as the compensation of the messenger. As there has been one additional clerk inserted in this paragraph on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] his salary will have to be added to the total for the paragraph.

Mr. HALE. The salary of the additional clerk is $2,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the total for the paragraph should be $12,100 instead of $9,880.

The amendment of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For contingent expenses of the executive office, including stationery therefor, $2,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out "$2,000" and inserting "$4,000." The estimate for the contingent expenses of the executive office was $6,000, and I believe the appropriation last year for this purpose was $6,000. I learn upon examination that over $1,100 was expended last year for telegrams alone. I think $2,000 will not be enough for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. The reason the committee struck that out was that we considered $6,000 entirely too much. Upon research we found that during Mr. Lincoln's administration the expense for this item was but $1,000. We thought we would allow this Administration to be twice as extravagant as the administration of Mr. Lincoln. Two thousand dollars we consider quite enough.

Mr. HALE. A great deal of the business of the executive office at that time came in a loose way from appropriations for other Departments. I suggest to the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations to consent to make the amount $3,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I think $2,000 is enough. We have consented to allow this office one more clerk than the bill as printed proposes. I think that $1,100 for telegraphing is a little excessive.

Mr. FOSTER. I modify my amendment so as to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$3,000."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. FOSTER as modified, there were—ayes 28, noes 41; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FOSTER and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 26, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For official postage-stamps, $600.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read.

Mr. Chairman, in 1873, I believe at the close of the fiscal year, the franking privilege was abolished by an act passed a little prior to that time. There was a great flourish of trumpets in reference to the saving that would accrue to the Post-Office Department by virtue of that measure. I want to state in the outset that it never has saved the Government one penny, but has absolutely added over $50,000 to the expenses of the Department every year since the measure was adopted. Though I have but five minutes, I think I can show this satisfactorily.

The first thing that was done upon the abolition of the franking privilege was to provide some means by which 35,000 or 40,000 postmasters in the United States could have the franking privilege by virtue of official stamps and some means by which the executive departments could also have the franking privilege in the same way; and, in arranging this, the first thing that was done (and I have the official figures before me) was to spend $50,000 for plates from which to print those official postage-stamps; and every year since that time $50,000, in round numbers, have been spent for the purpose of printing those official postage-stamps and furnishing official stamped envelopes; and what for? Purely that the account might be kept between the Post-Office Department and the other branches of the Government; that and nothing more. It never has yielded one cent of revenue in fact.

I know that the money appropriated for these stamps is counted as revenue. One million seven hundred thousand dollars in round numbers was returned in that way for the first year, 1873, and $1,100,000 in round numbers for the last fiscal year. But no money ever came in. It was a credit to the Post-Office Department without any money.

Now it appears that there is a franking privilege for the executive departments by means of these official stamps; there is a franking privilege for 40,000 postmasters in this country as to official business by aid of these official stamps; and nobody who ever had the franking privilege is deprived of it in fact except members of this House and of the Senate.

These official stamps we have to make and pay for, putting our hands into the Treasury every year and taking out the cost thereof in clean cash and making it a present to the printers of these stamps, in order that these people who had the franking privilege before may still have it at the additional expense of cost of stamps.

Now, who else has the franking privilege in this country? The newspapers practically have it or those who take the papers. Many of them have been making a great deal of fuss ever since I have been in Congress and before about the franking privilege of members to Congress. I have the data before me to show that eight-tenths of all the mail matter that passes through the mails of the country consists of newspapers and periodicals. Now the expenditures of the Post-Office Department are in round numbers $36,000,000 a year. Eight-tenths of all this expense is paid out that the newspapers may pass through the mails at a cost of say $25,000,000. How much do you suppose these newspapers pay or the people who get them pay as postage thereon? Less than $1,000,000 per annum; an absolute loss to the Department of over $24,000,000 per annum in order that the newspapers may practically go free through the mails.

I am not complaining of this, nor would I change it, for the circulation of papers and periodicals is necessary for the dissemination of knowledge among the people, and should have as few burdens attached as possible, but I refer to it to show the fact as to why the Post-Office Department does not pay expenses.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL obtained the floor and said: I yield the time to which I am entitled to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] that he may conclude his remarks.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. So much for the franking privilege to forty-thousand postmasters, to all the Executive Departments, and the franking privilege practically to the newspapers of the country or the people who receive them at an actual loss to the Department of $24,000,000 per annum.

Now, about one-tenth of all the mail matter consists of letters, which pay, in round numbers, $23,000,000 postage annually.

Mr. BUCKNER. Has the gentleman made any calculation how many messengers or other employés it requires to do the stamp-licking at the Departments? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Well, I should think it would take oceans of saliva. [Laughter.] Of course that is an expense to be taken into consideration. You may go back and look at the estimates of the Postmaster-General and the appropriations since the franking privilege was ostensibly abolished, and you will find that the Third Assistant Postmaster-General in 1873 claimed that he must have more clerks because he has more duties to perform in the handling of official stamps, and more clerks have been granted him.

It is about time, Mr. Chairman, that this foolishness was stopped. How much do you think the franking privilege would cost if members had it for public documents?—and I only advocate the restoration of the franking privilege so far as public documents are concerned. Let members continue to pay postage on their correspondence. The people want these documents. Suppose it cost $300 a year for each member, how much would that be? It would be $112,000, counting three hundred and seventy-five Members and Senators. Yet you pay more than half that amount each year to the printers for printing official stamps and manufacturing official stamped envelopes.

I undertake to say Postmaster-General Jewell was right when he said that the restoration of the franking privilege so far as sending public documents through the mails without one cent of postage would not make any appreciable difference in the expenditure of the Post-Office Department. This is true, as I have shown time and again upon this floor. It will be apparent when you recollect that you have the machinery to carry on anyhow. In fact, Postmaster-General Jewell tells us that he took up tons and tons of books under temporary restoration of the franking privilege and sent them broadcast over the country and absolutely did not perceive it as affecting the mails.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the effect of making this appropriation of $600 is simply a mode of furnishing the facilities for free mailage to the Executive Departments, and at the same time to make appropriation of money to the Post-Office Department. The gentleman from Illinois thinks it will be safer and better to go back to the franking privilege. The expense to the Government for the printing of these official postage-stamps is very slight. It accomplishes at least one good purpose. It prevents the fraudulent use of the frank in the Departments of the Government. That was its main object. That was the main object of the abolition of the franking privilege. It was to prevent fraudulent use of a frank. It was impossible the postmasters of this entire country, or any considerable number of them, could know the genuineness of the frank of any person connected with any one Department of the Government. So far as any mail matter from any Department of the Government under the franking privilege is concerned, it necessarily went free, no matter whether it was public or private business. The effect of private official stamps has been to cure that evil, for no person could apprehend the executive office would permit these stamps, the character of which is known by every person in this country, to be used for private business. There is a reasonable guarantee, therefore, the stamps will not be used for any other than the legitimate purpose of public business.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I see the point the gentleman makes. I ask the gentleman if there had been any abuse to any great extent of the kind indicated, then the abolition of the franking privilege with its abuses and the substitution of stamps would have shown a saving to the Department. Does not the fact that there is not any such saving show the abuse which was much talked about was really very small? The transportation of matter is as much under a system of stamps as it was under your system of franks.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think the gentleman can assume safely there has been no saving on the part of the Government.

Mr. HALE. There was some abuse, but it was small.

Mr. HOLMAN. There was no such extensive saving as the recent Postmaster-General assumed there would be. Every person understands his calculations were all fictitious; but at the same time there has been in fact a very material saving to the Government by the abolition of the franking privilege, and by this mode alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to strike out the last word, and will yield my time to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. That there were frauds perpetrated upon the Post-Office Department under the old order of things, I think every fair-minded man must admit; and that this is the only remedy suggested is equally clear. That it does limit the amount of free mail matter which comes from each Department of the Government is clear beyond all question.

Now, the cost of furnishing these stamps is but a trifling matter and of no consequence. And having said that much, I wish to call the attention of the House to the result of striking this out. We will have to revise all the estimates. The Post-Office estimates are based upon the assumption that a certain amount of revenue will come to the Post-Office Department by appropriations through this channel.

We appropriate to each Department of the Government certain sums of money for stamps. That is a portion of the appropriations for the Post-Office Department. All this has got to be revised if you abandon the present practice, and provide for the free use of the franking privilege in every Department of the Government.

This is the first test of that question which has been attempted during the present Congress, I believe. I trust the committee will not accept the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois. If it be thought desirable to return to the old system, which I think it is not, I believe it is better to make the usual appropriations to the various Departments during the present session of Congress, and then to repeal the present law providing for stamps, and to restore the franking privilege to take effect at some future day. Then no inconvenience and no embarrassment would result. But gentlemen must see that the striking out of this particular item must be followed by a long series of measures, a long series of estimates, and further appropriations to the Post-Office Department which have not been in contemplation up to this time, and which cannot really be entered upon at so late a stage in this session of Congress.

I trust, therefore, that the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his amendment. Let us make our appropriations to the Post-Office Department through this channel as heretofore, and if it is thought desirable to go back to the franking privilege with all its abuses, let it be done by a repeal of the law to take effect at some future time, before the appropriations are made for the following fiscal year.

I agree with all the gentleman has said on the subject of the postage on third-class matter; but I trust he will not bring so incongruous a subject into the debate on so simple a question as this: the abolition of the franking privilege in the Departments and the substitution of stamps. The gentleman must bear another fact in mind: A single clerk, a female clerk, will apply stamps with great rapidity, and perform the labor of giving the quality of free matter to matter going from a Department, which would require the services of many clerks under the other system. That is to be taken into account also. We have to provide an increased number of clerks for every one of the Departments of the Government if this change is made. The gentleman must see that this is a serious matter, and I trust that he will not press his motion.

I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. I renew it.

Mr. Chairman, I have renewed the formal amendment in order to call the attention of the committee to a most unwarranted statement and attack upon the Postmaster of the House in the remarks of my friend from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] last night. It is in these words, as his remarks are reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The man from whom we hire the horses and wagons will not deliver the mails. The mails are to be delivered by the messengers of the House post-office. The man with whom we contract agrees only to furnish seven wagons and seven horses. This is now done by the Postmaster himself, and he to-day is making $4,000 or $5,000 a year out of this business. We propose that this money, which now goes into the pocket of the Postmaster, increasing his perquisites, shall be put into the Treasury of the United States.

I desire to say, sir, that that is entirely erroneous, and I am surprised that the gentleman from Missouri should have fallen into so egregious a mistake. The Postmaster of the House has nothing in the world to do with this matter, except to contract with this man to furnish the horses and wagons. I will read here a memorandum which has been furnished to me by the Postmaster of the House, and it is as follows:

> The Postmaster has nothing whatever to do with the mail-contractor, except to give out the contract and certify to his account. The contractor furnishes seven wagons and eight horses each day, for which he receives $12.50 per day, or at the rate of $2.50 each for five wagons and five horses. No money passes through the Postmaster's hands, nor has he any interest in the contract. The accounts of the contractor have to be approved by the Committee of Accounts and paid by the Clerk.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I have not read the report of my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. But I will say this, that, so far as the profits of the Postmaster are concerned, I had been informed that it had been the custom for the Postmaster heretofore to own the horses and wagons himself.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Postmaster never owned the horses and wagons. He has hired them all.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I will say this, that I look upon the present Postmaster of the House as being a high-minded man in all respects, and I would be sorry to do anything or say anything that would do him injustice; and if I have done him injustice in any remarks, I take them back.

Mr. HUNTON. That is satisfactory. At the same time I must say that I cannot see how the gentleman from Missouri could have made the charge contained in his remarks last night without some idea that he was reflecting on an officer who, I will undertake to say as a high-minded man and a gentleman, is the peer of any man on this floor.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I wish to say a word or two more on this matter. I will state, sir, that my calculation was made entirely on the number of wagons which this bill proposes to allow for this work. I made the calculation on the supposition that the Postmaster was furnishing the horses and wagon. That was my impression, and I was so informed. My calculation was made on the impression that the Postmaster was getting at the rate of $10 a day for each horse and wagon used during the short session of Congress; that is, that he would be getting pay for twelve months while he was only doing the work for three months. It was a simple matter of calculation. That, getting $2.50 a day during the year and only working a fourth of the time, he was receiving at the rate of $10 per day during the short session for each horse and wagon; and which would leave him, on a fair calculation with regard to the expenses of the horses, a profit of at least about $4,000. That is my calculation. I do not impugn anything in the action of the present Postmaster of the House, but I may have been misinformed.

Mr. HUNTON. I was going to say if the gentleman had gone to the Postmaster himself he would have ascertained all the facts.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I did not expect when I rose to make any remarks. I did not expect to be called on to explain this matter. I had not taken any particular interest in the matter until my attention was called to it by gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. HUNTON. I withdraw my formal amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. CANNON, of Illinois; and on a division there were ayes 49, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] a few minutes ago stated that the cost of printing these official stamps is now merely nominal. I do not so understand it, and I read from a statement that I obtained to-day from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, and which is as follows:

SIR: The cost of making plates for official stamps was $50,000; the cost of manufacturing official stamps for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, was $23,856.07; the cost of official stamped envelopes for the same period was $13,486.08; the cost of official stamps for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, was $14,764.74, of official stamped envelopes for the same period, $35,252.76, and the official envelopes were for the State and Post-Office Departments.

E. W. BARBER,
Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Now, then, let the gentleman's statement stand upon the one side and mine on the other, with mine backed by the Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much does he say it amounts to?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The statement of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General has just been read and speaks for itself. Now, the gentleman says, if the franking privilege is to be restored let it be restored in some other way. We are not now considering the restoration of the franking privilege. We are considering, under the rule which you have adopted, whether or no we cannot save the cost of these official stamps. I want to see whether you are in favor of retrenchment and reform or not, or whether you want to continue to give to the bank-note companies of Philadelphia and New York this large sum of money for printing stamps that are of no use to the Government and only benefit the bank-note companies.

Ah, but says the gentleman from Indiana, there will have to be more clerks if you give the Department the franking privilege instead of using stamps. Not so; the official records show that more clerks are required for licking the stamps and handling the same than were required for the franking.

I therefore trust that when this item is reached in the next paragraph it will be stricken out, so that the heads of the Department or Bureau shall have the right to frank these official letters and matters that now pass under the frank of these official stamps.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to consume time in the discussion of this question, because the committee has already passed on it and rejected the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.] But I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the evil is not in the law, which was the best substitute we could get on abolishment of the franking privilege; the only evil is in its execution. My friend knows very well that if $50,000 is expended for this purpose it is a misappropriation of the public money, a wrongful appropriation of it. The gentleman knows very well that scarcely one-fifth of that sum of money would be necessary for this purpose. The experience of every citizen must show him that the expense of clerical hire for placing these stamps on the various documents sent from our Departments will cost far less than the clerical force necessary to write a frank on every document, without reference to the frauds which are usually perpetrated under the franking privilege.

Sir, I do not pretend to say what may be the extravagance of carrying this simple law into effect. I speak of what was to be presumed, that it is a mere bagatelle; and the extravagance, if extravagance there be, arises from the administration of the law, and not from the law itself. But, for my part, I do not intend by my silence to give my sanction to the proposition involved here of a restoration of the franking privilege. In my judgment, it was a system full of fraud in every part of the Government, not excepting the legislative branch of the Government. It was a system to be got rid of, and one that members of Congress should not desire to have in existence, because their names were liable to be counterfeited on every hand, and in such a manner as to work fraud on the Government.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Does not the gentleman know that the most objectionable portion of the franking privilege has already been restored, and that any buncombe speeches made on this floor, any Agricultural Report published, any seeds sent out from the Agricultural Department, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD all go free under the present system?

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the Agricultural Report is sent free through the mails. And if anything is to be sent free, I think it should be the Agricultural Report. I understand that the seeds purchased for distribution by the Agricultural Bureau are sent free, and I think if anything should go free, next to the Agricultural Reports, that is proper enough. And perhaps it is well enough that the record of what transpires here in Congress should pass free through the country without restraint or limitation. To that extent I was myself willing to go; but I am not willing to go one step further than that. All this discussion year after year is to lay the foundation for the restoration of that huge fraud, the franking privilege.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I renew the amendment. I think the keen sense of equity and justice and the high heroism of members of Congress and politicians generally have never been more eminently displayed than upon this single question of the franking privilege.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in regard to the comparatively free circulation of newspapers. One newspaper will convey more intelligence to the country, more knowledge of the current events of this capital and elsewhere than you could convey in a hundred letters. I do agree with him, however, in regard to the restoration of the franking privilege so far as the circulation of public documents is concerned, provided Congress proposes to continue their publication. Under the spasmodic effort at economy, by the repeal of the franking privilege printing has been interrupted in some directions, until now we are sending forth to our constituents in the West, as fresh and valuable reading, the Agricultural Report for 1873. And every man to whom you send that report or some of his neighbors write back, wanting to know why you do not send a report for 1874 or 1875. And if you were to pay the postage on answers to those letters—and you are liable to offend the constituent if you leave his letter unanswered—you will expend more for postage than it would cost to send all the documents printed by the Government.

Then again, as to letters, I do not quite agree with my friend from Illinois in regard to them. The Post-Office Department sends to a member of Congress, making an inquiry about some local matter in his district, and incloses to him a two-cent stamp to pay for the reply. The member of Congress writes to some gentleman in a central town of his district, making the inquiry; that gentleman writes into the country. His letter is answered, and he answers the letter of the member of Congress. Thus the constituent and the member have paid twelve cents postage and the Government has paid two cents. This certainly ought to satisfy even our eminent and economical friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] so far as the Government is concerned; but how is it with the constituents, leaving out the member of Congress?

Now, sir, in regard to printing and circulating documents and in regard to "official correspondence," I would make a law putting it upon the high and sacred honor of a member to mark his letters "official business," and let these and their answers go free. I would not resort to any fine or imprisonment, which is never enforced; but if we have the power under the Constitution I would make the breach of that privilege in the slightest degree by a member work a forfeiture of his seat in this House. And, my word for it, his district will be policed by disinterested gentlemen, willing to serve the public, with a vigor which will keep the Representative strictly in the line of duty and of law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee now rise in order to have debate closed on this paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do not rise. It can be done without that.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I ask unanimous consent that debate now be considered closed on this paragraph.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I withdraw my formal amendment.

The Clerk read the following:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

For compensation of the Secretary of State, $8,000; two Assistant Secretaries of State, at $3,150 each; for chief clerk, $2,250; ten clerks of class four; four clerks of class three; eight clerks of class one; and ten clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; one assistant messenger; one superintendent of the watch, at $1,000; six watchmen; ten laborers; chief engineer, who shall be a machinist, $1,200; one assistant engineer, $1,000; four firemen, at $720 each; ten charwomen, at $180 each; and a conductor for the elevator, at $720; in all, $78,630.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "two" and inserting "three" before the words "Assistant Secretaries of State." In some remarks which I addressed to this committee just before the close of the general debate upon this bill, I said to the gentlemen of the committee and of the House that on reaching the paragraph in this bill relating to the Department of State I should ask their attention to those provisions which seem to affect the organization of that Department. I now desire to call their attention to that question.

In the last Congress provision was made for the organization of that Department with double reference to the business of the Department and to its arrangement in the new and permanent building provided for its occupancy. A part of that organization involved three Assistant Secretaries, and there are three now performing the work of the Department. Among them the business is so classified that the additional Assistant Secretary provided by the last Congress has an entire independent charge, distinct not only in amount but in character, from the work pertaining to the two other Assistant Secretaries. The Third Assistant Secretary has the entire correspondence with non-christian countries, embracing diplomatic and consular correspondence and the jurisdiction of all the consular courts and the business arising therefrom. Each has a specialty, with which he has become practically acquainted.

The reason for the appointment of the additional Assistant Secretary was that this division of labor might be made, the business of the Department being so large as to require this in addition to all their correspondence with the countries under the Christian dispensation.

This paragraph just read destroys that organization. I desire to appeal to the gentlemen of the committee and of the House that, in this retrenchment, some parts of which, of course in various portions of the bill, arouse no opposition whatever, they will not carry it to the point of an essential derangement of the public business in any of the Departments. The entire clerical force of the State Department is less than fifty, including the chiefs of Bureaus. Gentlemen certainly will see that it is not an expensive Department so far as regards the amount of clerical force authorized by law.

I will also say touching the amount of this force (and I beg gentlemen to observe it) that in this Department clerks do not leave their offices at three o'clock as they might do if there were a surplus. They do not now leave and never have left before four o'clock; they often stay till five and six o'clock; and the assistant secretaries of the Secretary himself frequently continue at their work till a late hour. In this there is an evidence that the work is sufficient to employ this force; and in respect to the organization it shows also that this is essential to the proper conduct of the Department.

There is but one fourth-class clerk to each Bureau in that Department. If you take away one Assistant Secretary, and then destroy the arrangements of the Bureaus, (with, as I said at the beginning of this debate, a single exception where two Bureaus may be united,) you necessarily derange the conduct of business to a very serious extent. For that reason I beg that this proposition may have fair consideration from all gentlemen of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. The reduction proposed in the bill was not agreed to by the committee without due consideration. The gentleman will remember that a Third Assistant Secretary of State was added only two years ago, which was deemed at that time by a very considerable minority here an unnecessary expense.

Now the State Department in its appointments and conduct—in consequence, I suppose, of its intercourse with foreign nations—assumes rather a regal aspect, instead of that free republican aspect appropriate to our Government. Perhaps as the result of its associations, it has crept along and increased in various ways.

In the arrangement of this paragraph the committee was governed by an examination of the force which Mr. Seward had in that Department during his administration of it. We found that in the appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1868, there were but two Assistant Secretaries. I do not speak positively, but my impression is that Mr. Seward conducted that Department during the entire period of the war with but one assistant. The amount appropriated for the force of the Office in this paragraph in the year I have named was $65,000. In this bill we give $87,000. In order to avoid producing any friction in the administration of the Office we allow 25 per cent. more than the expenditures at that time. This allowance we think adequate. In fact, I think that Department could be administered for the same expense for which Mr. Seward administered it during the trying period of the war, when the Department was busy in keeping other nations from interfering in our internal struggle. I believe the committee have acted upon this matter with great discretion. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. KASSON. For the purpose of making some additional remarks, I withdraw my previous amendment and move to make the number four. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is mistaken touching the fact alleged that in the time of Mr. Seward there was but one Assistant Secretary. He will remember that during the administration of Mr. Seward Mr. Hunter was made an Assistant Secretary, in addition to the son of Mr. Seward himself. This statement will probably recall to the gentleman's mind the fact to which I refer.

In addition to the work that is constantly and naturally increasing in this Department with the increased extent of our relations with foreign countries, an entirely new kind of work has been introduced in this Department. In Mr. Seward's time there was no organization and analysis of the correspondence of that Department. One most important improvement effected under the present Administration has been in indexing, analyzing, and abstracting every official letter that comes from foreign countries, preserving that complete analysis with index for all future time. The work is going on touching all former correspondence of the Department, in order that whatever information exists upon its files may be permanently accessible for the benefit of the country.

Besides, since the time mentioned we have greatly enlarged our relations with several countries. Our commerce with oriental countries has been considerably increased, and the wise business men of this country are looking largely to the commerce across the Pacific Ocean for the restoration of our commercial prosperity. But, sir, I go further than that. I said in the last Congress, and I take the liberty to repeat now, that when there is a Department of the Government unassailed and unassailable for the character of its administration—so unassailable that a democratic Senator has recently declared in Connecticut that this is the exceptional Department in the Government—when that Department insists that it is necessary to have a certain force for the proper conduct of its business, that it is disorganizing to cut off the arrangements that have been made by previous act of Congress, I submit that those of us who are not better informed, unless we assail either the judgment or the honesty of the Department, must admit that it is dangerous to carry out retrenchment to the extent proposed here.

Mr. Chairman, this is a subject in which I have no other than a public interest. No friend of mine within my knowledge has ever been appointed in that Department. I speak simply as a public man in the interest of the public service. I speak of what I know; and the committee do not tell us that any of the chief officers of the Department have been consulted on this matter or have expressed their approval of this proposed disorganization of the Department. You have cut down salaries; I am not quarreling with you about that. I simply ask that you do not destroy the efficiency of the Department.

Why, sir, look at the number of clerks. Of the few clerks in that Department thirteen receive but $900. There are but ten fourth-class clerks; but few third-class clerks; no second-class clerks. You have not merely made a reduction of 20 per cent., but a reduction of over 25 per cent. upon the force in that Department.

I have only to make these statements. I know unless gentlemen vote purely in the public interest it is useless for me to offer an amendment, but I do submit it to the honest judgment of the House.

I withdraw the amendment last offered, and renew the amendment increasing the number from "two" to "three."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I know the gentleman from Iowa must have noticed that the efficiency of this branch of the Government does not depend on the increased force during the war when our relations growing out of the early events in the war and subsequently in regard to the relations of European powers with Mexico when it is clear the duties devolving on the Department of State exceeded anything which has occurred for a great many years or anything at the present time.

Mr. KASSON. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana that the records disprove that statement, for the correspondence is much greater now.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is absolutely impossible, so far as the necessary correspondence of the State Department is concerned.

Mr. KASSON. Nevertheless it is a fact.

Mr. HOLMAN. The correspondence of this Government with Great Britain, France, Germany, Prussia, and Russia, and indeed with the whole civilized world, was of such a character as absolutely to require vigilance on the part of the State Department, which could not possibly be exceeded in a time of peace. Then but a single Assistant Secretary of State was all that was necessary, and it was all that was necessary clear up to the close of the war.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa, if he has examined the history of the times, must know that the beginning of the extravagance in that Department occurred just about the same time that it occurred everywhere else in our Government. It occurred in 1866, from which year we date the tendency toward growth of expenditure in the civil branch of our Government. So, too, in 1867, when the money of the Government was of less value than now.

I find, Mr. Chairman, in 1867, under Seward, the whole expenditures of the Government in this branch of the service were $57,800. We appropriate by this bill $122,280, being an increase since 1867 in this one Department of $64,480; more than double the expenditures since 1867. If you take out an item of $16,000, an unusual item, for the purchase of Howard's Reports, you will still have an increase of expenditure for the present fiscal year, as appropriated by this bill, of $48,380; $48,380 of an increase even by this bill, without reference to the heavy appropriations of last year, and the basis upon which these reductions are made.

Mr. KASSON. What are the elements of increase?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mainly in the clerical force and in the increased number of the heads of Bureaus in this Department of State.

Mr. RANDALL. There are six Bureaus——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSTER. I move to make it four, instead of three.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have the best authority for stating that the correspondence and business of the State Department are to-day larger than ever before in our history, notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from Indiana. There are but fifty clerks in that Department to-day. We propose to reduce them 35 per cent., and the statement has been made here, and not denied, that not a single chief of division, not a single officer of the Department of State, has been consulted in reference to this proposed reduction. I believe a reduction could be made, perhaps, of 20 per cent.; but the head of this Department, acknowledged by everybody to be an able and pure man, and who has been successful in the management of his Department, says that it will be simply impossible for him to run the Department if the proposed reduction by this bill is made.

Mr. RANDALL. I am very sorry, then, that Mr. Seward is dead, for he ran it in much more difficult times for a great deal less.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to correct a mistake into which I have fallen.

Mr. FOSTER. In those times there were large contingent expenses. We did not appropriate as closely as we do now in this itemized way.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will excuse me; in matters like this accuracy is of the utmost importance. I find I have fallen into a mistake in reference to my statement a moment ago. I made my statement on the estimate of 1859, the year before the war. The appropriations made in 1859, 1869, were $57,850, against $122,000. I find in 1867, to which I have referred, the expense had gone up to $122,800; so that appropriations made by this bill are within a few dollars of the same as the appropriations made in 1867, when there was but two Assistant Secretaries, the same this bill proposes to appropriate for.

I desire to make that correction because in a statement of fact, in matters upon which legislation is to be founded, absolute accuracy is of the first importance. I only fell into the error by having the appropriation of 1858-'59 before me as well as that for 1867.

Mr. CONGER. Does not the gentleman from Indiana know that at that time no fees were covered into the Treasury? Now the fees are covered into the Treasury and the appropriations cover all the expenses.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Michigan must be aware that there is no change in the law in that respect at all. The consular act dates back prior to 1867. The system by which fees go into the Treasury instead of going to public officers existed even prior to 1860 in the main, and it has been still further extended since 1860 and all along prior to 1867. No, sir; the basis is the same. The whole sum of money received by the State Department in 1867 was received out of the Treasury by direct appropriation just as much as it is now; and I think when we appropriate the same sum of money this year, when the value of money is largely increased, that we did in 1867, we appropriate a sum that certainly is amply sufficient.

Mr. KASSON. I rise again because I failed to notice before one observation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. As the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has corrected his comparison with the expenditures of 1867, I need not make any remark upon that.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, however, made an observation which I can hardly understand as being a proper one to make, when he said that the State Department had assumed a regal sort of aspect. It is almost impossible for any one who understands the working of the State Department to see any fitness in that remark. This Department has responded more to the demand of the country for civil-service reform than perhaps any other. Those in its employment have risen by merit through the various grades, their promotion depending on their merits and efficiency in the service. There is now an assistant secretary in that Department who had his first appointment, I think, under Andrew Jackson. There is another officer in that Department who is a man of great age, the nephew of Thomas Jefferson, and bearing that honored name. All through that Department I see in it men whom I remember having seen there when I first came to Congress.

If it is this that the gentleman from Pennsylvania means when he says it is a regal Department, I can understand him, but in no other way. It is at all events a Department which has responded to the demand of honest men on both sides of politics that promotion in the service should be the recognition of faithful service and merit, irrespective of political predilections on the part of the clerks of the Department.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HOLMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that when the committee resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill all debate on the pending paragraph be closed in one-half minute.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman will not make his motion apply to the whole paragraph. I wish to offer an amendment relating to chiefs of Bureaus.

Mr. RANDALL. This will not cut off amendments.

Mr. KASSON. But I wish to make a statement in explanation of my amendment. I ask the gentleman if he will not allow ten minutes' debate on the question of the chiefs of Bureaus and fourth-class clerks?

Mr. RANDALL. That is not in the pending paragraph.

Mr. KASSON. The clerks are.

Mr. RANDALL's motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House debate on the pending paragraph is limited to one-half minute.

The question was taken on Mr. FOSTER's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer the following amendment:

In line 357 strike out "six" and insert "nine;" so that it will read, "nine watchmen."

That is the present force, and it is for a large building.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer the following amendment, to which I call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN:]

In line 361 strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so that it will read, "twenty charwomen, at $120 each."

I would like to have a minute's debate on that. I am entitled, I believe, to a half minute.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate. The half minute has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. In the judgment of the Chair, the half minute allowed for debate has not been exhausted. The gentleman from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. FOSTER. I simply desire to make the statement to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that he proposes to preserve the whole force of charwomen in the Treasury Department, while in the State Department he cuts it down one-half.

Mr. RANDALL. We have avoided striking out any female employés where we could.

The question being taken on Mr. FOSTER's amendment, there were—ayes 57, noes 72; no quorum voting.

No further vote being called for, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For three chiefs of Bureaus and one translator, at $2,100 each, $8,400.

Mr. KASSON. I desire once more to call the attention of the House to the proposed reduction in the chiefs of Bureaus. I think it very likely that I will do so in vain, though not necessarily, because this reduction does not follow from the reduction in the number of Assistant Secretaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will state what is his amendment.

Mr. KASSON. My amendment is to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so that it will read, "for five chiefs of Bureaus," &c.

The Bureaus now are as follows: Bureau of Indexes and Archives, to which I have already alluded, and I need not go over the same ground again. The work there is very extensive and very useful, and is going on upon hundreds of volumes of collections of foreign correspondence. Another is the Diplomatic Bureau, having charge of all that relates to diplomatic correspondence. Another is the Consular Bureau, having charge of all that branch.

The fourth is the Bureau of Accounts, taking charge of all accounts, the seamen's fund in foreign countries as well as the accounts in the diplomatic and consular offices, amounting to between one and two millions dollars every year. There are very many accounts to be stated, adjusted, and settled.

The fifth is the Bureau of Rolls and Library, having charge of all the laws of Congress, the copying of them for publication, the supervision of them for publication.

The sixth is the Bureau of Statistics, which prepares for publication the volume which we have used every year, analyzing the statistics obtained from every part of the world.

These are the Bureaus as now organized, and I think that every gentleman who has examined it will appreciate the importance of maintaining the system.

But my information—which I am bound in frankness to state to the House—is that they can combine the Bureau of Statistics and one of the other Bureaus, that of Rolls and Library; that these two can be combined in one without damaging necessarily the organization, as both classes of work are in their nature statistical. My information is that the work of these two Bureaus can be performed by one without serious injury to the Department; and having made this statement I submit the question to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. One of the evils which we find in the Departments is the multiplying of Bureaus, which is a sort of excuse for giving large salaries. Now, the Committee on Appropriations were of the opinion that the six Bureaus of the State Department could well be consolidated into three, in this manner: that the diplomatic and consular business could be conducted by one, the account, rolls, and library by another, and the statistics, index, and archives by a third. I believe, and the majority of the committee believe, that this consolidation is wise, and I hope therefore that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa will not be adopted.

The question was taken on Mr. KASSON'S amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For expense of editing, printing, binding, and distributing the laws enacted by the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, $10,000.

Mr. KASSON. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that there is no provision made here for the publication of the laws of the next session of Congress. He has provided only for the publication of the laws of the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and I suggest to him that, unless he make some provision for the printing of the laws of the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress, because it is within the present fiscal year, it will require a deficiency.

Mr. HOLMAN. The appropriation for that purpose will only be required after the 4th of March next.

Mr. KASSON. Yes; but it will come within the fiscal year for which this bill provides.

Mr. HOLMAN. It can readily be provided for next year.

Mr. KASSON. But it will be a deficiency.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will not be a deficiency; it will simply be authorizing the use of the money at once after the appropriation between the 4th of March and the 1st of July.

Mr. HALE. Why not make the appropriation now?

Mr. KASSON. It is for this fiscal year for which we are providing.

Mr. HOLMAN. It comes within the limits of that fiscal year, but it is to be expended after the appropriations of next year. It is for the publication of laws to be enacted hereafter, and it seems to me to be much more appropriate that that appropriation should be made for laws to be enacted next year, and which can just as well be made then as in this appropriation bill.

Mr. KASSON. Then it is simply left out, and is to be a deficiency after the coming election.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is entirely a gratuitous remark, and if I wished to retaliate I would call attention to the half million of dollars which we are now called upon to appropriate for the use of the Army, which is a deficiency for the last fiscal year.

Mr. KASSON. If the Committee on Appropriations wish to have it as a deficiency, I have no objection.

Mr. HALE. I rise to oppose the amendment, whatever it is.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. HALE. Then I move to strike out the last two words, and I do it for the purpose of saying to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that he has given no reason whatever against the amendment indicated, if not formally presented, by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

The gentleman says that this need not be put in this bill, because the work will be done in the next short session, and therefore it can be put in a bill in the next session of Congress. Why, Mr. Chairman, that argument would apply to divers matters in all the appropriation bills. We are here confronting the expenditures for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1876, and it is our duty to appropriate for the needs and wants that arise between July 1 next and July 1, 1877; and it is a poor way to cut down an appropriation and claim a saving when it is admitted that in the next session of Congress we shall have to appropriate this summer's deficiency.

Why, sir, the gentleman must know that if we neglect to make this appropriation, which comes in the fiscal year which we are confronting now, we have got to put it in next year in some bill, and that it will be a deficiency.

I deny what the gentleman states, that this will not be a deficiency. Next winter we shall be face to face with a demand or a request on the part of the Secretary of State to piece out the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and that is logically and legitimately what a deficiency bill is for. There is no reason, there is no fairness, there is no justice in not putting this in here.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is your amendment?

Mr. HALE. I have——

Mr. HOLMAN. I supposed the item was of such magnitude that the gentleman had his mind upon it.

Mr. HALE. So I have.

Mr. HOLMAN. This item of $10,000 that the gentleman makes such a disturbance about is for printing laws to be enacted next winter.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman deny——

Mr. HOLMAN. It is for printing laws to be enacted next winter.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman deny that the $10,000 not included in this item, but which must be appropriated next winter, is a legitimate subject of expenditure for the fiscal year that we are appropriating for in this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. It may be expended within the year.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman deny that it is a legitimate subject-matter for this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know whether it is or not; that depends upon whether it will be expended prior to the month of July of next year.

Mr. HALE. Does not the gentleman expect that these laws will be enacted and published within the fiscal year for which we are now appropriating?

Mr. HOLMAN. My belief is——

Mr. HALE. Published immediately after the next session.

Mr. HOLMAN. My belief is that they will not be then published; they will be published during the summer some time. The gentleman must see that it is a matter of no sort of consequence, and if he had been half as earnest about the matter upon another occasion as he seems to be about this little item of $10,000——

Mr. HALE. Does not the gentleman——

Mr. HOLMAN. It seemed to the committee, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] did not seem to regard it——

Mr. HALE. The gentleman and I discussed this matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seemed to the committee that inasmuch as the laws were to be enacted next winter——

Mr. HALE. The gentleman must recollect that he is speaking in my time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as appropriations are to be made next winter to meet the current expenses after the 4th of March next, it seemed to the committee that it would be more appropriate to make the appropriation in the bill which will be passed at the session which will pass the laws that are to be published for that expenditure of $10,000. It is a question of no practical moment.

Mr. HALE. Then why not——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HALE. I want as much of the gentleman's time as he took of mine. When he once gets up it is a hard matter to get him down. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] in view of the deficiency of nearly $3,000,000 (over $2,000,000) that comes down to the present Congress, ought not to talk about a little item of $10,000 being withheld for the purpose of diminishing the aggregate of appropriations. Why, sir, in contrast with the $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 appropriated by this bill, that item of $10,000 amounts to nothing. It simply occurred to the Committee on Appropriations that inasmuch as the laws to be published are not yet passed, and will not be enacted until the next winter, and will probably not be published during the next fiscal year, it would be time enough to provide for their publication when they were enacted. And I will say to my friend another thing——

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will tell him another thing, if he pleases. It seemed well enough to make some inquiry, when we had time to do so, how it happened that this expenditure of $10,000 is required.

Mr. HALE. Now will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman must bear in mind that this has a little to do with the more economical work of printing and the incidental matters pertaining to the publication of the laws; and inasmuch as we had not looked carefully into these little items, we thought it would be well that the printing of laws to be enacted eight or nine months hence should be provided for in appropriation bills to be passed at the next session.

Mr. HALE. Now, will my friend tell me if that is good reasoning in regard to the publication of laws to be passed at the next session, an expense which we know we must meet and provide for, why would it not be just as well to put off the appropriations for the compensation of officers of this House——

Mr. GARFIELD. And for our own salaries.

Mr. HALE. And for our own salaries, and everything else that is dependent upon the next session of Congress? The gentleman knows now that there will be a session next winter, and there will be laws enacted then, and those laws must be published, and that must be done in the next fiscal year. And as the gentleman has referred to me, as though I had sprung this matter suddenly here, he will remember that on another occasion—I will not refer to anything as having occurred in the committee-room—he and I discussed this matter, and I wanted it put on this bill at that time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. This is a very plain matter. The last Congress provided in the last appropriation bill for the printing of the laws enacted at the second session of the Forty-third Congress. This bill will provide for the printing of the laws enacted at this first session of the Forty-fourth Congress. The next session of Congress will provide for the printing of the laws passed at the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress. It is following exactly the line that you pointed out to us in the appropriation bills of last year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the formal amendments are withdrawn.

Mr. KASSON. I have reduced my proposition to writing and now offer it, as follows:

For editing, printing, and distributing the laws of the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress, $10,000.

For Statutes at Large, Forty-fourth Congress, $20,000.

That is the regular estimate, and is the usual form of providing for all the expenses for the fiscal year. As is well known, the Statutes at Large are prepared for the entire Congress at the close of the Congress. This Congress closes on the 4th of March next, and within this fiscal year. The work should be commenced promptly and brought to completion and the laws distributed before the close of that fiscal year.

Now that the question is presented, I ask that it be fairly acted on to see whether the expenses of the coming fiscal year are to be provided for by this bill or postponed to a future session of Congress. Personally, it is a matter of indifference to me if gentlemen on the other side refuse to make the appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. We understand what we are about; and this is right. The Statutes at Large will be provided for when both sessions of Congress have completed their labors.

Mr. KASSON. Then the next Congress only can provide for them.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, we have tried in years past, so far as possible, to reduce the deficiency bills. Of all the bills that business men pay in their private affairs, or that governments pay in public affairs, none are more troublesome, none more odious than the payment for "dead horses"—the payment for things that are already done in the past. Of that nature are deficiency bills.

During the war the deficiency bills grew to be very large, and mainly because nobody could tell in advance what the amount of expenditures would be. Some years after the war the deficiencies arose to $23,000,000. They averaged about $10,000,000 or $11,000,000. In the last four years we were able to reduce them so that last year all our deficiency bills amounted to less than $3,000,000. The only way we were able to do that was by adhering rigidly to this rule: whatever we knew would properly come under the fiscal year for which we were appropriating, we put in the bill for that year; and we were the more careful to avoid deficiencies for the reason that we knew they were always hard to explain.

We are now passing a bill to cover not the year in which we are living, but to cover a year that will begin on the 1st of July next and will end on the 1st of July, 1877, nearly four months after we shall have ceased to be a Congress. We are appropriating for a time extending beyond the existence of this Congress. All the appropriations we shall make next winter, except deficiencies, will be for a year entirely beyond the existence of the Congress making the appropriations. Now, the large sum of money we appropriate in this bill for salaries of Congressmen is not for our salaries for this winter, but for salaries beginning with next July, and running not only until we cease to be a Congress, but including the first six months of the next congressional term.

Now we come to the cost of printing the laws that we are to pass during the next year. The Department has made the proper estimate for this session and the next session for the publication of the general statutes under general laws. It is simply a plain question whether we will now appropriate for what we know will come as an expense within the year for which we are appropriating, or whether we will save up two items, one of $10,000 and the other of $20,000, to be put into a deficiency bill next winter. It is a simple, plain question of fair business dealing.

Now I must say that I do not see why the appropriation for this session was not in the bill of last year. It ought to have been. I do not now remember on what ground it was left out; it must have been through inadvertence.

Mr. RANDALL. On the same ground perhaps that you are charging we had in view in this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no, I take whatever fault is due to me, if any is, for leaving out the $10,000 for printing the laws for the first session of this Congress. That is really a deficiency. The two items now proposed are for the year for which we are now appropriating; and we ought to put them in.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] must see that in this respect we make exactly the appropriation made by the last bill. No appropriation was made for publishing the laws of this session; and we must therefore appropriate in this bill the sum necessary to publish the statutes enacted at the present session of Congress. Next session, following the same example, we will appropriate the sum necessary to publish the laws of the next session. Does not the gentleman from Ohio perceive that we are doing here exactly what his own precedents require us to do? We appropriate this year for the publication of the statutes enacted at this session. We shall appropriate next year the amount necessary for the publication of the laws enacted then; and at that time we shall determine the question whether the laws of the two sessions shall be incorporated into a single volume or not.

I think that is a debatable question, and for one I am not willing at this time to provide for $20,000 for the republication of the acts of this session and the republication of the acts of next session in a volume to be added to the present Statutes at Large, forming the eighteenth volume.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does not the gentleman see the difference between a long and a short session? This is the long session, and I very much fear it will run into the next fiscal year.

Mr. HOLMAN. It might not.

Mr. GARFIELD. We are appropriating for what will cover the short session. We will get through and cease to be a Congress on the 4th of March next, and this fiscal year we are appropriating for will run on and end on the 30th of June after we are gone.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have adopted your principle of appropriation, and you have no right to complain. We are adopting the principle which you have recognized up to this time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not recognize it; I never have recognized it.

Mr. HOLMAN. To call it a deficiency is all wrong.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to oppose the amendment. I wish to reply to that part of the gentleman's remarks alluding to deficiency bills. He said during the war deficiency bills rose as high as $23,000,000, and spoke at one time of a deficiency bill of $11,000,000. I have a statement from the Clerk that the deficiency for the year ending June 30, 1876, was $4,703,699.18. I wish to tell gentlemen how much harder we work and with how much better result we have labored during this session of Congress, for the Committee on Appropriations have already considered the deficiency bill and do not consider it will amount to more than $1,500,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am much delighted to hear that, because if it does not amount to more than that it is because we prevented it at the last session of Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. Because we served notice on you at the last session of Congress we would not allow any more deficiencies. That was the reason of it, and next year we hope our advice will be taken to heart more earnestly and practically so we will not have any deficiency at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. You are laying the foundation for a deficiency now by refusing to make proper appropriations in this bill.

The question recurred on Mr. KASSON'S amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 78.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it is in order to go back at this time to lines 374 and 375?

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is required by the rule in order to go back.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to lines 374 and 375, "for care and subsistence of one horse and repair of one wagon and harness, $1,000." It seems to me $1,000 is a remarkable sum for that purpose. I move to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$500."

Mr. KASSON. They cut off one horse.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I am afraid this is a one-horse concern. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; it is a one-horse amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of official postage-stamps, $20,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend by adding the following proviso

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That all letters, books, papers, and public documents sent by the Department of State to diplomatic and consular officers of the United States residing in countries with which this Government has entered into the postal treaty which took effect July 1, 1875, shall be transmitted through the regular mails and be prepaid with official stamps.

Mr. RANDALL. That amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a point of order, that it is new legislation.

Mr. RANDALL. But this is to reduce expenses.

Mr. HOAR. It does not so appear.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think I can make it appear if the committee will indulge me.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the effect of that very important rule which has been adopted. It cannot be claimed—it would be unsafe to claim any substitution of a new system of government or legislation for the old one would be cheaper. Would it be in order to strike out the Department of State and transfer the whole to the Treasury or War Department upon the ground claimed by the gentleman who made the motion, that it would be a cheaper mode of doing the business? This amendment is unimportant, but the construction of this rule in its effect on general legislation is of great importance.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think, sir, that this amendment is a reduction of expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the Chair will decide it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide, under the new rule adopted this session, that in the first place the amendment is germane and in the next place it does not increase expenditure. The Chair rules it in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to state to the committee the reason for moving the amendment. The committee will remember the United States formed a postal treaty, which took effect on the 1st day of July, 1875, with Germany, Austria, Hungary, Belgium, Denmark, Egypt, Spain, Great Britain, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Norway, the Netherlands, Portugal, Roumania, Russia, Servia, Switzerland, Sweden, and Turkey. With these governments we have a special postal treaty, which provides among other things that—

Each country retains all the postage it collects on the postal-union correspondence of every kind, both on the prepaid sent or the unpaid received, thus dispensing with all accounts between the several post departments of the union upon the international correspondence exchanged between them.

My amendment provides that all correspondence between the State Department and those countries shall have the postage prepaid with official postage-stamps in this city and committed to the regular mail communications.

Mr. HURLBUT. Will my colleague allow me to ask him whether the treaty covers all the class of matter he speaks of?

Mr. SPRINGER. It does. Here is the treaty, if the gentleman desires to examine it. It covers everything put into the mails.

Mr. HURLBUT. Books?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; books go in the mails. In Europe you can send a live ox by mail if you desire. [Laughter.]

At this time the State Department, instead of committing its mail matter to the regular mails sends it by special communications of its own to New York, and thence it is transmitted through its agent, being put on board the steamer at New York and carried to Liverpool or Queenstown, and thence by special agents carried to London, and in the city of London the dispatch agent of the United States prepays the postage on this matter with postage-stamps purchased of the British government with gold furnished that dispatch agent by the State Department here. During the last year, that ending June 30, 1875, that dispatch agent purchased postage-stamps to the amount of £2,000 sterling, or $10,000 in gold. He purchased postage-stamps to that amount of Great Britain to prepay the postage on American correspondence; whereas under the present postal treaty they need not cost this Government one cent, except the official postage-stamps which are put on by the Department of State in the city of Washington.

Mr. HALE. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois when that treaty was negotiated?

Mr. SPRINGER. It was signed at Berne on the 9th of October, 1874, and was finally ratified on the 3d May, 1875, by all the governments that were parties to it, and it took effect as to this Government, with all those that I have named, on the 1st day of July, 1875.

Mr. HALE. Some seven or eight months ago?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Now, does the gentleman know that since that treaty took effect and became operative advantage has not been taken of it in the transmission of its dispatches by the State Department?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do happen to know that from the circumstance that I went to the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, who keeps the accounts of the State Department, and having examined the accounts of this dispatch agent in London but a few weeks ago, I found that, notwithstanding that the treaty took effect on the 1st of July last, the postage account of the dispatch agent was running on at the same rate as before, with but little diminution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] perhaps failed to notice that the treaty did not take effect so far as France was concerned until the 1st day of January last. The principle he refers to is not new so far as some of the countries are concerned. There were similar provisions in the postal treaties made in 1867. I ask that the gentleman's amendment may be again read.

Mr. SPRINGER's amendment was again read, as follows:

Provided, That all letters, papers, and public documents sent by the Department of State to diplomatic and consular officers of the United States residing in countries with which this Government has entered into the postal treaty which took effect July 1, 1875, shall be transmitted through the regular mail and be prepaid with official stamps.

Mr. KASSON. Now, if the gentleman will insert in his amendment the words "so far as compatible with the public interests," I do not know but it may be well enough to submit this at least to consideration, as it is now proposed for the first time. I think there is not a man in this House who knows anything of the diplomatic sagacity of foreign governments who will say that they dare to commit the private instructions addressed to their agents abroad to the public mail. The secrecy of the mails has been repeatedly violated, and counterfeit seals have been used to replace the seals which have been broken. And I think it should not be permitted that the private correspondence of the Government of the United States should be advertised to every post-office and public agent abroad by an official stamp that it is on business of the State Department, and that if they wish to examine it they may. That is why I suggest to the gentleman that if he will add the words "so far as compatible with the public interests" perhaps it may be well enough to let his amendment go.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to say that the argument that foreign governments will interfere with our mail matter is not well taken; because it is the fact that this very dispatch agent in London has committed the correspondence of the State Department to the mails of the foreign governments which the gentleman says will purloin and open that correspondence.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will remember that what he alludes to is but part of the correspondence of the State Department. Some of it even goes from Washington by special hand, and some of it is forwarded from London by special agents.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know that. I know that the American minister at London in 1871, sent General Badeau, consul-general at London, to Spain, as bearer of special dispatches, for which service General Badeau was paid nearly $500. I am aware of that.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out the last word. I can hardly believe that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] means to deprive absolutely the Government of the United States of the power to send a dispatch abroad, from one point abroad to another, however confidential, however vast the interests that it may affect, by private messengers. This amendment, as I understand it, is peremptory; it applies to all cases without any exception whatever. It would prevent the Department of State from sending a dispatch by private hand without cost to the Government at all. It would be a violation of the law under that amendment to commit to an agent of the Government going abroad, a minister, a consul, or a secretary of legation going abroad, letters from the Department to any other diplomatic agent of the Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HOAR. Then instead of moving to strike out the last word and substitute for it the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, I will discontinue my remarks.

The amendment of Mr. SPRINGER, as modified, was read, as follows:

Provided, That all letters, books, papers, and public documents sent by the Department of State to diplomatic and consular officers of the United States in countries with which this Government has entered into the postal treaty which took effect July 1, 1875, shall be transmitted through the regular mails and prepaid with official stamps so far as is compatible with the public interests.

Mr. HOAR. I think the amendment, being the words "so far as is compatible with the public interests," had better come in after the word "shall" where it first occurs.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think that would be better, and I accept that modification.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Secretary's Office:

For compensation of the Secretary of the Treasury, $8,000; two Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, at $4,000 each; chief clerk and, ex officio, superintendent of the Treasury building, $2,500; one principal clerk of warrants, estimates, and appropriations, $2,500; four principal clerks, at $2,500 each; four assistant clerks, at $1,800 each; twenty clerks of class four; two disbursing clerks, at $2,500 each; stenographer to the Secretary, $1,800; twenty clerks of class three; fifteen clerks of class two; fourteen clerks of class one; twenty-five female clerks, at $900 each; eight messengers and six laborers; one clerk of class one, to assist the chief clerk in superintending the building; one captain of the watch, $1,000; one engineer, $1,200; one assistant engineer, $1,000; one machinist and gas-fitter, $1,200; forty watchmen, at $720 each, and, additional to two of said watchmen, acting as lieutenants of watchmen, $180 each; twenty laborers, at $720 each; six firemen, at $720 each; ninety charwomen, at $180 each; in all, $245,520; and for the loans division and for the currency division, namely: Two clerks, at $2,500 each; one assistant, at $1,800; ten clerks of class four; six clerks of class three; four clerks of class two; four clerks of class one; fifty clerks, at $900 each; four messengers; five laborers, at $720 each; and six laborers, at $2.25 per diem; in all, $97,686.50.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following amendment in behalf of the Committee on Appropriations:

In line 395, strike out "four" and insert "six;" in line 400, strike out "twenty" and insert "nineteen;" in line 401, strike out "fifteen" and insert "fourteen."

It will be seen that that does not increase the number; it only changes the classification of the clerks and provides for six principal clerks instead of four, but it reduces the number of clerks of class three and clerks of class two one each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I also, in behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, offer the following amendment:

In line 415, strike out the word "five" in each case of its occurrence and substitute therefor the word "seven."

That makes the total right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out all after the word "dollars" in line 416 down to the end of line 424, as follows:

And for the loans division and for the currency division, namely: Two clerks at $2,500 each; one assistant, at $1,800; ten clerks of class four, six clerks of class three, four clerks of class two, four clerks of class one; fifty clerks at $900 each, four messengers, five laborers at $720 each, and six laborers at $2.25 per diem; in all, $97,686.50.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to consolidate the division of loans and the division of currency into one division, and all the work now done in the one division shall be done in the other division, with the following employés, namely: One chief of division, at $2,500; two assistant chiefs of division, at $2,100 each; seven clerks of class four, five clerks of class three, three clerks of class two, four clerks of class one; forty clerks, at $900; four messengers, at $840 each; five laborers, at $720 each; and six laborers, at $2.25 per day each; in all, $51,035.50.

Mr. FOSTER. Was that agreed to in committee?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I offered that amendment because the Secretary of the Treasury has stated that he can consolidate these two Bureaus, and I propose to give the Secretary the option to consolidate them as he pleases.

Mr. GARFIELD. What bureaus are they?

Mr. RANDALL. The Bureau of Loans and the Bureau of Currency. I have been advised that they could be consolidated in one way; but I understand that the Secretary prefers to consolidate them in another. I have therefore left it optional with the Secretary of the Treasury to consolidate them in his own way. I have reduced the force from what is recommended in the bill, because I am advised that the work can be done with the number of clerks that I have provided for.

Mr. GARFIELD. This amendment is so important that I hope the gentleman will let it be printed and passed over for the present.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is in manuscript, and we cannot see it or understand it, and it is simply in the interest of fair legislation that we should see it in print so that we may know what it is. It will not delay the progress of the bill if the gentleman allows it to be passed over for the present.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman can find out all about it if the committee so determine, and then he will have the privilege of asking a vote upon it in the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. You cannot discuss it, then. I do not ask the gentleman to delay the consideration of this bill at all, but simply to give us an opportunity to see what this amendment is.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I will not object to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have done that sort of thing many times myself. This amendment may be all right; I do not know that it is.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think the Department concurs in the reduction to the extent I have proposed. But I believe the Secretary of the Treasury has said—I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will confirm my statement—that these two Bureaus can be consolidated with great propriety and much economy.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should not be at all surprised if that is true, that they can be consolidated; but how, is another thing.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if by this amendment he leaves eight chiefs of divisions? I think that is what he intends to do.

Mr. RANDALL. I leave seven chiefs of divisions. I provide for six principal clerks in the main Treasury Office and two here.

Mr. FOSTER. That makes eight altogether.

Mr. RANDALL. That makes seven: six in the first part of the bill and one here. In the other amendment which I offered the chief clerks were increased from four to six.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. According to the wish of the Department.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I think he will find just preceding this a single chief of division, which will make eight chiefs of divisions, just exactly as I think he intended.

Mr. RANDALL. I have provided for one, the chief of warrants, estimates, and appropriations, at $2,500.

Mr. FOSTER. The Secretary says he can get along with eight chiefs of divisions.

Mr. RANDALL. I will permit this amendment to be printed and go over, with the privilege of having a vote upon it with the understanding that no objection shall be made to going back.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that is right.

The CHAIRMAN. If no objection be made the pending amendment will be passed over for the present and until it can be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. With the right to refer to it without objection.

The CHAIRMAN. That is understood.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WHITE. In line 398 I find "twenty clerks of class four;" in lines 402 and 403 I find "twenty-five female clerks, at $900 each." The twenty clerks of class four receive $1,800 a year; the twenty-five female clerks are to receive but $900 a year. I would like to know of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose any amendment?

Mr. WHITE. I move to strike out "twenty clerks of class four" and increase the clerks of class three from twenty to forty. I am informed that in the Treasury Department there are clerks of classes one, two, three, and four who are doing precisely the same work, but they receive $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and $1,800 a year respectively. I am also credibly informed that there are ladies in the Treasury Department who receive but $900 a year each, performing the same amount of work, under more rigid surveillance than any of the males in that Department, and receiving but half the pay of the fourth-class clerks. Now that is an act of injustice, a disgrace to the legislation of this country and to our system, and I protest against its being continued in this bill.

I ask that wherever these fourth-class clerks occur and a distinction is made against female clerks the one shall be reduced and the other elevated. This bill says, "twenty-five female clerks." Why does it not also say "twenty male clerks of class four?" It might just as well have said it, for that is just what it means.

Mr. HOLMAN. Females can be employed in the higher classes.

Mr. WHITE. They are not generally put there.

Mr. HOLMAN. Sometimes.

Mr. WHITE. Very rarely.

Mr. HOLMAN. The law allows it.

Mr. WHITE. And on the next page of the bill the committee seems to have become ashamed of its own work, for, instead of saying "fifty female clerks, at $900 each," it puts a comma there, and supposes the country will understand the fact. [Laughter.] I ask that this injustice of cheap pay to female clerks, who perform the same kind of work, and as much of it, and under more rigid surveillance than the male clerks, will be remedied. At least I would like to have the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations explain why there should be a distinction made on account of sex when we are told that in this country there shall be no distinction on account of race or color. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CONGER. This charge is so serious that I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to make a full explanation. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Vote.

Mr. WHITE. I will state in clearer terms——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has certainly expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUSK. Let the Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I am sure the Clerk cannot read it. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. RUSK. Then if there is no amendment that can be read, let the Clerk read on in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that it is impossible for him to read the amendment as proposed.

Mr. WHITE. I will give it to him, unless I am allowed to read it myself.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the amendment?

Mr. WHITE. I move to strike out "twenty clerks of class four" in line 398; and in line 400 to insert "forty" instead of "twenty" as the number of clerks of class three, and in lines 402 and 403 to strike out "twenty-five female clerks, at $900 each," and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-six clerks, at $1,000 each." That will be a saving of $500 over this part of the bill, and be doing something like justice, but not equal justice even then.

Mr. HOLMAN. Ladies can occupy the higher grades of clerkships if they are competent.

Mr. RANDALL. There is nothing to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from appointing ladies to the highest positions.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WHITE, it was declared not agreed to.

Mr. WHITE called for a division.

The vote was again taken; and there were—ayes none, noes none. [Laughter.]

Before the result was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman from Kentucky is certainly satisfied to withdraw his proposition and let us proceed with the bill.

Mr. WHITE. No quorum has voted, and I call for tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as the House evidently does not favor the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, I believe he does not wish to consume further time. I hope he will withdraw it.

Mr. WHITE. I will not. It is a matter of justice. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN put the question on ordering tellers; and less than one-fifth of a quorum rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are not ordered; and the amendment is not agreed to. The Clerk will read the next paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot consent to see the rights of any member of the House disregarded. The gentleman from Kentucky had the right to demand tellers, as there was no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky did not make the demand.

Mr. WHITE. Of course I demand them, if I am entitled to them.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Kentucky did state that there was no quorum voting and called for tellers.

Mr. WHITE. I supposed the Chairman understood his business.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is that any gentleman who makes a point in this House should rise. Nobody makes a point more frequently in his seat than the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] The Chair cannot recognize members unless they rise and address the Chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say to the Chair that I made my point standing where I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the present say on this subject.

Mr. RANDALL. We have had a good laugh. Now let us go to business.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already requested the Clerk to read the next paragraph.

The Clerk proceeded to read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair, upon the ground that it is the duty of the Chair to order tellers on the demand of any gentleman when a quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair heard no such demand from the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. GARFIELD. I heard it.

Mr. WHITE. With all courtesy to the Chair, I must say that I made the demand twice.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, although confirmed by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say respectfully that I do not conceive it to be the right of the Chair to insult a gentleman in this House. [Applause in the galleries.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio undertook to say to the Chair that he had not recognized the right of the gentleman from Kentucky. He recognized his right until the proceeding became so frivolous that the House became a laughing-stock, which the Chair is not disposed to permit. [Applause.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is not in order.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has no right to the floor at this time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee do now rise, that the words of the Chair may be taken down and reported to the House, so that we may see whose rights are invaded.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman can have that done hereafter. Let us go on with this paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; now is the time to exercise that right.

The question being taken on the motion that the committee rise, it was declared not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for a division on that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Ohio that, if they say to the Chair that they demanded a count on the failure of a quorum to vote, the Chair will again put the question to the committee. He was trying to make a count on tellers when this matter arose.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the Chair allow me to state again the point which I make in the presence of every gentleman in this Committee of the Whole? This point, which is personal to myself, is that when the Chair remarks in his place officially that he accepts the word of the gentleman from Kentucky, notwithstanding its indorsement by the gentleman from Ohio——

A MEMBER. O, no.

Mr. GARFIELD. "Although confirmed by the gentleman from Ohio."

The CHAIRMAN. "Confirmed by the gentleman from Ohio," the Chair said.

Mr. GARFIELD. "Although confirmed by the gentleman from Ohio," I desire to ask this Committee of the Whole——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair withdraws the remark.

Mr. GARFIELD. Whether that is to be allowed to go on record?

Mr. HOLMAN. The remark was understood to be a mere pleasantry by every person except the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; then I do not press my point further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MACDOUGALL] rose to propose an amendment.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I sought the floor to say that I rose to call for tellers myself, when the gentleman from Kentucky rose and his motion was distinctly heard in this quarter of the Hall.

Mr. FOSTER. I move in line 400 to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,200;" so it will read, "stenographer to the Secretary, $2,200." This place of stenographer to the Secretary is a very important one, requiring the service of a very able man. We pay in this House $5,000 for less service than is rendered by this stenographer to the Secretary.

Do you intend, let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to increase the fourth-class clerks to $2,100?

Mr. RANDALL. I strike out four principal clerks and make it six.

Mr. FOSTER. At what salaries do you intend to leave them?

Mr. RANDALL. Eighteen hundred dollars.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move the committee rise.

Mr. RANDALL. We wish to go on and read the next paragraph before rising. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion until the next paragraph is read.

Mr. DUNNELL. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the pending amendment moved by the gentleman from Ohio will not be agreed to. The duties performed by the stenographer to the Secretary are very simple in their character in comparison with the duties performed by the Official Reporters of this House. I am surprised the gentleman from Ohio should have made the statement he has.

Mr. FOSTER. The duties of the stenographer to the Secretary are much greater.

Mr. SPRINGER. The duties of the Official Reporters of this House could not be performed by the stenographer to the Secretary. They are more arduous, of greater importance and difficulty, requiring unusual skill and ability, and of course are worthy of larger compensation.

Mr. FOSTER'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise, with the understanding that when the committee again meets the pending paragraph will be that relating to the Supervising Architect.

Mr. WHITE. I do not agree to that, as I have an amendment to offer to the paragraph we are now on.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I withdraw the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. WHITE. I move in line 402 to strike out "$900" and insert "$1,000," so it will read "twenty-five female clerks, at $1,000 each."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that if this amendment be agreed to I will then propose in line 398 to strike out "twenty clerks of class four" and in line 400 to amend by striking out "twenty" and inserting "forty," so it will read "forty clerks of class three."

As will be perceived it will not take any more money from the Treasury, but provides only for giving a part of the money appropriated to class four in this bill to these female clerks, and it will still leave $500 for the contingent fund.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether there is any doubt about the correctness of the statement made a little while ago that the Secretary of the Treasury is at liberty under existing law to appoint a lady he finds to be competent to a clerkship of any grade whatever?

Mr. RANDALL. I so understand it. I do not think I am mistaken about it. Such at least is the general understanding. So far as I know, there is no provision of existing law which will prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from appointing a female clerk competent to discharge the duties of the higher class. In fact I believe some do now get $1,200.

Mr. RUSK. One or two get $1,400 a year each.

Mr. HOAR. I understand it as the gentleman from Pennsylvania does.

Mr. RANDALL. It ought to be so if it is not.

Mr. HOAR. Let me say a word. This amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, which was received with some merriment by the House, of course relates to a very serious matter, a matter of livelihood as well as of right as citizens to a large portion of the citizens of the Republic. I understand the law to be as the gentleman from Pennsylvania does, but I think it proper in this connection to have it explicitly understood in this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not seen the law, but it is my understanding that the Secretary of the Treasury has the power to appoint any female to any one of the classes he may desire. In my judgment, lady clerks who are competent in every way to discharge the duties of the higher classes should be promoted. Certainly when they discharge the duties of the higher class of clerkships they ought to receive compensation accordingly.

Mr. WHITE. I do not wish to be misunderstood in regard to this matter. I may say, there are one or two, or half a dozen female clerks of class four in the Department. What I undertake to say is this, that the standard—and it is upon the very face of this bill—that the standard of pay for female clerks in the Department is $900, while for male clerks it is from $1,200 to $1,800, all doing similar work. This is not justice. There are men who have been there for ten years as first and second class clerks. I heard of one the other day who was called up by the Assistant Secretary and asked whether he did not think he had been there long enough to be made a third-class clerk. He replied, if they would let him alone he would let them alone. [Laughter.]

Both males and females should be promoted when they deserve it; and all should be paid alike, according to the class of work and the talent and skill required to perform it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOSTER. I move in line 409 to strike out "forty" and insert "sixty." This relates to watchmen of the Treasury Department. Sixty is the number of the present force. They have the care of the Treasury building, a portion of the Post-Office Department, a portion of Winder's building, occupied by the Second Auditor's Office, as well as of several other buildings about the city. The force is simply in good working order at present. They guard hundreds of millions of dollars daily, and they guard valuable papers. I think if the committee had fairly considered this matter they would have allowed the number to stand at sixty. I do not propose to take the time of the committee at this late hour, but will ask for a vote on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to retard the business, but gentlemen said if we would m et and go on with the business the committee would rise at ten o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. I will move that the committee rise as soon as the next paragraph is read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Supervising Architect:

In the construction branch of the Treasury: For Supervising Architect, $4,050; chief clerk, $2,250; photographer, $2,250; one principal clerk, at $2,000; two clerks, at $1,800 each; one clerk of class four; two clerks of class three; one clerk of class one; one at $900; and one messenger; in all, $21,590.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HOLMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. J. H. BAGLEY: The petition of Van Deusen Brothers and others, that cork and manufactures of cork be placed upon the free list, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of 335 workingmen of the county of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, against making any change in existing tariff laws, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 208 business men of Philadelphia and 22 business men of Pittsburgh, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 189 workingmen employed in one establishment in Philadelphia, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of business men of Philadelphia, that the further consideration of the tariff be suspended for the present year, to the same committee.

By Mr. LYNDE: The petition of Richard B. Conlan and others, for the establishment of a post-route from Durham Hill, in the town of Muskego, to Howard Prairie, town of Franklin, Milwaukee County, Wisconsin, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. McFARLAND: The petition of T. A. Middleton, for additional compensation as a United States officer, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MORRISON: The petition of citizens of Delaware, for the repeal of the check-stamp tax, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. SHEAKLEY: Remonstrance of citizens of Mercer County, Pennsylvania, against a reduction of tariff duties, to the same committee.

By Mr. TURNEY: The petition of R. L. Martin and 43 other citizens of Fayette County, Pennsylvania, against any change being made in the present tariff laws, to the same committee.

By Mr. WALDRON: The petition of W. F. King and others, of Adrian, Michigan, against the sale and delivery of envelopes at less than cost by the Post-Office Department, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WALSH: The petition of G. W. Utermahle, for compensation on account of damages sustained by acts of the late board of public works for the District of Columbia, to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Also, the petition of A. Shoops's heirs and other citizens of Washington County, Maryland, for compensation for property destroyed by the United States Army on the 17th of September, 1862, to prevent the confederate army crossing the Potomac River, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of J. B. Oder & Brother and others, citizens of Frostburgh, Maryland, that the Post-Office Department be prohibited from printing and delivering envelopes and postal cards at a loss to the United States Government, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS: The petition of 17 citizens of Michigan, soldiers of the late war, for the passage of the bill equalizing bounties, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 6, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplin, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. No. 2655) to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2822) repealing section 363 of the Revised Statutes, and the substitution of another section in lieu thereof.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. HAMLIN. Day before yesterday House bill No. 186, to provide for compensation to the owners of certain lands ceded by the United States to Great Britain in and by the treaty of Washington, of July 9, 1842, was inappropriately referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The bill originated in the Committee on Claims in the House last year, passed the House, came here, and went to the Committee on Claims, as it should have gone this year. I therefore move that the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT. I inquire if that is what is known as the Drew case?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think that is a proper reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, that the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARVEY presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the passage of an act ceding and donating the Fort Harker military reservation to the State of Kansas for educational purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, opposing any reduction of the Army, and urging that troops be stationed on the frontier to protect the settlers from the incursions and depredations of warlike tribes of Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of John A. Rowland and Henry Turner, property-owners on Sixth street northwest, in the city of Washington, praying that there be refunded to them certain amounts which were erroneously collected of them for special improvements on that street; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the memorial of John A. Rowland and others, of Washington, District of Columbia, remonstrating against the payment of a special assessment made by the authorities against them for the improvement of Sixth street in front of their property; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KEY presented the petition of Margaret Knight, of Meigs County, Tennessee, praying additional compensation for property taken and used by United States troops during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of A. M. Garoutte, late captain and acting quartermaster United States Army, praying to be re-imbursed for the amount of money refunded by him to certain parties for property taken and sold by him by order of the military authorities, also for money paid for expenses of clerks and for balance of pay and travel pay, and also amount of a fine adjudged against him by a court-martial; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Missouri, praying the passage of a law providing for holding the terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Kansas City, Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Eugene O'Sullivan, late sergeant of Company K, Eighteenth Missouri Volunteer Mounted Infantry, praying to be allowed an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2313) granting a pension to Mary Ann Cornell, widow of Stephen Cornell, late a private in Company I, One hundred and twenty-fifth New York Volunteer Infantry, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 11) granting a pension to Eliza Jane Blumer, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) in favor of John M. English, of North Carolina, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, in response to the order of the Senate adopted yesterday, directing that committee to inquire into the expediency of making further provision respecting the administration of oaths in the Senate, to report that we have considered the subject, and beg leave to submit a bill.

The bill (S. No. 701) further to provide for the administering of oaths in the Senate was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2655) to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2309) granting a pension to Catharine Johnson, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 362) granting a pension to William T. Simms, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMILTON. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 527) granting a pension to George Pendleton, to report it back adversely. It appears from the papers accompanying the bill that the case is still pending in the Pension Office. I therefore move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1179) granting a pension to James Riley, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2307) granting a pension to Mary Bell Decker, infant daughter of James W. Decker, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2162) granting a pension to Clara Brosch, mother of Joseph Brosch, jr., late private Company H, Twenty-fourth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1656) granting a pension to Aaron Buchanan, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Maria H. Granger, widow of the late Major-General Gordon Granger, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1189) granting a pension to William J. Drake, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 226) to make persons charged with crimes and offenses competent witnesses in the courts of the United States, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 242) to abolish capital punishment, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency, to report it with sundry amendments. I give notice that I will call it up perhaps to-morrow, at the latest on Monday.

PAPERS IN EXTRADITION CASES.

Mr. THURMAN. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2434) to correct an error in section 5271 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, have directed me to report it with sundry amendments and recommend its passage. I will state that we are advised by the Secretary of State that the Department is very much embarrassed for want of this legislation, and that the passage of this bill at as early a day as possible is necessary. I therefore move that it be taken up for present consideration. There can be no objection whatever to the bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It amends section 5271 of the Revised Statutes, so as to read:

> In every case of complaint and of a hearing upon the return of the warrant of arrest, any depositions, warrants, or other papers, or copies thereof, offered in evidence, shall be admitted and received for the purposes of such hearing if they shall be properly and legally authenticated so as to entitle them to be received as evidence of the criminality of the person so apprehended, by the tribunals of the foreign country from which the accused party shall have escaped; and the certificate of the principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States resident in such foreign country shall be proof that any such deposition, warrant, or other paper, or copy thereof, is authenticated in the manner required by this section.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments. The first amendment of the committee was in line 7, to strike out the words "or copies thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 12, after the word "escaped" to insert:

> And copies of any such depositions, warrants, or other papers shall, if authenticated according to the law of such foreign country, be in like manner received as evidence.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 5271 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to extradition."

SALE OF PAWNEE RESERVATION.

Mr. WRIGHT. There was passed yesterday House bill No. 2678, reported by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] from the Committee on Appropriations, as I remember, to authorize the sale of the Pawnee reservation. I am not prepared to say but that that bill is in all respects correct; but I think, in view of the importance of it, it would be well to have an opportunity to examine it further. I therefore enter a motion to reconsider at this time the vote by which the bill was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. WITHERS. I hope the Senator will investigate the matter and satisfy himself upon the subject, because it was represented to the committee that it is a matter of great importance, and it is necessary that prompt action should be taken.

Mr. WRIGHT. I shall take an early occasion to do so. I suggest to the Senator that, as I stated just now, I am not prepared to say that the bill is not in all respects correct, but I desire an opportunity to examine it further.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAMLIN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 702) to secure service of process in United States courts; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 703) to amend the act of Congress creating the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, approved June 23, 1874; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 704) authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to rehear the application of Stephen V. Benét for patent for cartridges; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduced a bill (S. No. 705) for the relief of Albert Towle, postmaster at Beatrice, Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK. There are certain papers in connection with this case in the hands of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads which I ask leave to withdraw, in order that they may also be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks that the papers relating to this case before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be transferred to the Committee on Finance. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. BOUTWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 706) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the committee appointed by the Senate to investigate the recent election in Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. INGALLS. If there be no further morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

Mr. DAVIS. To consider unobjected cases?

Mr. INGALLS. Unobjected cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In going through the Calendar in this way the resolutions stand no chance, because as fast as we approach the resolutions the intervening space is filled up by new reports. I hope, therefore, without taking any vote on the subject, it will be understood that when we reach the end of the general orders as they stand, we shall pass through the resolutions and then go back to the general orders as they may come in after to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar at the point where its consideration was last interrupted.

ANDERSON & WHITE.

The bill (S. No. 628) for the relief of John J. Anderson, surviving copartner of the firm of Anderson & White, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John J. Anderson, surviving copartner of the firm of Anderson & White, $8,597.83, in full of all claims of Anderson & White, or either of them, against the Government of the United States for cotton belonging to that firm, impressed for and appropriated by the authority of the Government of the United States to the defenses of Nashville in August and September, 1862, and for all damages in connection therewith.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read.

Mr. WRIGHT. This bill arises on the same facts as the bill which was passed yesterday to pay the claims of Butler, Miller & Co., and the report in that case was read. It in all respects arises upon the same facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire the report to be read?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the chairman of the committee whether or not this is the same bill or whether it is an addition to the bill that passed last year? There was an amount appropriated at that time, if my recollection is right.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is the same bill precisely, upon the same facts as reported at the last session of Congress. The amount is changed somewhat; and it is much less than it was as originally reported from the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. It is right, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass? The bill was passed.

JAMES M. COFFINBERRY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 247) for the relief of James M. Coffinberry, of Cleveland, Ohio; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that James M. Coffinberry, of Cleveland, Ohio, was lately a judge of the court of common pleas for the fourth judicial district of Ohio, and it is represented that, as such judge, he was assessed and paid income taxes on his salary for the period of five years, under the internal-revenue laws of the United States, as then construed and executed; and that by reason of his serious ill-health and his absence from home considerable periods of time consequent thereon, since the assessments and payments, he was not informed that such assessments and payments had been held by the proper authorities to be illegal, and that the same would be refunded by the Treasury Department, in time to prepare and present his claims therefor within the period required by section 44 of the act approved June 6, 1872.

The bill therefore directs the accounting officers of the Treasury to examine these claims of Coffinberry, when presented for that purpose, in the manner heretofore prescribed by the Treasury Department for the presentation of the like claims, and to reject them, or to refund the taxes, the same as if the claims had been presented within the period fixed by section 44 of the act approved June 6, 1872.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say one word in reference to the bill. It was reported by the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] according to my recollection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WRIGHT. The facts with reference to the bill are sufficiently stated and correctly stated in the preamble. I think the facts are precisely as they are stated. The principle involved in the bill, aside from the exceptional circumstances of this case, in my judgment is wrong. I do not believe Congress should be compelled to refund these taxes where the parties did not apply in time to obtain the money from the Treasury. I have always entertained the very gravest doubts whether any portion of such money ever should have been repaid, but under the law and the practice of the Department these taxes have been refunded to several persons in the State, the State judges, Mr. Coffinberry being one of the judges in Ohio. It appears from the special circumstances of this case that he was prevented from making application in time, and relief was granted by the committee because of the special circumstances. I am inclined to believe that the special circumstances of this case are sufficient to entitle him to relief and to take his case out of what would otherwise be the operation of the rule.

I merely desire to say that upon principle, aside from the very exceptional circumstance of this case, I should be opposed to this bill. I therefore do not want my vote on this bill or the action of the Senate upon it to be taken as a precedent when applications come up hereafter, unless there be in subsequent cases equities equally persuasive with those in this case.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say that I know that the statement made by the Senator from Iowa in regard to the exceptional circumstances of this case is correct. I am very well acquainted with Judge Coffinberry. I do not know a more high-minded, meritorious man than he. He has suffered prodigiously from a railroad accident, by which he lost one of his legs and came very near losing his life. If ever there was a case that ought to be taken out of the statute of limitations, this is that case. He is not a man who would make any claim whatsoever unless it was a meritorious one. I hope, therefore, as the committee are unanimous in saying this bill ought to pass, that it will receive the sanction of the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say in addition, confirming what my friend from Ohio has said, that the very high character of this gentleman has not been left unweighed by the committee, and they were thoroughly assured of the fact that he would have made no claim that he did not in his judgment believe to be entirely correct; and the committee believe that his circumstances have been such that he could not sooner make this application.

Mr. DAWES. There is a case on the Calendar involving precisely the same principle and having the same excuse as this case, though perhaps it was not presented fully to the committee. I understand from the committee that it was not. I heartily agree with the statement of both of the Senators. I would not think it right to do away entirely with the statute of limitations; but in the case before the Senate I agree with them. I do think there was sufficient reason for doing away with the statute in this case; and I will try to satisfy the Senate when the other case comes up that it existed in that case also.

Mr. WRIGHT. My friend from Massachusetts will of course remember that the case to which he refers was reported back adversely upon the ground that there was no evidence at all giving any reason why the party had not made his application in time. This case is entirely different.

Mr. DAWES. I want to say in explanation of the fact that there was no evidence before the committee, that the bill was introduced by me and I was not aware of the condition of the case before the committee. At the proper time when it shall come up, I shall either ask the chairman of the committee to present the facts to the committee on a recommitment or state them to the Senate; and I may satisfy the Senate that it comes within the rule laid down here. I have not the slightest doubt but what the Senator's sense of justice will lead him to the same conclusion. Otherwise, I do not think it is right to waive the statute.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to my friend, in order to get that question properly up, that it would be as well to have the bill recommitted and get the testimony before the committee at the proper time.

Mr. DAWES. I entirely agree with the position taken by the Senator. Unless the case I speak of comes within the rule, I shall not ask favorable action upon it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HERMANN KREISMANN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1988) for the relief of Hermann Kreismann, United States consul-general at Berlin; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officer to credit Hermann Kreismann, United States consul-general at Berlin, in his account, with $397.72, in full for consular funds stolen from the consulate on the 13th of February, 1873, without fault or neglect on the part of the consul.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. JANE DULANEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1118) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Dulaney; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Jane Dulaney, widow of William Dulaney, late colonel United States Marine Corps.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to insert after the word "pension," in line 7, the words "at the rate of $30 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN PIERSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 121) granting a pension to John Pierson; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Pierson, late captain of Company H, Tenth Regiment of Michigan Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOL LANDS IN MISSOURI.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 280) to amend the act entitled "An act to appropriate lands for the support of schools in certain townships and fractional townships not before provided for," approved May 20, 1826; which was read.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Calendar says this bill came from the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was reported by the Senator from California, [Mr. BOOTH.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. BOOTH. There is a mistake in printing the Calendar. The bill was reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a mistake in the print. The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BOOTH. The Senator from Missouri can explain the provisions of the bill better than I can. It is a bill in relation to school lands in Missouri. The sixteenth sections were taken from school purposes, and where the townships did not get the lands this is to give them additional lands.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not know to which Senator from Missouri the Senator from California refers.

Mr. BOOTH. The bill comes here from the House of Representatives. I suppose either of the Missouri Senators understands it more thoroughly than I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California calls the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am watching it as closely as I can, earnestly hoping that the bill will pass, as it is very just and very meritorious.

Mr. WRIGHT. The trouble I have is this: It seems to be a general bill, not applicable to the State of Missouri upon its face.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read again.

Mr. WRIGHT. If it is expected to apply alone to lands in Missouri I see no reason in it, as we have a general law. It occurs to me we have a general law on this subject now; although I am not certain upon that point.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bills refers exclusively to Missouri, as I understand it. It is a special bill in regard to school lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask what is the occasion for the passage of such a law? What is the mischief now?

Mr. COCKRELL. There are certain townships there where the school lands have been taken by paramount title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What kind of title?

Mr. COCKRELL. There were Spanish grants in Missouri, old grants, and in some cases before the location was made certain claims were made and the parties held the lands. The bill is simply to enable these different townships to select inside of the State of Missouri lands in lieu of those which were taken from them and which they had never received, not increasing the lands which go to the school fund at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but it is increasing the land which the United States is to lose by just that much.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg pardon of the Senator. I do not understand that it is increasing the lands which the Government is giving. The Government had disposed of these lands which it had pretended to give to the State and the title which the State claimed from the Government failed, and now the Government is simply placing them in the same situation in which they would have been had the title remained good in the first instance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But these land grants to States, when they are organized into States, are never understood to be grants with a warranty; so that if it should turn out that a particular part of the land that the State was to get by this general and sweeping designation of two sections in a township for this purpose did not happen to be available, that should not raise any ground of claim against the United States. I do not think it can be a sound principle that we make a warranty; but, whether that is sound or not, the difficulty with this bill is that it is not the kind of bill that the honorable Senator from Missouri describes his case to be. If the bill were limited in definite terms to a case where the United States under this grant to the State of Missouri had under its authority disposed of these lands, so that the State of Missouri had become deprived of them by subsequent grants of the United States, there would be great force in his proposition. The only doubt about it then would be that the grant once made to the State of Missouri is absolute to convey whatever title the United States possessed in the land at the date of the admission of that State, and no subsequent action of Congress or of any Department could affect the title of the State of Missouri at all, if I correctly understand the law; and I think my friend from Missouri will agree with me. That being so, it appears to me to be taking a pretty broad step, in a bill as broad as this is, to say that from whatever cause—I think that phrase or something very like it is in the bill—it may have happened that the State has not got every one of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, if they are the ones——

Mr. COCKRELL. Only the sixteenth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well, the sixteenth; that from whatever cause the township, not the State, may have failed to get that section, then the United States shall give that township another section. It would be perfectly consistent with the terms of this bill, although I know it is not designed for that, if the State of Missouri herself had disposed of one of these sections that had been confided to her for the use of schools so that the township had been deprived of it before the township was organized, we should give another section for that purpose. That would not be just even in the Senator's theory.

I suggest, therefore, either that this bill lie over for consideration in respect of limiting it to precisely the cases where some wrongful act of the United States has been the cause of this loss, or that it be recommitted for that consideration; but I very much fear the language of the bill (for it will be a precedent for all other States as well, of course, once it is adopted) is so broad that it will cover a great many cases, if any such happen to exist, that ought not to be covered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over. The next case on the Calendar will be reported.

SETH W. HOMESTEAD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 610) granting a pension to Seth W. Homestead; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It instructs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Seth W. Homestead, late a sergeant in Captain Seaton's company, (K,) First Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Cavalry, on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID J. GARRETT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 111) granting a pension to David J. Garrett; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David J. Garrett, late a private in Company C, Ninth Iowa Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILIP J. SHAW.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2304) granting a pension to Philip J. Shaw; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Philip J. Shaw, late private Company G, One hundred and twenty-sixth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JULIA SCROGGIN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 641) granting a pension to Julia Scroggin; which was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia Scroggin, widow of Humphrey Scroggin, late private in Captain L. Worthy's company of Georgia militia in the war of 1812.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 563) to provide for the sale of extra copies of public documents, and for the distribution of the regular official editions thereof; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. The unfinished business is the bill (S. No. 650) fixing the rate of postage on third-class mail matter, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator from Maine desire to go on with that?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then let this bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. This will be in order of course when the Calendar is taken up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next call of the Calendar will commence with this bill.

SALE OF THE PAWNEE RESERVATION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yesterday a bill passed the Senate and was sent to the House, as I understand, in regard to the disposition of the Pawnee Indian reservation in Nebraska. A motion to reconsider has been entered in that case, but the bill, I believe, has not been returned. I think the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] who entered the motion has become more or less satisfied about the character of the bill, and I should like to have the Senator withdraw the motion if he feels willing to do so.

Mr. WRIGHT. As I stated this morning, that bill was passed yesterday without anything being said in explanation of it. I waited myself supposing that the Senators from Nebraska, in whose State this reservation is located, having a familiarity of course as I supposed with the entire circumstances, if there was objection to it, would interpose. Nothing was said by them, and therefore I kept my seat. It seemed that the bill passed without any attention whatever being given to it, so far as the Senate was concerned. It occurred to me at the time that it was a question of great importance and that there were many things in it which ought to be considered by the Senate. Subsequent reflection led me to think the same thing, and therefore, as I said this morning, I entered the motion out of abundant caution, stating at the time that I might not have any objection to the bill. I learn since I entered the motion that the matter has been considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, as also by the Committee on Appropriations, very carefully, and that in addition to that there is a communication from the Secretary of the Interior and from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and also from the President calling attention to the necessity of legislation, and of such legislation in the form provided for by this bill. I understand from conference with the chairman of the committee that it is important that this bill should be disposed of to-day by reason of peculiar circumstances. I am satisfied from the conversations I have had on this subject and after examining these communications, that the bill is, perhaps, necessary and just; and perhaps I ought not even to put a "perhaps" there; that the bill is one that ought to pass and pass at once and be out of the way, so that it may be carried into effect immediately. Resting upon these assurances and these recommendations, I am prepared to, and do, withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. PADDOCK. Inasmuch as the Senator from Iowa has alluded to the inaction of the Senators from Nebraska in reference to this measure, I wish simply to say that I understood the bill to have originated with the commission of Friends who have these Indians in charge and to have come through the channels which he has described, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and that the President of the United States himself had recommended it. Therefore we took no part nor lot in it, except to examine the bill and be satisfied that it was all right. Beyond that we did not think it to be our duty to intervene in the matter.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say in addition, as a part of what I said before, that since entering the motion I have also consulted with the Senator from Nebraska who has just taken his seat, and his opinion confirmed me in what I propose to do now.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state that no remarks were submitted in explanation of the bill at the time, because when it was considered in the Committee on Appropriations it was ascertained there, on inquiry, that it had the assent of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who were interested also of course in the subject, and both the Senators from Nebraska were cognizant of the fact that the bill was presented, and of its character, and were just before me examining the bill when it was presented. No objection being intimated by any of these parties or any of these committees, I thought it unnecessary to detain the Senate by any explanatory remarks on the subject.

Mr. WRIGHT. I hope my friend, the Senator from Virginia, does not understand me as complaining that no remark was made. I understand very well that, no objection being made, that was the quickest way to pass the bill, and it was right and proper. I am satisfied now, and have not been otherwise than satisfied all the time. I only entered the motion out of abundant caution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. As a notice has been given to the House of Representatives to recall this bill, I suggest that notice be sent of the withdrawal of the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WEST in the chair.) If there is no objection, the motion to reconsider will be withdrawn and the Secretary will recall the request for the return of the bill.

LIMITATIONS IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to take up a bill reported by the Judiciary Committee this morning extending the statute of limitations in certain cases from two to three years, sent over from the House and which is urged by the Attorney-General, and is thought necessary to be passed presently. I hope there will be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 2655) to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on the Judiciary report the bill with an amendment to strike out all after the word "follows" in line 3 and insert:

No person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offense, not capital, except as provided in section 1046 unless the indictment is found or the information instituted within three years next after such offense shall have been committed. But this act shall not have the effect to authorize the prosecution, trial, or punishment for any offense barred by the provisions of existing laws.

So as to make the bill read:

That section 1044 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

No person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offense not capital except as provided in section 1046, unless the indictment is found or the information instituted within three years next after such offense shall have been committed. But this act shall not have the effect to authorize the prosecution, trial, or punishment for any offense barred by the provisions of existing laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. I, of course, have no objection to the bill; but I know nothing about it. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont, as I see neither the Senator from Ohio nor the Senator from Kentucky in his seat, whether the bill was reported by general consent of the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have great satisfaction in informing my distinguished friend from West Virginia that the bill met the cordial approval of both the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. Then it meets the Senate's view, I suppose.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: A bill to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes relating to limitations in criminal cases.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1488) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railroad Company;

A bill (H. R. No. 1580) granting a pension to Almon P. Graves;

A bill (H. R. No. 2305) granting a pension to Melville H. Hudson;

A bill (H. R. No. 2482) for the relief of Charles W. Mackey, late first lieutenant Tenth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Volunteer Corps;

A bill (H. R. No. 2678) to authorize the sale of the Pawnee reservation; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2800) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay judgments provided for in the act approved February 15, 1876, entitled "An act providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress."

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 5th instant, approved and signed the act (S. No. 644) to authorize the printing and distribution of the eulogies delivered in Congress on announcement of the death of the late Orris S. Ferry, a Senator from the State of Connecticut.

The message also announced that the following bills, having been presented to the President of the United States March 24, 1876, and not having been returned by him to the Senate, wherein they originated, within ten days, (Sundays excepted,) as prescribed by the Constitution, had become laws without his approval:

An act (S. No. 295) to amend an act entitled "An act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad and to regulate its construction and operation;" and

An act (S. No. 401) to incorporate the Citizens' Building Company of Washington.

ARRESTS IN ALASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

In further answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 7th of January last, (partial answers having been transmitted on the 6th and 24th ultimo,) calling for a statement of "the number of military arrests in the Territory of Alaska during the past five, &c.," I have the honor to submit herewith a report, with accompanying papers, received from the Secretary of War.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 6, 1876.

The message was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

POSTAGE ON THIRD-CLASS MATTER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 650) fixing the rate of postage on third-class matter, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARVEY. I move to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That all mailable matter of the third class referred to in sections 3878 and 3911 of the Revised Statutes of the United States may weigh not exceeding four pounds for each package thereof, and postage shall be charged thereon at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed; but nothing herein contained shall be held to change or amend section 3879 of said Revised Statutes.

Mr. President, it was my purpose to make a few remarks in support of the amendment; but, not being in very good health this morning and not having the opportunity to read in the RECORD the able speech made yesterday by my friend from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, [Mr. HAMLIN,] I shall simply confine myself this morning to stating the effect of this amendment if adopted.

It is simply to restore the rates which existed prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1875. That measure, it will be recollected, was passed in the closing hours of the session as an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill. I think the purport of the act at that time was not fully understood. If my recollection serves me aright, a proposition embodying the same principle had been defeated in the Senate some days prior. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir.

Mr. HARVEY. I accept the correction.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator will allow me a word. Almost immediately preceding it the proposition to reduce the packages from four pounds to twelve ounces was defeated, and the proposition immediately following was one to increase the rate and limit the weight to four pounds. The Senate voted down the first proposition and adopted the second.

Mr. HARVEY. In any event I am satisfied that the increase of the rates on third-class matter has not met the approval of the people of the country. I do not speak of any particular class of people, newspaper-men, or merchants, or farmers, or any particular class; but I say that in my opinion it has not met the approval of the people of the country, and I do not think that it has in any degree benefited the revenues of the Post-Office Department.

This amendment has been offered because I have good reason to believe that it embodies the views of a majority of the people of this country upon that question. During the discussion yesterday my friend the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] asked the Senator from Maine if this bill passed what increase of revenue it would bring. The answer was that it was impossible to tell, for the reason that we cannot know what amount of third-class matter would be sent through the mail if this bill passed. Therefore, even if the bill passes, it must be an experiment and nothing more. It cannot be defended on the ground that it will make the Post-Office Department self-sustaining, because we do not know that it will have that effect. We cannot know it.

I do not agree with the idea that the Post-Office Department must necessarily be self-sustaining; but, if I did, the passage of this bill would not be acceptable to me, for the reason I have stated. From the very nature of things it is impossible to determine how a proposition of this kind will affect the revenue, for the reason stated by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It is, at any rate, admitted, I believe, that the amendment made at the last session has not benefited the revenue, the amount of third-class matter transmitted through the mail having been so much reduced that the revenue has not been equal to that arising from third-class matter prior to the passage of that law, and it cannot be shown that the expenses of the Department have been in any manner reduced by the passage of that act. Therefore the present rates cannot be defended on the ground of making the Department self-sustaining.

Then upon what ground can the advance be placed? The bill now pending proposes to make the rates dependent upon distance to this extent: that for the distance of one thousand miles or less the rate shall be one cent per ounce; for distances over one thousand miles, two cents. Let us examine the effect of this proposition as regards, for instance, the transmission of public documents from this Capitol to different portions of the country. It will be readily seen that, if this bill passes with this distinction as to distances, people residing in the State that I represent wishing public documents forwarded to them through the mail would have to pay, or the Senator or Representative forwarding the documents would have to pay, double the postage which would be due upon a document forwarded by the Senator from Maine to his State. The same would be the case with documents transmitted by the Senator from California or the Senator from Oregon to the States represented by them. The distance to either of those States being double that to the State I represent or those immediately adjacent, the expense upon the document would be double that upon the one sent to Maine, but exactly the same as upon those sent to the States in the center of the continent.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me inquire of the Senator——

Mr. HARVEY. I am only using it as an illustration.

Mr. HAMLIN. Public documents?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. This bill does not touch public documents.

Mr. HARVEY. They are books, are they not?

Mr. HAMLIN. But they come under another section of the law, which makes postage on them uniform. This bill does not affect public documents.

Mr. HARVEY. I only use that as an illustration. It would apply to the transportation of any other book with the same force. As to the question of the rate that existed prior to the 3d of March, 1875, being adequate for the cost of the transportation of third-class mail matter, I will quote from the letter of the superintendent of railway mail service sent to the Postmaster-General, February 18, 1875. He says:

> At eight cents per pound, the amount of third-class mail matter forwarded in the mails in 1874 would yield a revenue of over $4,000,000, but the actual revenue from third-class mail averages twelve cents per pound, ranging from 54.33 cents from unsealed circulars to 8.2 cents from books, (the excess arising from fractional parts,) yielding the Department from third-class mail matter a revenue of about $6,000,000.
> Whether this class of mail matter is remunerative or not has been questioned. It cannot be placed upon the same footing with either letters or regular publications, for these reasons: In all post-offices the number of clerks necessary is determined almost entirely by the first and second classes; there must be force enough to dispose of these classes in the quickest possible time; while matter of the third class, where the quantity is of any moment, is distributed and handled at leisure, and therefore serves to fill in the intervals that would otherwise be wasted. Its handling is, therefore, less expensive, piece for piece or pound for pound, than either first or second class mail.

And in regard to transportation he says:

> In transportation a certain system of routes is necessarily maintained. On all stage-routes and steamboat-lines weight is not considered, unless it be in a very few and exceptional cases, speed and frequency regulating the cost. The weights on this class of routes could be doubled without material increase of compensation.
>
> In railroad transportation fully one-fourth of the annual compensation is to railroads on which the weight could be largely increased without raising their compensation above the minimum; fully one-half is to railroads upon which an increase in weight would increase their compensation at the minimum rate per ton.
> So that of the $16,000,000 paid for transportation, $9,000,000 would not be materially affected by doubling the mails; $3,000,000 only would increase directly with the weights, and $4,000,000 would increase indirectly with the weights.

He says:

> I have introduced these statements to show the fallacy of all arguments that have been produced to show that the deficiency of the Post-Office Department is attributable to the samples of merchandise, which form hardly a perceptible portion of the mails, or to matter of third class, which forms but 30 per cent., and yields about 24 per cent. of the revenue, against 61.4 per cent. of mail matter of the second class and 8.4 per cent. of the first-class.

Here, then, is a statement, from one competent to know, that the deficiency in the Post-Office Department is not attributable to the fact that packages of merchandise are transported through the mail, or in any wise to the rates that existed at that time upon the transportation of all third-class matter. It is evident to every one that we, having some thirty-odd thousand post-offices in the United States, must still maintain the number of postmasters and clerks necessary to transact the business of those offices, and it has been shown that in the employ of the Post-Office Department, including postmasters and employés of the Department, route-agents, and those occupying like places, there are upwards of forty thousand persons employed. The payment of these people and the payment of the expenses necessary to the transaction of business in the Post-Office Department proper constitute more that half the whole expense of that Department. Is is evident that this must be continued. The people must, therefore, pay the salaries of all the persons necessary to the handling of the mails, whether this third-class matter is carried through the mails or not, and it has been shown that upon three-fourths at least of the routes as to distance the cost of transportation will not be materially increased.

Now, if the third-class matter, or more particularly samples of merchandise, cuttings, seeds, &c., should be excluded from the mails, either by positive enactment or by making the rates of postage so high as to drive them out or making regulations as to different distances so vexatious as to lead people to prefer to pay transportation companies or express companies for carrying such mail matter—I say, if the bill should have this effect, the result would be that the people must still continue to pay the expense of the transportation and handling of the mails, and in addition to that pay to express companies or others engaged in the transportation of packages an exorbitant price for their transmission, thus making it necessary to pay twice for what might be effected for the people through their Department at a reasonable and fair compensation for that work.

It has been shown, and I think conclusively, that for eight cents a pound packages of that size may be transported anywhere, certainly within the boundaries of the United States. It has been stated by what I regard as good authority that packages of that kind can be profitably transported around the world at that rate. This being the case and the public having been satisfied with the law as it existed prior to the 3d of March of last year, why not let us be governed by the principle of that conservative adage which says "let well enough alone?" Let us return to the rate as it existed prior to that time, a uniform rate throughout the United States. The idea of discrimination in rates as to distances has been abandoned as being a thing pertaining to the infancy of the mail service. Why restore it in this vexatious shape, and especially when public opinion is already against the simple increases of rates, leaving the rate as to distance uniform? I say that the adoption of the discrimination proposed in this bill would further aggravate the feeling which exists among the people throughout this country, the people of all parties and all classes engaged in every kind of business. I hope that the Senate will adopt my amendment.

The only other thing aimed at in the amendment besides what I have stated, the restoration of the rate that existed prior to the 3d of March, 1875, is to remedy a construction which the Postmaster-General has placed on the existing law prohibiting soldiers from transmitting through the mails packages greater than two pounds. The effect of this part of the amendment is to provide that soldiers, the same as citizens, may send or receive through the mails packages of merchandise not to exceed four pounds.

I think that I have stated enough to enable the Senate to clearly comprehend what the object of this amendment is. I will therefore close with the expression of the hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss this question at any length, but only to make one or two suggestions. My friend from Maine, in the speech which he delivered yesterday, and to which I listened with very great pleasure and great instruction, aimed to establish this point, which has been the point aimed to be accomplished from the very beginning of the Government: to make the Post-Office Department a self-sustaining institution. I think the day has come when that should be abandoned. Doubtless at the beginning of the Government it was possible to make that Department a self-sustaining institution; and for a great many years afterward this was possible, and was in fact accomplished; and I think until 1840 or 1841 it was in the main self-sustaining—if not every year, what was considered a deficit one year was more than made up the succeeding year. It was, I may say, self-sustaining.

But is it reasonable at this day to require the Department to be yet self-sustaining; and is it wise that we should curtail mail facilities, or augment the price for the transportation of mail matter, to accomplish this object? We must consider at the present day the condition of the country. Since 1841 we have acquired the vast domain of Texas, large in extent, with but very small population, of course very widely dispersed, and yet they needed mail facilities, and indeed required mail facilities. Since that time we have acquired another most extensive region of country from Mexico—California, Arizona, New Mexico, and a portion of Colorado. That vast and extensive region of country must have mail facilities, and the population is very small and widely dispersed also. Since that time the spread of population in this country has been amazing. We have spread over the new States of Nevada and Oregon, the Territories of Wyoming, and Montana, and Idaho, and Washington. We have acquired that distant region called Alaska.

Is it reasonable to attempt to make the Department self-sustaining if these distant countries are to be supplied with mail facilities; and would it be wise, for the purpose of saving a few dollars, I may say even a few million dollars, that those distant, outlying States and Territories should in the least be deprived of mail facilities? I say not. These countries that are an expense on the Post-Office Department are yet of essential importance to the prosperity of the Union. Why, sir, Texas produces annually 500,000 bales of cotton, worth from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000. The new States and Territories of Utah, Nevada, and California yield in precious metals $80,000,000. Strike those two items from the list of our productive annual wealth, and you would paralyze the entire country. Therefore, while they are an expense, and doubtless a great expense to the Post-Office Department, they yet pay back richly that which they get even from that Department.

It is not my intention, without any preparation, to make a speech in answer to the speech made by my friend from Maine. I really on this occasion can but commend the industry which he certainly has bestowed upon this subject; and I for one feel under great obligation to him. Nevertheless I think that I may be allowed to disagree to some of his positions, and this is one of them. I do not think it is wise at this day for us to attempt to do that which could be done in the earlier years of the Republic. The condition of the country is entirely changed, and these few people away in the distant States and Territories are entitled to mail facilities; and it is for the benefit of the Eastern States, where the population is dense and more compact, that they should get those mail facilities. Again, those people who are there to-day are natives of the old States; many of them are natives of the State of my friend, and they are entitled to mail facilities. As a matter of affection, as a matter of interest, as a matter of great governmental policy, they should not be restricted at all in their mail facilities.

I know that my friend will answer, and to a certain extent will answer very truthfully, too, that it is not his intention to deprive them, but if you make the transportation excessively high by increasing it in proportion to distance, you do to a very great extent affect them. I disagree, and I have for some time, with all those persons who believe that the Post-Office Department should at this day be self-sustaining. It has been self-sustaining until a few years back, but it ought not be now, and we should not sacrifice the facilities so as to make it self-sustaining any more than you can make your Army and Navy self-sustaining. It is an essential arm of the Government for the good, the prosperity of the country, and for which the people as a whole must be willing to pay. Of course I am not in favor of no restriction whatever. I am in favor of some; but I think we ought to abandon the abstract idea of its being self-sustaining. We cannot make it so at this day. The country has become too extensive and the population is too sparse in this newly-acquired country.

It strikes me that one of the troubles—and I attempted to obtain information upon that subject yesterday, when my friend was addressing the Senate—is the defective classification. I may be wrong in this, and I certainly am very willing to be corrected, and my friend may be right, for he is much better versed in the matter than I pretend to be; but I think the classification is defective. The first class is letters. That is all very well. Although cheap transportation is a great idea and has proven itself to be a great success, nevertheless I doubt whether it would be policy at this day to reduce it below the present price. It is now a very light tax indeed; three cents for the transportation of a letter from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. Let the distance be short or long, it is three cents. That classification yields a certain profit, a very handsome one. The second classification, which is the transportation of newspapers, periodicals, and books from the office of the publisher, is attended with great expense and a loss of some millions of dollars.

Mr. HAMLIN. The second class is confined exclusively to newspapers and magazines going from the office of publication to regular subscribers.

Mr. BOGY. So I said; yet it is attended with considerable loss.

Mr. HAMLIN. I thought the Senator also included books in it.

Mr. BOGY. Perhaps I did; but it does not include books. It is attended with considerable loss. But that second classification as well as the first is intended to carry out the original idea when Mr. Franklin and his confrères were made at first a committee to organize a Post-Office Department in the year 1775. To carry "letters and intelligence" throughout the continent was the intention even at that day. Letters and newspapers and periodicals ought to be scattered broadcast throughout this land, and as cheaply as possible; and if there should be a tax necessary to maintain that thing, the people of this country cannot pay a few millions of dollars for a better and more worthy and more useful object. I am not in favor of increasing the tax so as to accomplish the object aimed at by my friend and, I may say, every other gentleman who has ever been connected with the Post-Office Department, either in Congress or at the head of that Department, to make it self-sustaining. That is, I think, the error. We desire to increase the charge of transportation to accomplish that object. That object I do not think we ought to attempt to accomplish.

The third classification I think is very erroneous. While it includes all that kind of matter which partakes of the character of intelligence or knowledge, it also is extended to include a class of articles entirely different and distinct. While I would not increase the rates of transportation upon pamphlets, occasional publications, or regular publications, or newspapers not sent from the office of publication, but transient, I would be very willing, and I think it would be well sustained, to increase the charge upon all the other articles which are strictly embraced within the term merchandise, including roots, cuttings, bulbs, scions, and all things of that kind, as well as merchandise. I have yet myself to see the wisdom of making the Post-Office Department a common carrier for merchandise, and I doubt if it be constitutional. As stated by my friend yesterday, the Constitution provides for mail-routes; but by construction at the very beginning of the Government the power was thought to be sufficiently broad to include the transportation of the mail on those routes. It is only by construction, because the provision is merely for routes. My friend spoke of that yesterday. It should certainly be limited to what we understand in common parlance by mail. It is the transportation, the transmission, of all those things which come within the order and category of knowledge and intelligence, books, pamphlets, newspapers, letters. It is impossible to extend it beyond the power conferred on Congress by the Constitution. I do not think, strictly speaking, that we have power to make our mails common carriers or express companies. Without dwelling upon that point, I doubt its expediency. Although it may appear that it is not attended with very large expense, this can be said: that all the calculations with regard to the separation of expense—that is, how much it does cost for the transportation of the first class of mail matter, for the second class of mail matter, and for the third class of mail matter—are to a certain point extremely defective and only a mode of approximation. It is not strictly correct, yet I admit it does approximate to what it costs. If we could relieve the mail of the transportation of merchandise, I think we could afford to carry strictly mail matter without any augmentation of price, and let that part of the service be performed by common carriers, express or other companies.

I am therefore, Mr. President, in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. HARVEY.] I myself do not attach any great importance to making the Mail Department self-sustaining. I would rather it were so, of course, but I am not disposed to curtail or to embarrass the transmission of the mail from the center to the circumference of this country for the purpose of accomplishing that object.

It seems to me, in conclusion, that a fourth class ought to be made, if we intend to transport merchandise at all. I mean by merchandise anything independent of letters, periodicals, and newspapers. My friend from Maine yesterday classified newspapers with merchandise, and gave a very good reason for it, because it was a matter of profit to send them. Nevertheless they are intended for another object. It is knowledge you are disseminating over the country, intelligence. The other is mere merchandise. We are told that harness has been transported to some portions of Arizona. That should not be allowed. It is an imposition; it is a speculation on the part of the persons who do it. There ought to be some way of preventing it. If it is to be allowed, there ought to be a fourth class and we should make those persons pay a reasonable price for doing the work. Hence I am compelled to vote against the bill of my friend from Maine, and will vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate has received, as I happen to know, being a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, very careful and deliberate consideration and investigation. We have sought information as to this measure from all sources, and the bill has been prepared as nearly correct as we could get it. It was prepared with the full knowledge that it would be criticised, because, where there are so many various and conflicting interests as there are affected by this bill, necessarily any committee that prepared a bill would subject themselves to criticism; and this is to be expected.

I will state at the outset that, had the views which I individually entertain been entertained by the entire committee, almost the whole of this third-class mail matter would have been stricken out, and what little would have been left would have been transferred to the second-class mail matter; and my reasons are these: An examination of the laws that were in force at the adoption of the Constitution of the United States will show that the purpose, design, and intent of the establishment of post-offices and post-roads was the transmission of intelligence, and nothing else. The various laws prior to 1787 show this to be so.

If that was the understanding and the intention of the clause "post-offices and post-roads" at the time the Constitution was adopted, then that is the constitutional meaning, purpose, and design at this time; and, so believing, I have not thought that merchandise was properly a matter which should go through the mails at all. That was my view of it. But in regard to seeds and roots, cuttings, and such things as have become a matter of necessity for the settlement of the western and southwestern country, I was not desirous or disposed to raise a constitutional objection on those points.

Mail matter proper is embraced in the first and second classes of the law: the first class being letters; the second, regular printed matter; the third, miscellaneous matter.

Mailable matter of the first class shall embrace all correspondence, wholly or partly in writing, except book manuscripts and corrected proof-sheets passing between authors and publishers.

Mailable matter of the second class shall embrace all matter exclusively in print and regularly issued at stated periods from a known office of publication, without addition by writing, mark, or sign.

The third class embraces miscellaneous matter going through the mails not enumerated in the first or second class. It is a fact that, if this third-class mail matter be not intelligence, then the mails of the country are used simply as a convenience for those desirous of transmitting merchandise or their own advertisements. Hence they use the mails simply as common carriers; and it is not just, it is not right, it is not honest that the whole people of the United States should be made to pay millions of dollars for the convenience of the few who thus use the mails; and yet that is the practical result of this system. The very able and interesting speech made yesterday in support of this bill by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads [Mr. HAMLIN] showed that the writers of letters pay over $4,000,000 to this Government for the privilege of sending their letters through the mail over and above the expense which the Government is at in transmitting those letters. In the next place it is shown that the newspapers which are regularly issued and constitute the second-class mail matter are millions—I do not remember the precise amount—but several millions in deficit of enough to pay the actual expense of their transmission.

Mr. HAMLIN. Seven million dollars.

Mr. MAXEY. Thus then you see what? That the letter-writers, the millions, the toiling masses of the people, who desire to keep up their correspondence with their friends away from home, and the business men of the country not only pay to the Government of the United States a full pay for sending their letters, but $4,000,000 over and above that amount, which $4,000,000 is absorbed in the transmission of newspapers, and then the balance of the people of the country have to pay $3,000,000 to complete this deficit. So much for newspapers. They and the letters comprise the first and second classes. But we have made no change so far as letters are concerned, no change so far as newspapers regularly issued are concerned, between the transmission of one for instance from the city of Washington to Baltimore and of one from here to San Francisco.

Now in regard to the two distances and the tariff of prices according to those distances, fixed by this bill, I desire to say that the bill as originally presented contained several different distances, three hundred, five hundred, eight hundred, and fifteen hundred miles, making different rates for those different distances. Living as I do west of the Mississippi River and far beyond the great commercial metropolis of the country, New York I made a motion, as stated by the Senator from Maine yesterday, to make but two distances, one under a thousand miles, the other over a thousand miles; and that was adopted by the committee, and so the bill is reported.

If it be true—and that it is true you have only to examine the bill—that the legitimate mail matter going through the mail is embraced in the first and second classes which are untouched by this bill, and if it is true that this bill covers that which properly was characterized by the chairman of the committee [Mr. HAMLIN] as merchandise, then it is not legitimately entitled to claim the right to go through the mails. I say it has no legitimate claim to go through the mails, and yet, if it be permitted as a convenience, it should pay its way like anything else that is carried by common carriers, according to distance. That is, it seems to me, common sense.

We have heard a great deal said about retrenchment and reform in this Government. I claim to be and am in favor of sound and just economy. I do not believe in this thing of "saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung," but I am for striking where economy really should strike; and that is in this instance where the people of the United States are paying millions of dollars for the convenience of a few. That is exactly what we are doing to-day. The transmission of this merchandise through the mails is a convenience to those who send it; but the expense of transmitting it is in a large degree paid by the masses of the tax-payers of this country who are not benefited by its transmission. That is unjust, and the theory of this bill is that "he who dances must pay the fiddler." That is what we mean, and if the Senate will sustain us we will save this Government in this item about $7,000,000, and thus lessen the taxes of the people that much. That is not "saving at the spigot," but it is "saving at the bung;" and it is in matters of this kind that we ask that the Senate of the United States shall come to the help of this distressed country in true economy, in true retrenchment.

Mr. President, in regard to this distance of one thousand miles, if the theory be correct that this is not strictly legitimate mail matter, but simply permissible mail matter, and that it is for the convenience of those who send this merchandise, they should pay the expense, and not the people generally. That is the purpose of this bill. But it may be said that those who live at a distance, as I do, from the great metropolis have double rates to pay. That is not true. Do the people of Texas, of Kansas, of Nevada, do the people of Nebraska, of California, or Oregon trade with New York? Not one out of fifty trades there. In the State of Texas, for example, our trade-centers are Saint Louis, Galveston, and New Orleans, and all those points are within the radius of one thousand miles. For Kansas, Saint Louis is the trade-center. For Iowa, Nebraska, and Minnesota, Saint Louis and Chicago are centers of trade. And for Nevada, and Oregon, and California, San Francisco is the business center.

What we want in the way of merchandise to be carried through the mails, if it is permitted at all, we will send for to one of our own trade-centers, instead of building up one great city at the expense of other cities of the Union. We thus aid in keeping up the trade-centers for the various localities which fall within a radius of one thousand miles; and it will so happen that there is not one time in fifty that you may desire a thing of less weight than four pounds to be sent through the mails that you cannot get that article in one of our own trade-centers. And if it be so costly or so rare that it cannot be found in such places as Chicago, Saint Louis, New Orleans, Galveston, and San Francisco, then, to the one who desires to get that costly article and who has to send to New York for it, the difference is trifling; and it is a mere exceptional case to a general rule and therefore should not be considered. Hence, I say, those who think they are badly hurt by this rate should remember that there were on this committee three gentlemen who certainly understood the interests of their own country. This investigation was made with the utmost care and deliberation in the interest of the people, not in the interest of anybody except the people. We believe that the people are now unjustly taxed millions of dollars for the convenience of those who transmit merchandise through the mail. So believing and believing that the people have this money to take out of their own pocket to pay for those who thus desire to use the mail by permission for the transmission of third-class matter, we have framed the bill in such a manner as to make these things, as nearly as we are able to do, pay their own way.

Mr. BOGY. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MAXEY. Certainly.

Mr. BOGY. What objection is there to making a fourth class, so as to include merchandise distinct from publications of every description, and make a higher rate upon this fourth class, if you transport merchandise at all? I am opposed to the transportation of merchandise at all; but, if it is to be done, what objection is there to making a fourth class, to include merchandise? I am open to conviction.

Mr. MAXEY. I will answer the Senator from Missouri. One of the reasons which I had for moving to strike out the table of distances, three hundred, five hundred, eight hundred, and fifteen hundred miles, was that it complicated the matter; that the more simple you have anything the better for the country; that the one great reason why Great Britain, for example, collects her tariff with so much facility is the fact that she has but few articles upon which the tax is collected; and one of the reasons why our tariff is so defrauded is that we have more than three thousand articles taxed to be looked into, and thus fraud is invited. This general principle applies to the mails; the more complicated you have your system, the more classes you have, the more difficult it becomes, and the more liable to fraud.

Therefore, as I stated, what there is in the third-class matter that might be considered legitimately entitled to go through the mail should be transferred to the second class, and the balance entirely wiped out, and we should have but two classes; and I yet believe that that is the correct principle; but, as before stated, it was thought best by the committee to retain the third class and make it pay its way.

I have been in the habit during my life of expressing my honest opinions without much regard to whether they would be critisised or not. If I honestly believe a thing, I am in the habit of saying so. That is my belief about this thing. I do not believe these things should go through the mails at all. But it is like a great many other evils, when you get an evil fastened on the country, like these little shells that fasten themselves to the bottom of a ship, these barnacles, it is very difficult often to get rid of them, and hence we had to do the best we could, and if they were fastened there make them pay their way.

I had not intended to speak this morning in regard to this bill, and have done so at the suggestion of some of the committee.

Mr. BOGY. My friend has not answered my question.

Mr. MAXEY. I thought I had.

Mr. BOGY. Why not make a fourth class?

Mr. MAXEY. In endeavoring to reply to the Senator's question I tried to show that I was not in favor of a fourth class, because I was not in favor of a third class. I want but two classes. My objection to it is that you complicate the system. The more classes you have the more difficult it is to carry out the system; and therefore that was my reason for opposing it. I was opposed to a fourth class. I am opposed to a fifth class. I prefer two classes to three. I certainly prefer three to four.

Now, sir, one other word. I heard a remark thrown out yesterday, when the Senator from Maine was explaining the policy of the committee, which led me to suppose that it was thought by some that newspapers regularly issued were affected by this bill. Not at all.

There is nothing in the second class or the first class in the statute to be affected. It is only the third-class matter which is set forth in the bill, and which is regarded as merchandise and not strictly legitimate mail matter, but simply permissible mail matter. If, then, we can bring this merchandise to be tolerated at all in the mails, it should pay its own way. If this bill will accomplish that, certainly it will do great good and save the country millions of dollars, millions more than will be saved by cutting down a clerk's wages here and there.

Then, when third-class mail matter shall have been regulated by Congress, the committee propose to equitably adjust first and second class matter, so that each will bear its just share of the expenses. We shall endeavor by thorough examination to ascertain why it is that the first-class mail matter has to pay its own way and $4,000,000 toward paying somebody else's way. That is a matter for after-consideration, not the subject of debate at this time. I confine my remarks now entirely to the third-class mail matter, which is the subject-matter of this bill. While I do not pretend to say that the bill is perfect, I do say in all candor that I have never known any committee in the Senate or elsewhere who gave any subject a more faithful, conscientious, laborious investigation than was given to this subject by the Post-Office Committee; and I will add that it was done without the slightest regard to party, nor was there, so far as I know, any difference as to the general outline of the bill between the members of the committee. My judgment is the bill should pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WEST in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. HARVEY.]

Mr. EATON. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert the following:

That all mailable matter of the third class, referred to in sections 3878 and 3911 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, may weigh not exceeding four pounds for each package thereof; and postage shall be charged thereon at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof; that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed; but nothing herein contained shall be held to change or amend section 3879 of said Revised Statutes.

Mr. HARVEY. For the information of the Senator from Connecticut and others, I will state that the amendment is a transcript of the bill that passed the House of Representatives on the 20th of January last.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The bill reported from the committee may not be exactly a perfect bill, may not be the very best bill that possibly could be framed. It has, however, been presented after mature reflection on the part of the committee, and I think it is worthy of favorable consideration by the Senate.

The bill was designed to meet and avoid an improper burden upon the postal service and relieve the Government from providing by large appropriations for the deficiency in that service. The first question that presented itself to the committee, and one which I presume will present itself for the consideration of the Senate, is whether the Post-Office Department should be made self-sustaining. All will admit that that is desirable if it can properly be done, and especially so at the present time when there is so much embarrassment in the country and when the taxes of the people should be rendered as light as possible. At the present rates of postage on the different classes of mailable matter there is a deficiency of somewhere in the neighborhood of $8,000,000, which must be supplied by an appropriation from the public Treasury, unless some measure is adopted that shall make the postal service self-sustaining. The committee were of opinion, and I presume it will be admitted by the Senate, that it would be improper to increase the rates of letter postage; and I apprehend also that on the second class of mailable matter, newspaper publications, there would be opposition on the part of the Senate and on the part of the country to any increase of rates upon that class of mailable matter. Therefore, if any correction whatever of this admitted evil is made, it must be made by some alteration in the carrying of the third-class mail matter; and I think this is very desirable.

While I do not believe that the whole of the deficiency of the postal service arises from the cost of the transportation of mailable matter of the third class, yet I am satisfied that a very large percentage of the deficiency arising in the postal service is created by the carrying in the mails of what might properly be termed merchandise. I admit that I did not subscribe to the idea that that was the only cause of the deficiency arising in the revenues of the Postal Department. On the contrary, I think that deficiency arises from various causes. One of those causes is the extension of our mail-routes over the vast expanse of western territory where the postal service must necessarily be unremunerative. We have acquired the possession of a vast public domain, and our people, enterprising and active, have gone to and settled in those vast sections of the country. As a matter of course, they desire postal facilities. They desire to communicate with their friends at home, and their friends at home desire to correspond with them, and the Government has very properly extended the postal facilities even to the shores of the Pacific and through all the vast expanse of country lying between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean. I do not complain of that. I think that it has been wisely done. That extension of the postal service has necessarily entailed on the Government a very large expense; and this is one of the causes why the expenditures for the postal service have been so largely increased of late years.

Another cause of the vast expenditures for the postal service, which I believe now amount to between $35,000,000 and $40,000,000, is the exorbitant amount paid on mail contracts. While these contracts have been made and properly made to carry the mails, there is no question but that there has been a loose system of contracting for the purpose of carrying the mails, especially through the territory of the United States lying west of the Mississippi. Thousands and millions of dollars have been unnecessarily expended because of the improvident contracts that have been entered into for the carrying of the public mails; and the investigations which have been going on into the Post-Office Department as well as other Departments by the House of Representatives have demonstrated conclusively that a system of robbery has been perpetrated on the postal service through the medium of straw-bids and otherwise, entailing vast expenditures of money by reason of unconscionable contracts made for the carrying of the mail. I do not say that the Post-Office Department could protect itself against all the frauds that have been practiced upon it. I speak of this as a fact which explains to some extent the expenditure and the largely-increased expenses of the Post-Office Department.

Another cause of the vast amount of money required now to carry on the postal system in this country is, in my opinion, that there have been entirely too many employés in the postal service. I speak now especially of letter-carriers and clerks in the post-offices throughout the country. This has been done perhaps not with the full knowledge of the Postmaster-General as to the necessity of such force, nor perhaps was it a matter which he could entirely control. Unfortunately politicians have attempted in this department of the public service to provide for their political friends, just as they have done everywhere else; hence in many of the post-offices in this country there is a large number, an unnecessarily large number, of clerks pensioned upon the post-offices of the country, and also a large number of letter-carriers in many places wholly unnecessary for the service, that are pensioned upon the Post-Office Department. I wish in this connection to call attention to some facts in regard to this subject.

I find by looking at the Blue Book that the number of post-office clerks employed in the city of Baltimore is about seventy-five; and I call attention to this subject in this debate in order that, if there is a wrong here, as I apprehend there is, some means may be taken to remedy it. I do not say that that is an excessive number for Baltimore, because I find that in the city of Boston there are about three hundred and seventy-five clerks—a city, I suppose, of not greater population than there is in Baltimore. I cannot account for this vast discrepancy in the number of employés of the Department in these two places, unless there is a deficiency at Baltimore or a surplus of clerks in the city of Boston. So, too, in Chicago, there are about three hundred and forty clerks, while in Philadelphia, a much larger city, there are only two hundred and ten, a difference of about one hundred and forty between the numbers of clerks employed in these two different post-offices.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to state what perhaps I omitted to say to him as a member of the committee? At his suggestion I have addressed a note to the Department calling its attention to this very case and asking such explanation as it can give.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was speaking of the various causes why the postal service was not remunerative. Among them I referred to the excessive employment of post-office clerks and letter-carriers at various points in this country which help to swell the expenses of the Department, and I think it proper that it should be brought to the attention of the Senate and a remedy be provided for the wrong if any in fact exists.

I find that in Cincinnati there are about one hundred clerks; in Cleveland about fifty; in Indianapolis about forty; in New Orleans about one hundred and twenty. I do not know that these are excessive; but I find that there is a very great disparity between the amounts in these several cities and at some other points where perhaps there is not a greater number of inhabitants to be supplied. For instance, in the city of New Orleans there are about one hundred and twenty. I suppose that that is not a larger city than some others that have only about seventy-five. Saint Louis has about one hundred and thirty-five. Saint Louis is as large as Chicago, but has only a little more than one-third of the number of clerks. The same facts exist in reference to letter-carriers in different cities and large towns, and justifies the conclusion that there is something wrong in this regard.

I call attention to the existence of this great discrepancy in the number of employés at the post-offices in different cities of this country for the purpose of explaining, to some extent at least, one of the causes why the mail service is not self-sustaining, as well as to have the wrong, if any exists, corrected. It is utterly impossible, when there are such vast expenditures of money paid out by this Department, that the postal-service establishment can be self-sustaining at our present rate of postage. The same remarks which I have made in reference to the clerks in the post-offices apply also to letter-carriers. Almost every town of any large size now has its letter-carriers, and these are positions given to political friends. They are political offices, and they are multiplied for the purpose, very frequently, of finding some place for a political favorite, some man who is considered useful to the party; and hence in all the cities of this land and in all the large towns there is now an army of letter-carriers and post-office clerks who are paid out of the revenues of the Post-Office Department or out of appropriations made by Congress to supply the deficiencies in that Department.

This is one of the causes why the Post-Office Department to-day is not self-sustaining. It may be very convenient for gentlemen to have their letters brought to their doors and placed on their breakfast-table; to have their morning papers served in their own houses. But the people of this country are paying for the convenience of gentlemen who are thus favored, and it is only in the larger towns and cities that this favoritism of having their mails delivered in their own houses is provided for. Persons who live in rural sections of the country, who live in small towns and small villages, have no such facilities; and yet they are compelled to pay their share for the convenience enjoyed by persons who sit in their slippers by the fire and read their morning papers, instead of having to do as others do: go to the post-office and get them.

I do not mean to say that I am in favor of the abolition of the letter-carrier system or that I am in favor of restricting to a lower point than is necessary and proper the number of clerks employed. I think there should be a sufficient number of clerks to do the business in every office, and there should be enough letter-carriers, where the system is adopted, to serve the people in reasonable time. But if the Post-Office Department will give its attention to this subject, I think there might be a very material reduction both in the number of clerks and in the number of letter-carriers now in the pay of the Government.

But these, Mr. President, are not the only causes why the Post-Office Department is not self-sustaining. We have been carrying through the mails merchandise and that which amounts in fact to merchandise, though it may not be technically called merchandise, at very reduced rates, burdening this public service and entailing upon it vast expenditures of money beyond what has been derived from carrying these articles. All the articles included within the third class of mailable matter may, I repeat, properly be termed merchandise, for, while some of them may consist of books, pamphlets, and occasional publications, they are such as are issued for speculative purposes, designed to benefit the man who issues them and the man who sends them through the mail. Now, let us see what they are as a class in this bill.

"Pamphlets." Under that general denomination almost every kind of publication may be included. Why, sir, the laws of the different States of this Union are published in pamphlet form, and I as a lawyer desiring to become acquainted with the statutes of other States may send an order for a pamphlet copy of the laws of the several States of this Union and it is carried through the mail at nominal rates, when as an attorney it is valuable to me in my business, and for which I ought to be willing to pay a proper cost for the transportation when carried in the mail, as much so as if carried in any other manner.

So, too, "occasional publications." For instance, a gentleman desires to advertise a patent-right which he has secured, and occasionally he issues a publication advertising to the world that he has for sale a certain patent-right. He sends it through the mail. It is valuable to him, and he sends it all over the country through the mail for not one tithe of what it costs the public to carry it.

Regular publications devoted primarily to advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal subscription rates.

These business transactions are not to convey that kind of intelligence which the Post-Office Department was originally established to convey. They are those kinds of publications which bring to the sender profit, issued to advance his interest and extend his business, and do not convey that general intelligence in which the public are interested, not such as were originally designed to be carried through the mail. Other articles which are carried through the mail are also named: some nurseryman, some grower of plants, desires to send his scions, his plants, through the mails; it is his legitimate business, and he ought to be willing to pay for it that which it costs the Government and to be thankful for the facilities which the Government furnishes him to send those articles through the mails at the prime cost to the Government of carrying them. It is doubtless a convenience to the person sending them and the person receiving them, but it is a convenience which the Government is under no obligation to afford, and for which the parties benefited should pay at least the cost to the Government.

All these articles, too numerous to mention, are carried now through the mails at much less than it costs the Government to carry them. This bill proposes to some extent to correct the wrong that exists, and to that extent relieve the Post-Office Department by making those articles pay the Government just what the Government has to pay for the transportation of them. If that is not fair both toward the man who sends the article and the man who receives it, I cannot conceive what would be fair. It is at any rate a gratuity on the part of the Government to take these articles in the mail at all, and perhaps nothing but the exorbitant charges made by common carriers, and especially by express companies, has justified the action of the Government in subjecting the mails of this country to the inconvenience and burden of the transportation of any such articles.

But it has been found that common carriers and express companies have not infrequently imposed upon the public, and the Government has gratuitously consented that these articles included in third-class mail matter may be transported through the mails, which has to some extent counteracted the exorbitant charges made by the common carriers and express companies, and is, to a certain extent, a convenience as well as a relief to the people who are engaged in sending or receiving such articles. I am perfectly willing that it should be continued, in fact I am in favor of its continuance, but I wish to make it subject, so far as I can, to the exact expense that the Government incurs in the transportation of these articles. This bill aims at that result; and I am sure that at the rates charged in this bill, from the best information I can get, the Government will not be one cent profited by carrying these articles but will, perhaps, still be the loser by the operation.

Now in reference to the discrimination made in this bill between distances, that must be considered just and fair to every section of the country. My friend from Kansas proposes by his amendment to carry these articles throughout the entire country at the same rate, if I understand the purport of his amendment. I do not think that he represents a section of the country that has any right to complain of any unjust discrimination on the part of this Government.

Mr. HARVEY. Will the Senator permit me to explain?

Mr. SAULSBURY. In a moment. The people west of the Mississippi River have had extended to them the facilities which the people in every other section of the country have, so far as the Government could do it; and yet the mails through that section of the country have been far less remunerative to the Government than the mails in the eastern portion of the country and east of the Mississippi River; and therefore there is no injustice done to the West by the operation of this bill. On the contrary, they have been the recipients of special favors, because they have had the mails carried to them at a dead loss and cost to the Government. Now I will hear the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARVEY. I merely wish to explain to the Senator that the effect of the amendment is simply to place the law as it existed prior to 3d of March, 1875, when the law was changed by an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is the effect of the amendment, I admit, to restore the old law, but the old law was unjust in its operation. It was unjust in its operation to the Post-Office Department because it did not secure to the Department the proper compensation which ought to have been secured to it for the transportation of articles of the third class. Then it was unjust in its operation because it taxed the people of the whole country for the benefit of persons who used the mail for their own purposes and for which they paid but very nominal rates.

If the proposition had been brought here that for every one hundred miles there should be a different rate paid, it would have commended itself to my judgment as one of justice, but the committee in their magnanimity have extended the first charge to a distance of a thousand miles, subjecting all the people within a thousand miles to the same charge, and all the people over a thousand miles to a different charge. It would have been, in my judgment, much more equitable if we could have for every one hundred miles this mail matter of the third class carried at a different rate of postage. If that were practicable, it would be much more just, in my opinion. At any rate the proposition of this bill does no great injustice to any section of the country, no great injustice to any community. It provides for two rates, one rate being one cent an ounce for all distances of one thousand miles or under, and the other rate being two cents for each ounce for all distances over one thousand miles.

Mr. President, after the very exhaustive argument and speech of the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I deem it unnecessary to make any further remarks on this subject. His speech fully explained and illustrated the necessity for this bill, and the operation of the postal system from its very foundation, the object that was contemplated by the formation of the Postal Department, and the operations of that Department from its origin to the present time. It was deemed of primary importance in the origin of this Government that this Department should be self-sustaining; and up to 1841 that was the case. But now we find ourselves deficient in the revenues of that Department some $8,000,000. This bill proposes to correct to a certain extent that evil; and, if it is adopted by the Senate, it will, so far as mailable matter of the third class is concerned, subject it, not to any unjust charge, but make it contributory to a certain extent, at least equal to the expenditures on account of carrying the same.

There are some other points in connection with the postal service that I may hereafter, on some proper occasion, call the attention of the Senate to; but I will not detain the Senate further at the present time.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, it has been assumed throughout this debate that the necessity for the change proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads arises from the fact that we are now carrying this third-class matter at a loss. It is upon that point that I want some information from the Senator in charge of the bill. I cannot by any possibility see how the Government sustains loss by carrying third-class matter at one cent per ounce for the average distance carried in this country, and I want to give to the Senator from Maine some figures which were prepared for the Committee on Transportation some two years ago, when they had a kindred matter in charge. They made a careful investigation, as careful as they could, of the cost of carrying various classes of matter and of running our postal cars, in order to ascertain what should be the compensation to the railroad companies.

The demand of the railroad companies was that they should receive compensation at the rate of thirteen mills per linear foot of car per mile run. That was the highest demand made. Now let us compare the demand made by the railroad companies with the charge which the Government makes for carrying third-class matter and see how they compare, and also for a moment examine the cost to the railroads themselves of transporting this mail matter.

Thirteen mills per linear foot per mile run gives for a thirty-foot car, the usual size I believe used in mail service, thirty-nine cents per mile where that car runs with the mail. What does one cent per ounce give, allowing the average distance to be one thousand miles? One cent per ounce is sixteen cents per pound, or $320 per ton. For an average distance of one thousand miles, $320 per ton, thirty-two cents per ton per mile, allowing each car to carry eight tons—and its capacity is ten tons—you have eight times thirty-two cents per ton per mile, which is $2.56 per car per mile. The railroad companies only demand for all kinds of mail matter, letters and everything else, for the expensive mail-cars too, thirty-nine cents per car per mile, and yet one cent per ounce gives $2.56 per car per mile.

Let me repeat that, Mr. President. The highest demand made by the railroad companies is thirty-nine cents per car per mile, and the present rate on third-class matter is $2.56 per car per mile, allowing that the average is one thousand miles, and I think the average is less than one thousand miles, carried by rail certainly over the country. How we can suffer a loss when we collect from the people $2.56 per car per mile, if we pay the entire demand of the railroad companies, thirty-nine cents, I have been unable to figure. Consequently, these heavy losses that we have suffered I cannot understand, and I address these figures to the committee so that when the bill comes up again we may be enabled to understand them.

Now let us look at it in another point of view. Compare the amount collected from the people on this third-class matter with the cost of running railroads. The same committee to which I have referred, through the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL,] reported upon this subject as follows, and I believe from my own examination of the evidence the report to be correct:

The results as to the cost of moving one ton of car in passenger trains one mile, on four leading railroads, are as follows:

Bear in mind this is the swift passenger train and not the freight train that I am now speaking of.

	Cents.
Boston and Albany Railroad, cost per ton of car per mile run	1.7
New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, cost per ton of car per mile run	1.489
New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, cost per ton of car per mile run	1.2
Erie Railway, cost per ton of car per mile run	1.0
Average cost per ton of car per mile run	1.34

The weight of those cars unloaded is about ten tons. For an empty car, then, the average cost on these four leading railroads would be 13.41 cents for running a car one mile—the actual cost to the railroad. Suppose that car, then, to be loaded with ten tons of mail matter, it would double it, or amount to 26.81 cents. The actual average cost being 26.81 cents, the people pay, if we carry only eight tons upon the car, $2.56. Certainly over $2 for every mile these cars run is a fair profit.

One of the great difficulties complained of by the railroad companies is that the Government requires too expensively built and furnished cars and takes too much space for the tonnage carried. To my mind there is no conceivable reason why this third-class matter may not be carried in the ordinary cars, or, at least, inexpensively built and furnished cars; and I cannot conceive that the expense of carrying it should be greater than the expense of carrying passengers, and yet I have shown you that the expense of the passenger trains on four leading roads is but 1.34 cents per ton per mile, or 13.41 cents per car.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that that estimate relates also to the light mail that is carried in these magnificent postal cars, while as a matter of fact most of the third-class matter is carried in different cars.

Mr. WINDOM. Let me read another extract from this report of that committee based upon the figures of the cost of running a car per ton upon the four railroads named:

Dividing the average cost of moving a ton of car one mile (1.34 cents) by 2.66, (the number of linear feet representing a ton of passenger-car,) we obtain five mills as the actual cost of transporting each linear foot of car per mile run. If to this amount 50 per cent. be added for profits, making the net income from the postal service 33⅓ per cent. of gross earnings, we obtain seven and a half mills per ton per mile run as a compensation, covering cost and about the average amount of net income on railroads in the United States, instead of thirteen mills demanded by the railroad companies.

That committee found, upon a full investigation of the question, that seven and a half mills per linear foot was fair compensation to the railroads. They demanded, as I said before, thirteen mills per linear foot, and yet at the full face of their demand the people pay some ten times more for the transmission of this third-class matter than the railroads demand for carrying it, and that, too, as my friend from Oregon has suggested, upon very expensively built mail-cars.

There are some further statistics here with reference to the cost of carrying:

From data presented in the last annual report of the Illinois Central Railroad it appears that the actual receipts from the passenger business were at the rate of 7.18 mills per linear foot of car per mile run.

The foregoing results may be summarized as follows:

1. Average cost per linear foot of cars per mile run on four main roads, with 50 per cent. added for profits, 7.50 mills.
2. Average cost per linear foot of cars on the railroads of Massachusetts, with 50 per cent. added for profits, 7.98 mills.
3. Actual average charges per linear foot of car per mile run, as per report to the State engineer, by New York Central and Hudson River Railroads, 7.37 mills.
4. Average charges Illinois Central Railroad per linear foot of car per mile run, 7.18 mills.

This is the average cost on all these leading representative roads, being in all cases below eight mills per ton per linear foot of car per mile run; and yet the rate now charged upon third-class matter, as I said a moment ago, gives for a thirty-foot car $2.56, or seven and a half cents per linear foot of car run. The cost of all the railroads of the country—and I ask the attention of the chairman of the Post-Office Committee to this—adding 50 per cent. for profits, is seven and a half mills per linear foot, and yet the rate to-day that the people pay on this third-class matter gives seven and a half cents per linear foot, or ten times the amount of the actual cost, with 50 per cent. added to the railroads for carrying it. How it is that the Government is losing and that we can save millions of dollars by taking off this matter, I have been unable to understand, and it is a conundrum which I present to the chairman of the committee and hope he will explain to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am inclined to believe, all things considered, that the bill as reported from the committee ought to receive the sanction of the Senate. If I understand the bill correctly, it reduces the postage upon all transient newspaper matter to what it was previous to the last year when it was made double. Formerly transient matter in the mails, such as newspapers, was charged one cent for each two ounces. The fifth section of this bill makes the postage one cent for three ounces and a cent for each additional two ounces, which on all transient matter, such as newspapers, of course reduces the postage greatly from what it now is. I understand that newspapers sent from the office of publication to regular subscribers are not touched by this bill. In that case the postage I believe is two cents a pound—even less than on merchandise or third-class matter.

It occurs to me that if persons for convenience—because it is a great convenience—desire to send what would otherwise have to be sent by express, through the mails, that matter ought to pay the cost of transmitting it. It is well known that if you take a package of four pounds or half a pound to an express company, they charge for it according to distance, and a long distance is charged much greater than a short distance; but in the mails the reverse is the case. A package of merchandise can be sent through the mails to the farthest point, three thousand, or four thousand, or five thousand miles, and part of the way on horseback, which costs the Government probably ten times as much in some instances as is received for it, at no greater price than if it is sent ten miles. The package carrying does not pay, because for short distances merchandise is sent by express and for long distances by mail.

But I rose more especially to answer a part of the argument of my friend from Minnesota. He has given some statistics which were gathered a few years ago by himself as chairman of a committee of which I had the honor to be a member. In his treatment of car-loads of mailable matter he said that the capacity of the car was ten tons, but he calculated it at eight tons; but in his latter estimate he made it ten tons, I believe. But that is not important. He will recollect probably that the railroad men said that while the capacity of the car was eight tons, yet with the high speed they ran, six tons were as much as they would permit in a car. So his calculation ought to have been on the basis of six tons, and not eight or ten tons.

Again, it must be borne in mind that a mail-car has to be run at times with the fractional part of a load. It cannot always be loaded; it cannot always have its full capacity.

Mr. WINDOM. But, if the Senator will remember the statement I made, I assumed that we paid for a full loaded car; that we ran thirty-feet cars, and paid what the railroads demand, thirteen mills per ton per mile, which would make thirty-nine cents; and that even if we paid for a full car all the time, we then are collecting from the people nearly ten times as much as that on this third-class matter.

Mr. DAVIS. But the Senator estimated that there would be eight tons of mailable matter in that car each time it ran.

Mr. WINDOM. Then allow me to change that for a moment, if the Senator will permit. Multiplying thirty-two cents per ton per mile by six will give you $1.92 per mile of car run, whereas the railroad companies demand only thirty-nine cents. I am willing to take it on those figures, not quite so strong as in the other case; but that makes some eight times as much.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator also introduced the leading railroads of the country to give a fair estimate of what they demanded, and what was a fair cost to run them per car; but it appears to me the question is not that; for he knows that probably eight-tenths of the mail-matter is not hauled on the lines of road which demand the price spoken of by the Senator from Minnesota. The great cost of the mail service to the Government is not on the railroads. The Senator from Maine yesterday well said, that if we had rail transportation for all this matter, the existing rates would do; but much of it has to be taken into the interior of the country by stages and by horses. In those portions of the country the mails are generally most used for the transmission of third-class matter. Within five hundred miles of here packages are generally sent by express; but on the routes going into the Territories and to the Pacific, and where the cost of transportation is great, the mails are used. If the distance is short, the matter does not find its way into the mails so readily, for it is sent by express at less cost.

It occurs to me that we ought to increase the postage on matter passing through the mails that is strictly merchandise. It is a great accommodation to the people to have this matter go through the mails, even though they pay the full rates of express charges; for you must bear in mind that the mail-route goes in many places where there is no express. In that way it is a great accommodation to the people; and I believe that nearly every person, perhaps ninety-nine out of a hundred, would be willing to pay what it actually costs the Government. Therefore it occurs to me that in some degree this transportation will give back to the Government a part of the cost even now. I believe the rate fixed by the bill which has come from the committee is too low, when we consider that the mail has to be taken upon horseback and in stages sometimes thousands of miles. It would be, I think, justice to all if the rates were higher where the distance exceeds two thousand miles.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator from West Virginia whether even on the stage-lines thirty-two cents per ton per mile does not very nearly pay? That would be for twenty miles $6.40, and that is a daily business, a constant supply on hand. I think I have any number of constituents who would undertake to haul a ton twenty miles for $6.40, and that is what it is now, allowing a thousand miles, if I am not wrong in my average. I think we do not carry this matter an average of a thousand miles, or anything like it, and if we do not then the figures are much stronger on the side stated by myself.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator from Minnesota is in error about the distance. As I stated a moment ago, packages for short distances do not readily find their way into the mails, but are sent by express. It is when the distance is long that they go in the mails. As to hauling mail matter at $6.40 a ton, I have no doubt, if the man could have a full load and it could be drawn by an ox-team, in some of the western Territories you could get it hauled; but bear in mind that you put these people up to time. Time is more essential than money sometimes, or than mail matter. The complete answer to the Senator is that I believe the contract price in the Territories at which this mail matter is hauled is more like $6 a pound than $6 a ton. The answer to the whole of it is that it is not done. The Government has to pay now $6 a pound I believe in some cases.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator thinks I am mistaken in assuming a thousand miles as the average distance that this third-class matter is carried. Let me call his attention to the fact, and see whether he is not mistaken himself. This matter is distributed from the leading cities of the Union, from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, Saint Louis, Cincinnati, &c. Does he think that the amount of matter is greater which goes more than a thousand miles from each of these circles than that which is delivered within the circle of a thousand miles from all these various centers that send it out? My own belief is that there are ten pounds delivered within this limit of a thousand miles to one that goes beyond it from these cities, and that my average of a thousand miles is altogether too large, and it is not carried so far as that.

Mr. DAVIS. The answer to that is furnished by the report of the Post-Office Department. The Department have given this subject a great deal of attention. They have for years been making experiments, watching the mails and weighing them, in order to ascertain the result. What do they say? They say that the Government lost on this third-class matter last year between five and six million dollars in transportation. They say that the first-class matter pays a profit of between four and five million, and that the second-class is carried at a loss of about six million dollars. We are now dealing with the third-class specially, and not touching the first and second classes. After careful examination, weighing the mails and taking into consideration the mail contracts throughout the country, part on horse, sometimes one, sometimes two, and sometimes a four horse coach, the Department estimate the cost of carrying third-class matter and find that the Government paid last year to the persons receiving third-class matter in the shape of merchandise between five and six million dollars.

Mr. WINDOM. That is a conclusion, I think, rather than a statement of facts. I gave very good attention to my honorable friend from Maine nearly throughout his entire speech yesterday; possibly during the few moments I was out of the Chamber he may have mentioned it; but the difficulty in my mind is how the Department know precisely the difference in the cost of first, second, and third class mail matter. I have very serious doubts whether the difference in cost is not somewhat guessed at.

Mr. DAVIS. I am inclined to think the Senator is right in part, and that in some cases the figures only approximate the truth. I am told that the manner in which they found out what the cost was for long distances was by the amount sent and by the payment on the routes. I understand from the Post-Office report that if we had all rail transportation probably there would be a profit instead of a loss at present rates, but it is understood that probably two-thirds of the distance that merchandise is taken is off railroads and either by stage or on horseback.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I am not in favor of making the postal system self-supporting, but I am in favor of confining it to the legitimate purposes embraced by it. As was said yesterday, the purpose of our postal system originally was, and it seems to me the legitimate purpose of it is, to transport private and public intelligence. It was an essential provision in our organic system. It was intended to effectuate one of the great purposes contemplated by our free republican system of government. It was intended to enlighten the popular mind. Therefore I am strongly in favor of making postage upon letters, upon newspapers, upon pamphlets, upon magazines, and upon books, nominal. The more readily, the more frequently, the more generally the people get information, the better for the country, the more enlightened they become. The cheaper postage is, the more intelligence of this character will go to the people throughout the whole breadth of the land.

I cannot understand how it ever was contemplated, or how it can be, that Congress shall undertake to make the postal system a means of cheap transportation for merchandise. If it is wise and politic for the Government to carry four pounds of merchandise, that is four pounds of dry goods, or four pounds of harness, or an ax weighing four pounds, or any other article of that weight, it seems to me there is a like obligation upon the Government to provide the means for transporting twenty pounds, fifty pounds, a hundred pounds, or a thousand pounds. The obligation rests upon the Government under that theory to provide for transporting cheaply all the merchandise that is carried from one section of the country to another, from time to time and all the time. It never was contemplated that such a thing should be done. It is illegitimate in my judgment to do it, and no reason has ever been assigned for it except the reason of convenience. Suppose we had the power to do it, to what extent might Congress venture to grant this convenience to that class of people who want to make the mails a vehicle for the transportation of merchandise? Certainly not beyond that which will pay for the transportation. If I want the convenience of transporting through the mails a silk dress to a friend of mine in San Francisco, or to another friend in Oregon a set of harness, I ought to be willing to pay the Government at least what it costs the Government to transport it. It would be doing injustice to every other citizen of the United States if I could have the advantage of transporting those articles through the mails for less than it costs the Government to take them. It is unjust; it is wrong in theory, and it is wrong in practice.

We find in practice, granting that it may be done for the sake of convenience, that those who transport merchandise through the mails do not pay what it costs by a very large percentage. The loss last year on account of the transportation of such matter was between four and five millions of dollars. Those who had the benefit of that transportation got it at the expense of the vast majority of people who had no interest in it at all. That service was no benefit to the public generally. It did not add to the spread of intelligence; it did not add to the stock of enlightenment of the American people, as would have been the case if newspapers had been sent instead, or books or pamphlets or anything calculated to enlighten the mind or convey intelligence. That was a purely selfish transaction, not calculated to benefit the public in any sense whatever. It was only calculated to benefit the parties who were concerned in the immediate transaction; and there is no more reason why they should have had that benefit than that the merchant should have had the benefit of sending through the mails his whole stock of goods from New York to San Francisco, or to some point in Oregon, or to some point in Minnesota. There is as much reason in transporting a whole stock of goods as there was in transporting the pair of harness to Arizona that the Senator from Maine alluded to yesterday.

If merchandise is proposed to go through the mails, for one I am for making whoever sends it through the mails pay for it, pay every farthing it costs the Government to transport it. That is right and just. It is even doubtful whether Congress has the power to engage in any such business. I think the question might well be raised as to whether Congress has the power to allow the transportation of merchandise through the mails; but I do not care to make that point here now. It seems to me it is too plain upon other grounds that we ought not to adopt any such policy.

I think the bill under consideration embraces too much in the third class. It contains a great deal that is as legitimate as a newspaper, and which, in my judgment, ought to go as cheaply as a newspaper. I will call attention to two or three. The third class embraces "pamphlets." Pamphlets generally contain intelligence of an important character, which the people want promptly. It is through pamphlets that they are enlightened. The speeches in pamphlets that go out from this Capitol convey intelligence to the people about the condition of the country; they convey important statistical facts, important legislative views, that the people ought to be familiar with in order that they may have their judgments better informed as to the character of the men they ought to send here to legislate for them.

Then I suggest also that "prices-current" ought not to be embraced in this third class. Prices-current are intended to inform the people everywhere. I believe they are generally sent out without cost. They inform the people as to the state of the markets, information that every industrial man wants, and indeed almost every class of people wants it. "Posters" are intended to give information of what is going to happen at an early day. The people want that and want it promptly, and they ought to have it cheaply. It is legitimate that they should go through the mails. "Prospectuses," and I go further, and say that "books, bound and unbound," ought to go through the mails and ought to go cheaply, upon the theory, as I said in the outset, that these things are calculated to add to the stock of public information. They enlighten the popular mind, they convey intelligence in one sense or another, and although they are carried at the expense of the Government, although the postal system in carrying them may not be self-supporting, the Government has done a good and economical thing in scattering them broadcast throughout the land.

In that view and acting somewhat upon the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] while he was making his remarks I prepared an amendment which I will offer. I will offer a first amendment with a view to a second. If it is not in order I make the suggestion now and I will offer it when it is in order. I propose to strike all out after the word "scions," in line 13 of the first section, down to the word "service," in the eighteenth line, and to insert just before the word "scions," in the thirteenth line, the word "and," and then I propose to substitute the following:

All matter and articles not above the weight prescribed by law not provided in the first, second, or third classes of mailable matter, which may be made mailable by law, shall make the fourth class of mailable matter. The postage on mail-matter of the fourth class shall be at the following rates: For all distances of one thousand miles or less, for each ounce or fractional part thereof, —— cents; for all distances over one thousand miles, —— cents for each ounce or fractional part thereof; and every package of the fourth class of mail matter shall be post-marked and may be marked in all respects as provided in case of third-class mail matter.

And then for one I would be content to reduce very considerably the several matters and things mentioned in the first section of this bill. I think there are various things in this bill that might be included in the fourth class. "Phonographic papers, letter envelopes, postal envelopes and wrappers, cards, plain and ornamental paper, photographic representations, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions," &c., might go into the fourth class, and then I think "pamphlets, occasional publications, regular publications devoted primarily to advertising purposes or for free circulation or for circulation at nominal subscription rates, prices-current, catalogues, annuals, hand-bills," &c., ought to go quite as cheaply as newspapers, and upon the ground that all these things add to the stock of popular information; they are such information as the people want, and most of them convey intelligence that the people want promptly, and therefore they ought to get it cheaply. When it is appropriate, I will offer the amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to suggest to him that he prepare accurately his amendment and have it printed.

Mr. MERRIMON. Very well. The amendment is framed on the basis I have stated.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that. I will say that several Senators have been to me to-day, and have requested that the vote should not be taken; and under that view of the case I shall not ask the Senate to vote upon this question to-day; but I should like to have the Senator's amendment printed. He can submit it and have it printed, because it is a good deal more intelligible and better understood when we have it before us in print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina propose an amendment?

Mr. MERRIMON. It is not in order now, I believe, but I will offer it at the proper time. I shall propose, when it is in order, to insert the word "and" before the word "scions" in line 13 of section 1, and to strike out after the word "scions" down to the word "service," in line 18. The words I propose to strike out are "and all other matter which may be declared mailable by law, and all other articles not above the weight prescribed by law, which are not, from their form or nature, liable to destroy, deface, or otherwise injure the contents of the mail-bags or the person of any one engaged in the postal service."

Mr. INGALLS. I would suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that his amendment is in order now.

Mr. MERRIMON. I understand there is a pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas is a substitute. This is to perfect the text and is in order.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I move the amendment which I have just stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to perfect the text by the amendment which he has stated. Does the Senator desire it to be put to a vote at this time?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not. As the Senator from Maine has not indicated a purpose to take the vote, I ask that the amendment be printed; and I suggest further that, after the Senate shall have acted on this amendment, I will offer what I now send to the table as an additional section to come in at some proper place.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed additional section will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. All matter and articles not above the weight prescribed by law not provided for in the second or third classes of mailable matter which may be made mailable by law shall make the fourth class of mailable matter. The postage on mail matter of the fourth class shall be at the following rates: For all distances of one thousand miles or less, for each ounce or fractional part thereof, —— cents; for all distances over one thousand miles, —— cents for each ounce or fractional part thereof; and every package of the fourth class of mail matter shall be post-marked and may be marked in all respects as provided in case of third-class matter.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from North Carolina says that the information circulated in the mails is a kind that we ought to have promptly and cheaply. I agree most cordially with the Senator from North Carolina on that point; and I desire to ask him whether he includes this kind of information that I find in a paper on my desk:

The following are the republicans who joined in the solid democratic vote, under the leadership of Benjamin F. Butler, to reject the best diplomatic nomination the President has sent to the Senate for years. It has been openly avowed that their votes were controlled, not by any sense that Mr. Dana was unfit for the post, but by the fact that his letter concerning the action of the Foreign Relations Committee was not sufficiently obsequious to their high mightinesses the Senators. This is the republican list. It is worth preserving:

ROSCOE CONKLING, JOHN P. JONES, SIMON CAMERON, JOHN A. LOGAN, NEWTON BOOTH, JUSTIN S. MORRILL, ANGUS CAMERON, OLIVER P. MORTON, HANNIBAL HAMLIN, JOHN SHERMAN, ALGERNON S. PADDOCK.

It is evident that the reporter of the press was not present, but I agree that it is worth preserving.

Mr. EATON. I simply wish to ask the Senator from Vermont if that is third-class or fourth-class matter, or merchandise? [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I think the reporter for that paper ought to be discovered and ought to be dismissed for his inaccuracy. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina has proposed an amendment to the text and also desires to offer at the proper time an additional section which it is moved now to print.

Mr. PADDOCK. I give notice that I shall at the proper time offer an amendment eliminating the figures "1,000," and inserting "1,800," as the dividing line of distances.

Mr. HARVEY. I move that the amendment offered by me as a substitute for the pending bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. If there is no other Senator who wishes to address the Senate at this time, I will move a postponement of this bill until Monday next.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that we proceed to the consideration of executive business, and then his bill will remain the unfinished business.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator may submit that motion.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-three minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and thirteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 6, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2678) to authorize the sale of the Pawnee reservation.

INLAND WATER NAVIGATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Chief of Engineers, on the practicability and the cost of inland water communication between the Mississippi River and the Atlantic Ocean, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MAJOR ARTHUR W. ALLYN.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of the 23d ultimo, copies of correspondence, &c., in the case of Major Arthur W. Allyn, United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DES MOINES RAPIDS, MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the board of engineer officers on House bill No. 117, to provide for the use of the surplus water along the canal at Des Moines Rapids, Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to an inquiry as to the life-saving service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I call for the regular order.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to make a personal explanation.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I withdraw the call for the regular order to allow the gentleman from West Virginia to make an explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks consent of the House to make a brief personal explanation. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman from West Virginia will proceed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FAULKNER. I propose to call the attention of the House to an article that appeared in the Washington Republican, which I believe is the recognized organ of the Administration in this city. The editor heads this article, in large capitals, "Serious charges against C. J. FAULKNER," and proceeds in the course of it to state what those charges are. I hardly think that I should dignify that article to the extent of having it read at the Clerk's table, so as to be incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but, if any gentleman so desires, that can be done. I propose simply to notice one or two of the matters contained in that article.

Mr. Speaker, I should have been very much disappointed, I might indeed say I should have been mortified, if, in the flood of obloquy and defamation which for the last two months has, from the same source, been poured upon almost every active and leading man on this side of the House, I had not come in for some share of abuse from this reckless and habitual defamer. It might well have been construed into evidence of my insignificancy which might have been wounding to my personal pride. It is, however, some consolation to me that with an official life extending through many years, and challenging the most unsparing scrutiny, and with an eager disposition upon the part of these hyenas of the press to feed upon filth and garbage, they have found nothing worthy of attack except the perverted and easily-explained matters contained in this article in the Washington Republican, an article marked by consummate ignorance and which would be wholly unworthy of any notice here if it did not connect itself with proceedings before this House and a committee of this House.

This leading organ of the Administration, in his ignorance, has confounded two transactions that have no possible connection with each other. I will refer to them separately.

Early in the session, some of my impoverished constituents—men who had been in the employment of the Government as mechanics and laborers at Harper's Ferry about the opening of our civil conflict in 1861—sent down their petitions to be paid their wages for March and April, 1861, which they alleged had been honestly earned and which had never been paid by the Government. I forwarded these claims to the proper Bureau for examination and settlement. The reply came that these demands could not be paid by the Department: first, because the claimants were believed to be disloyal; and, secondly, because the appropriation of that year had been carried to the surplus fund, and was no longer under the control of that Department; and it was further stated that relief could be given only by Congress. I accordingly had the subject referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, where these claims are now pending, subject to their consideration and action. This embraces all my connection with that subject.

The other transaction, which this common defamer has so ignorantly confounded with the one just stated, was this: In 1858 Dennis Murphy, of my county, was appointed military store-keeper and paymaster at Harper's Ferry. I was one of four solvent men who became his securities in his official bond. He settled his accounts—and so they appear upon the books of the Department—with the most scrupulous accuracy up to the 1st of January, 1861. His settlements being quarterly, no further account was required of him until the 1st of April, 1861. Before that last quarterly settlement could be made the confederate forces took possession of Harper's Ferry, the vault in which his vouchers were contained was broken open, and every voucher but one destroyed. In the absence of these legal vouchers the accounting officers of the Treasury had to treat him of course as a defaulter; but having the highest moral and persuasive evidence in their possession that he was not really a defaulter, they permitted the matter to slumber until the 8th of January last, when the first information was given to the securities of this apparent balance on the books of the Treasury. It was then deemed expedient to present a petition to Congress, in which all the facts of the case were carefully set forth; and as Allen C. Hammond, the security thus petitioning, resided in the State of Maryland, Mr. O'BRIEN, of that State, very kindly took charge of the petition and had it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee sent the petition to the Chief of the Ordnance Bureau to examine the statements contained in it, to return copies of any papers bearing upon the subject, and to express his opinion upon all the evidence before his Bureau whether Paymaster Murphy was in default or not, and, if so, to what amount. A report was made by the Chief of the Ordnance Bureau, which passed from him into the hands of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, who also made a report, and thence through the Acting Secretary of War, George M. Robeson, to the Committee on Military Affairs of this House. I will quote but two short paragraphs from the report of the Ordnance Bureau:

> If all the checks thereon reported were drawn in favor of public creditors and from the balance shown to be on hand December 31, including remittances after that date, as shown by statement B, it would seem that he had accounted for all the public money intrusted to him.

And again, at the conclusion of his report, he says:

> In my opinion the sureties of Military Store-keeper Murphy should be relieved from responsibility under their bond.

It was obvious that under these reports the Committee on Military Affairs could have done nothing less than report a bill discharging the securities from all further liability. But I said to my friend, Mr. HARDENBERGH, of New Jersey, a member of that committee, when he showed me these reports, that I did not wish the Committee on Military Affairs to report any bill in conformity with them; that I could not consent that any bill should pass Congress while I was a member of it that would release me from pecuniary liability to the Government; and I accordingly requested my friend, Mr. O'BRIEN, to withdraw the papers from the files of the House, as I also informed him that I could not consent that any legislation personally benefiting me should take place while I was a member of the body. The papers were accordingly, on the motion of Mr. O'BRIEN and with the assent of the petitioner, Hammond, by his agent and representative, withdrawn from the files of the House about four weeks ago.

And yet these are the facts upon which the leading organ of the Administration in this city announces in staring capitals, "A serious charge against C. J. FAULKNER," and asks that an investigation shall be made into it. Sir, if I do not characterize the editors of this public journal in the terms which they merit, and this Administration which feeds and nourishes these vipers that bask in the sunshine of executive patronage, it is not from any respect to either, but because I feel restrained by that sense of propriety which is due to a unanimous vote of this House according to me the privilege of a personal explanation. I have been honored by the people with many positions of high trust and responsibility, and, while I boast no higher purity or exemption from infirmity than should characterize every ordinary American citizen, yet I should welcome with unaffected pleasure the most rigid and unsparing scrutiny into every personal and official act of my life.

The public press is one of the grandest instrumentalities ever designed for the perpetuation of free institutions and for the good of mankind. But to fulfill its exalted destiny it must be honest and under the dominion of truth. A corrupt, prostituted, debauched, and mercenary press is an enemy of liberty and a curse to the human race. No one who has observed the course of the leading organ of this Administration during the present session of Congress but must have been struck with the unutterable baseness and degradation of its columns. You find this fully illustrated in the facts that have this day been brought to your attention. With the privilege of free admission within these walls to obtain correct information of the proceedings of this body and for the purpose of imparting that information correctly to the public, you find it deliberately perverting innocent, if not meritorious, acts of a member of this House and spreading through the community the most unblushing perversion of his acts. Their ignorance of the facts is no excuse for their misrepresentations. If, as the celebrated Fox once said, ignorance in a statesman is a crime, so inexcusable ignorance in an editor is equally a crime, where that is made the cover under which he falsely and wickedly holds up to public accusation and scandal a meritorious act of one of the representatives of the people.

PROPERTY OF THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. BALLOU. I rise to make a privileged report. I have been instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the petition of Messrs. F. & J. Rives, asking Congress to purchase the plates and bound and unbound volumes of the Congressional Globe, to report a resolution for reference to the Committee on Appropriations, accompanied by a brief statement.

The statement and accompanying resolution were read, as follows:

Statement of the kind, amount, and present condition of the property of the Congressional Globe, as described by the present owners and proprietors, and offered by them to Congress for a consideration.

The Congressional Globe commenced with the Twenty-third Congress, in 1833, and closed with the Forty-second Congress, in 1873, containing a complete record of the work and proceedings of Congress for a period of forty years, embracing the last term of President Jackson's administration and the full terms of Presidents Van Buren, Harrison, Tyler, Polk, Taylor, Fillmore, Pierce, Buchanan, Lincoln, Johnson, and the first term of President Grant.

The work has been published in one hundred and eight volumes, eighty-three of which, together with one index volume, have been stereotyped upon 73,069 plates; leaving twenty-five volumes without stereotype-plates, but with printed copies of each volume, either bound or unbound, ranging from ninety-three, the smallest number of any one volume, to twenty-one hundred, the largest number, namely:

Printed copies of volumes not stereotyped.

	Bound.	Total.
Part of Twenty-fifth Congress, (1837-'39:)
Volume 4	3	844
Twenty-seventh Congress, (1841-'43:)
Volume 8	3	150
Volume 9	4	93
Volume 10	11	583
Volume 11	20	798

Printed copies of volumes not stereotyped—Continued.

	Bound.	Total.
Part of Twenty-eighth Congress, (1843–'45:)
Volume 13	6	659
Volume 14	3	656
Thirtieth Congress, (1847–'49:)
Volume 18	3	784
Volume 19	3	1,162
Volume 20	3	1,920
Thirty-first Congress, (1849–'51:)
Volume 21		516
Volume 22		865
Volume 23		226
Volume 24		886

Volume 29	3	2,003
Volume 30	4	2,004
Volume 31	4	2,004
Part of Thirty-third Congress, (1853–'55:)
Volume 32	4	2,004
Volume 33	3	305
Volume 34	4	307
Volume 35	4	304

The total number of bound volumes reported is..... 25,071
The total number of unbound volumes reported is..... 40,951

There are complete sets of plates for seventy-four consecutive volumes, from the second session of the Thirty-third Congress (1853-'55) to the third session of the Forty-second Congress (in 1873) inclusive, and there are ten sets of plates from the Twenty-third to the Twenty-ninth Congress, (from 1833 to 1847 inclusive.)

Ninety-three sets can be produced, without reprint, by binding the old volumes of printed sheets. Seven volumes would have to be reprinted in order to complete five hundred full sets, and the reprint of seventeen volumes would enable the binder to complete two thousand sets.

The plates are partly stored in a fire-proof building, two stories high, in the rear of the Globe office, north of Pennsylvania avenue, which can be purchased of the proprietors, and is capable of holding all the stereotype plates and several thousand bound volumes. Most of the bound volumes are in the fire-proof building; a portion of the unbound volumes are in the Globe office, and a portion are stored in the country.

The Printing Committee are informed that the foregoing-described property must be sold in the settlement of the estate of F. & J. Rives, and probably will be destroyed unless purchased and preserved by Congress.

To reprint the entire work would cost not less than $700,000, and as it contains the only complete record of Congress during the most eventful period of the country's history, and will probably grow more rare and valuable with the lapse of time, and as the entire work can at this time be secured for distribution and preservation at a nominal price, the Committee on Printing unanimously recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sum of —— dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of purchasing all the property of the Congressional Globe of its present owners and proprietors, after statement and schedule annexed, embracing all the stereotyped plates, the bound and unbound volumes, and the copy-right, together with the fire-proof building located in the rear of the Globe office, where most of the plates and bound volumes are now stored.

Mr. BALLOU. I move that the resolution and accompanying statement be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

SALARY OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the bill (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States with a unanimous recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of order.

Mr. HOAR. My point of order is that the regular order of business has been demanded, and this report is not a privileged report, the Committee on Appropriations being only privileged to report at any time the regular appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged report, and was made so by the unanimous order of the House yesterday. The Committee on Appropriations were authorized to report back this bill at any time, and in pursuance of that authority the report is now made.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is the bill reported for reference to the Committee of the Whole House?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; it is reported for action at this time, and is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. I was not aware that the committee had got leave to report this bill at any time. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read. It provides that from and after the 4th day of March, 1877, the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum; and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to present a report from a committee.

Mr. HUNTER. I demand the regular order.

NATIONAL RATE OF INTEREST.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is demanded, and the morning hour now begins at twenty minutes before one o'clock. The call of committees for reports of a public nature is now in order, and the call rests with the Committee on Banking and Currency. The business first in order is the taking of the yeas and nays on the question of referring to the Calendar the bill (H. R. No. 1226) to fix the legal rate of interest on national money throughout the United States at not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum, and affixing penalties for its violation.

Mr. COX. I intervened a motion yesterday to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair at this stage of this proceeding the motion is not in order.

Mr. COX. Is not a motion to lay the bill on the table in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. COX. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were yesterday ordered on this motion. I do it in order to save time.

The question was put; and the Chair announced that there were 66 in the affirmative.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my motion; it may save time; the yeas and nays may be ordered anyhow.

Mr. WILSON of Iowa. Why not let the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union by unanimous consent?

Mr. ELY and Mr. RUSK objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state to the House that the motion now pending is the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUNTER] to refer the bill (H. R. No. 1226) to fix the legal rate of interest on national money throughout the United States at not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum and fixing penalties for its violation to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COX. It is a bill reported on adversely by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would further state that the Committee on Banking and Currency reported adversely on this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then an adverse vote on this question is substantially one to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. If the House will indulge me for one moment I would say that there are gentlemen here who wish to speak on this bill, and if it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union they can speak on the bill. I do not see why there should be any objection to its going to that Committee.

Mr. ELY. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. An adverse report simply leaves the bill before the House.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 75, nays 132, not voting 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Baker, Banks, Bradley, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. Burchard, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cason, Caswell, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Conger, Dobbins, Dunnell, Egbert, Evans, Fort, Freeman, Fuller, Goodin, Hale, Haralson, Hendee, Henderson, Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Hunter, Kelley, Kimball, Franklin Landers, Lapham, Lawrence, Lord, Lynch, L. Wallace, Walls, Whitthorne, James Williams, Wilshire, and Benjamin Wilson—82.

So Mr. HUNTER's motion was not agreed to.

During the roll call,

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, said: My colleague, Mr. PHILIPS, is absent from the House on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COX. I move to lay this bill upon the table, if that motion is not already pending.

The SPEAKER. That motion is pending.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order. Rule 164 of this House requires that when a committee makes an adverse report it shall be in writing and printed.

I submit that no report under the rules of the House has been made in reference to this bill in writing, and I therefore move that the bill be recommitted to the committee, so as to enable them to make a report.

Mr. HUBBELL. There is a written report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order; it comes too late.

The question was taken on Mr. COX's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the bill was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, requested the return to the Senate of the bill (H. R. No. 2678) for the sale of the Pawnee reservation.

COAST-SURVEY REPORTS.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the following resolution; which was read, and, under the law, referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That one thousand extra copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year ending June 30, 1874, and the same number of copies of his report for the year ending June 30, 1875, be printed for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. WARD, from the same committee, reported adversely upon House bill No. 1382, to provide for means of cheap transportation upon the interior waters, to restore the carrying trade of the United States, and for other purposes; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SHIPPING COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. WARD, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 2337, declaratory of the sense of section 4504 of the Revised Statutes relative to the shipment of crews of vessels of the United States.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 4504 of the Revised Statutes shall be so construed as to exempt the masters of vessels engaged in trade between the United States and the British North American possessions, or the West Indies, or the republic of Mexico, and the masters of vessels of less than seventy-five tons burden bound from a port on the Atlantic to a port on the Pacific Ocean, or vice versa, from shipping their crews or procuring their shipping articles to be signed before a shipping commissioner; but said section shall not be construed as exempting the masters of such of the hereinbefore-mentioned vessels as may be destined to foreign ports other than West Indies, British North American possessions, or the republic of Mexico from presenting their crew lists to collectors of customs for examination and certification, as required by section 4574 of said statutes.

SEC. 2. That all suits commenced in any court of the United States against the masters of the vessels, or their agents, hereinbefore described, to enforce any penalty for the failure to ship their crews or neglecting to procure the signing of their shipping articles before a shipping commissioner shall be discontinued on the payment of costs.

Mr. WARD. I desire to say a few words in explanation of this bill. Section 4504 of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

Any person other than a commissioner under this title, who shall perform or attempt to perform, either directly or indirectly, the duties which are by this title set forth as pertaining to a shipping commissioner, shall be liable to a penalty of not more than $500. Nothing in this title, however, shall prevent the owner, or consignee, or master of any vessel, except vessels bound from a port in the United States to any foreign port, other than vessels engaged in trade between the United States and the British North American possessions, or the West India Islands, or the republic of Mexico, and vessels of the burden of seventy-five tons or upward bound from a port on the Atlantic to a port on the Pacific, or vice versa, from performing himself, so far as his vessel is concerned, the duties of shipping commissioner under this title Whenever the master of any vessel shall engage his crew, or any part of the same, in any collection district where no shipping commissioner shall have been appointed, he may perform for himself the duties of such commissioner.

The bill before the House follows this portion of the statutes verbatim so far as the limitation to the vessels bound to ports in the British possessions, West Indies, and the republic of Mexico is concerned. The reason why this bill is asked for at this time is the necessity of a declaratory act upon this subject. Under the shipping act, of which the section I have just read is a part, the shipping commissioners assume to libel vessels and attempt to enforce the penalty imposed by this section of the Revised Statutes notwithstanding the proviso. This section was amended in 1873 by the addition of that portion making an exception in favor of vessels running to certain ports. It was regarded as sufficiently conclusive to prevent shipping commissioners from continuing to libel these vessels and enforce the penalties. Such, however, has not been the case; there have been several vessels libeled and an attempt made on the part of the shipping commissioners to enforce the penalties.

An appeal was made to the Treasury Department with a view to obtain some redress or some modification of the law. But the construction of the shipping law is such that the control is almost supreme with the shipping commissioners, and there is no power to restrain them except through the course of law. The subject was brought to the attention of the Treasury Department by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] who introduced this bill, and I call attention to a communication addressed to him by the chief of the navigation division.

The communication was as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 25, 1876.

SIR: Your official letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting an inquiry into the matter of a suit against R. H. Carlisle, commenced in Philadelphia, came by virtue of my duties in the Treasury into my hands. The views of this Department as regards the shipment of seamen are in conflict with those of the shipping commissioners at several ports, and there is a constant liability to the arrest of masters under the shipping commissioners' statutes, unless the proper construction can be given by Congress to section 4504 of the Revised Statutes.

I have drawn a brief bill which would settle the whole difficulty, and which could be passed before Mr. WARD's larger bill can be properly considered, if turned over to the proper committee. I take the liberty to inclose a copy of it for your consideration.

Very respectfully,

D. LYMAN,
Chief Navigation Division.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
House of Representatives.

Mr. WARD. The bill which I have the honor to report is one prepared at the Treasury Department to meet this difficulty. There is no way of meeting it except by a distinct act declaring what was the purpose of this section of the Revised Statutes, and giving the power to the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue these vexatious suits. I now ask for a vote upon the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHICAGO WATER-WORKS LIGHT.

Mr. WARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back, with amendments, House bill No. 2123, making an appropriation for a light on the tower of the crib at the lake end of the tunnel of the water-works of the city of Chicago.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $4,000, for the purpose of establishing a light on the tower of the crib erected by the city of Chicago at the terminus of the lake tunnels, and situated in Lake Michigan, about two miles from the Illinois shore: Provided, That the jurisdiction of the Light-House Board is hereby extended so that it shall be lawful for said board to lease at a nominal rent the necessary space in said tower for the erection and maintenance of said light so long as it may be used for the purpose herein provided: And provided further, That this appropriation shall not be available until the proper space has been duly leased, and that while the light on the tower of said crib shall be maintained one of the main lights on the shore at Chicago may be discontinued.

Mr. WARD. I am aware that it requires unanimous consent to consider this bill at this time, as it contains an appropriation. But there is an emergency for its passage, and if we await the action of Congress upon the ordinary appropriation bill it will be crowded over until too late to be of advantage to commerce upon Lake Michigan for this season.

No objection was made, and the amendments reported from the committee were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAM-PROPELLER SENATOR MIKE NORTON.

Mr. WARD also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, without amendment, the bill (H R. No. 702) for changing the name of the steam-propeller Senator Mike Norton to America.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the steam-propeller Senator Mike Norton to America, and grant a new register for the same.

Mr. CONGER. Is there a report accompanying this bill?

Mr. WARD. There is no written report. The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. ELY. I ask my colleague [Mr. WARD] to give some explanation of the necessity for this change of name.

Mr. WARD. The application of the parties sets forth that this vessel is used as a tow-boat in the harbor of New York. When purchased by the present owners, they were informed that the name could be changed upon application at the custom-house, that name being objectionable. Subsequently they learned that it was necessary to apply to Congress to authorize the change of name. They allege that from the connection of Senator Norton with the New York ring (of which members have heard something) the present name is prejudicial to the interests of their business. They therefore ask this change. I presume my colleague will not object to it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, in was according ly read the third time, and passed

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMER ISABELLE.

Mr. WARD also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 354) to give an American register to the steamer Isabelle.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the Dominion steamer Isabelle, owned by E. A. Starr, of Tacoma, Washington Territory.

Mr. CONGER. Is this a passenger-boat?

Mr. WARD. It is used for carrying passengers. I will state briefly the facts connected with the case and the ground upon which the application for an American register has been made.

It appears that the steamer was bought at Victoria, British Columbia, by Lewis M. Starr, in September, 1870, for $13,000, when he was under contract to carry the United States mails on the post-route between the cities of Olympia, Washington Territory, and Victoria. At that time he owned the steamer Alida, which was found inadequate to make the voyage within the time specified in the contract, and he could not obtain a license for her as a safe boat. This was when the season was too far advanced for him possibly to build a suitable vessel. He endeavored to buy one in Washington Territory, Oregon, and San Francisco, but was unable to do so. The approach of the tempestuous weather of winter made it absolutely necessary for him to procure another and safe boat or else forfeit his bonds to the United States and subject the public to the inconvenience and loss of his ceasing to carry the mails and passengers. Consequently he was compelled to buy the Isabelle as the means of temporary relief.

As soon as possible, in the following summer, the owner of the Isabelle built, in Washington Territory, the steamer North Pacific, expressly for the business already described, at a cost of $134,000 in gold, but he retains the Isabelle for use in case the other vessel needs repairs or becomes disabled. Much the largest portion of the trade is between way-ports, and for this the petitioner is prevented from using the Isabelle.

Although the original cost of the Isabelle was only $13,000, the petitioner has expended about $20,000 in repairing her. Every part of the vessel is new except the frame of her hull, some old planking, and the machinery. It was impossible to have the work done at any place within the United States except at great loss of time and hazard of the vessel and the lives of the people on board. The timber, spikes, iron, tubes, and other materials used in the repairs on reconstruction were purchased in the United States at a cost of about $10,500, and the labor employed was wholly or almost so that of American citizens brought to Victoria for that purpose.

The Isabelle was purchased by the present owner simply because the urgent want of such a steamer at the time would not admit of delay. No suitable American vessel could then have been bought for the purposes required. She can now be used to the great advantage of the people of Washington Territory by increasing the means of steam-travel on the waters of Puget Sound.

Under these circumstances it seems just and proper that the application to change the register should be granted.

Mr. CONGER. I am satisfied by the gentleman's explanation of the propriety and necessity for granting this vessel an American register.

Mr. WARD. The steamer has been put in perfect order, and has been repaired with materials obtained in the United States.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out E. A. Starr and insert Lewis M. Starr.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMBOAT ROBERT BASS.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1915) to change the name of the steamboat Robert Bass.

The bill was read. It provides that the name of the steamboat Robert Bass be changed to that of Molly Krater of Moline.

The amendments reported by the committee were to make the bill read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to change the name of the steamboat Robert Ross to that of Mollie Krater of Moline.

Mr. CONGER. I understand this to be a tow-boat.

Mr. WARD. Yes, sir; it is a towing craft. It is in good order.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

An amendment of the committee to strike out "Bass" in the title and insert "Ross" was adopted; and the title, as thus amended, was agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAME OF STEAMBOAT CHANGED TO F. C. A. DENKMANN.

Mr. WARD also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 511) to change the name of a steamboat, with amendments.

The bill, which was read, provides that the owners of the steamboat Caffrey have authority to change the name of said steamboat to F. C. A. Denkmann, by which name the said boat shall hereafter be known.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

In line 3 strike out "owners have authority" and insert "the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to change the name of."

Strike out these words in line 4: "change the name of said steamboat to."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAME OF STEAMBOAT CHANGED TO E. O. STANARD.

Mr. WARD also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2824) to change the name of the steamboat Paragon, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, with amendments.

The bill, which was read, provides that authority is thereby given to the owners of the steamboat Paragon, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, to change the name of said vessel to that of E. O. Stanard, by which name said vessel shall hereafter be known.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

In line 3 strike out the words "authority is hereby given to the owners" and insert "the Secretary be, and he is hereby, authorized to change the name of."

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "change the name of said vessel."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAME OF STEAMBOAT CHANGED TO DR. BURLEIGH.

Mr. WARD also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2252) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the steamboat Hiram Wood, with amendments.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the steamboat Hiram Wood to such other name as he may deem proper, and to grant to said vessel an enrollment and license in such other name. The said vessel is a commercial boat, and owned by Grant Marsh, of Omaha, Nebraska.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out in line 5 "such other name as he may deem proper, and to grant to said vessel," and insert "Dr. Burleigh and grant."

Strike out lines 7 and 8, "said vessel is a commercial boat and owned by Grant Marsh, of Omaha, Nebraska."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSTRUCTION AND FURNISHING OF NEW YORK POST-OFFICE, ETC.

Mr. RANDALL. I am instructed unanimously by the Committee on Appropriations to submit the following resolution for adoption by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department are instructed to proceed to make full investigation into the expenditures heretofore made under the direction of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department on account of construction and furnishing the public buildings of the United States, and especially as to the sums expended on the construction and furnishing of the New York post-office and court-house building; and they are also instructed to inquire into the cause and manner of the sale of the furniture formerly used in the Federal court-rooms in New York City, and as to the manner of purchase of new furniture for the new court-rooms; and to this end they are authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and to sit during the recess of Congress.

Mr. ELY. I will suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania that this resolution is in the line of investigation already in progress under the direction of the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings. Therefore, it should be referred to that committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I will modify the resolution so that the instruction shall be to the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings.

As modified, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AUSTIN AND TOPOLOVAMPO ROUTE.

Mr. THROCKMORTON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 218) to survey the Austin and Topolovampo route, with a favorable recommendation; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the report ordered to be printed.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2929) to provide for cheap transportation of freight between tide-water on or near the Atlantic and Ohio and Mississippi Valleys, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be made the special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for Wednesday, the 10th of May, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object, if it is understood that it is not to interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I will so modify my motion.

There was no objection, and, as modified, the motion was agreed to.

SECTION 2303 OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. MOREY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back the bill (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, and for other purposes, and moved that it be ordered to be printed and recommitted to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

SALE OF PAWNEE RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to lay before the House the request of the Senate which was sent over this morning and then to make a statement.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 6, 1876.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 2578) to authorize the sale of the Pawnee reservation.

The SPEAKER. This is a House bill which passed the Senate and came down from the Senate yesterday; and this morning it was reported to the House as having been examined by the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and was signed by the Speaker. The bill is therefore passed.

Mr. RANDALL. Has it passed out of the possession of the House?

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair it has not.

Mr. RANDALL. The practice has been uniform to grant, by unanimous consent, all such requests between the two bodies.

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair further to say that he has been informed at this moment by the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] that he has had an interview with Senators since the request for the return of the bill came to the House, and that they intimate their willingness to reconsider their request and allow the action of the Senate upon it to stand.

Mr. RANDALL. Still we do not know that. We only know what is of record. There is a distinct application on the part of the Senate to this House to return the bill. And it has always been the practice to grant such requests between the two bodies. I think we should by unanimous consent respond to the application of the Senate. I therefore move to reconsider the action of the House.

Mr. PAGE. I suggest that the matter be delayed till later in the day, that it may be seen if the Senate takes any further action.

Mr. RANDALL. I enter my motion to reconsider. I do not know anything of the subject-matter of this bill, but I think that between the two bodies there should always exist that relation which should induce each to grant promptly such a request as this on the part of the other.

Mr. PAGE. There can be no doubt of that; but I have been informed by the mover of the resolution in the Senate that he was laboring under a misapprehension, and that a motion to reconsider would be made.

Mr. RANDALL. Still, this request comes to us as the act of the Senate, and it is with that alone we have to deal.

Mr. PAGE. I suggest that any action be delayed till a later period of the day.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is entered.

HAWAIIAN TREATY.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 612) in relation to the Hawaiian treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SAYLER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Chairman, when the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the bill relating to the Hawaiian treaty was formerly under consideration, I was absent from the House on business of my committee, and I had the misfortune not to hear the arguments presented by gentlemen pro and con. Upon my return and on some slight examination of the RECORD I was surprised to find that there had been any discussion, much more any opposition to this treaty.

It is well understood, Mr. Chairman, that a treaty is next to the Constitution the highest law in the land, and the power to make treaties is vested in the Executive and the Senate, but in this case the House of Representatives can make a treaty operative, because this treaty involves some questions of revenue which properly belong to this House. By the Executive a custom-house might be ordered to be built, but it requires an appropriation from this House to make that order operative; and although this treaty by the sanction of the Executive and the Senate is the law of the land, it requires the voice of this House in consideration of this change in the revenue to make it operative.

I find, sir, one of the objections urged by the opponents of this treaty is the loss of revenue to the United States. It is claimed by the opponents of the bill that we will have a loss of $500,000 in revenue, without any adequate compensation in the shape of imports from the Hawaiian Islands. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this loss of revenue is more than compensated for by the monopoly of the trade of those islands.

The objections in the report of the minority of the committee follow too closely upon the heels of each other in their inconsistencies, as I shall show you. One of their objections to the bill is that not only is there a loss of revenue of two and two-fifths cents per pound on all the sugar imported from the Hawaiian Islands, but that we also lose the revenue on the sugars from the other islands in the Pacific, that it is claimed cannot compete with the Sandwich Islands in the production and exportation of sugar to this country, when we pay a bounty to the sugar-producers of the Sandwich Islands. And immediately following this, in most dangerous proximity, follows this other conclusion of the minority of the committee. They say:

Neither would this give us cheap sugar; the quantity imported is only 1 per cent. of our consumption, nor can it exceed (for natural causes, such as the limited quantity of arable lands) 5 or 6 per cent. of our consumption; and this cannot reduce the prices in our market.

It seems to me, and I think it will strike the committee, that one objection is fatal to the other; for surely, if the free import of sugar from the Sandwich Islands does not cheapen the price of sugar, it cannot materially interfere with the importation from other islands.

Another argument urged in opposition to this bill is the discouragement it gives to the sugar-planters of the Southern States. But, Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted that it is well known to this committee that no sugar raised on this side of the Rocky Mountains, or any considerable quantity, is ever carried across the country, on account of the cost of transportation. If I thought that the adoption of this treaty would have the effect to discourage the production of sugar in the Southern States, then I would not raise my voice in advocacy of this treaty, but the minority of the committee who objected to this bill show by their own report that it is impossible to cheapen sugar on the Pacific seaboard on account of the cost of transportation; and if that is so, I do not see how this measure can have the slightest effect upon the production of sugar in the Southern States.

But, sir, even if it should have the effect which they allege, then I am in favor of the bill so far as the Pacific coast is concerned. It has been too infrequent here to have any legislation in favor of the consumer. I, for one, would be glad to see the entering-wedge which would produce free trade, not only with the Sandwich Islands, but with other countries with which we have commercial and friendly relations.

Another objection urged to this bill is that by existing treaties with other sugar-producing countries we should sustain an immense loss of revenue because by these treaties they stipulated that they should be placed on the same footing with the most favored nations. Upon examination of the treaties with those countries we can find nothing which will warrant this assertion. This treaty with the Sandwich Islands stipulates not only for free trade with the United States and reciprocity, but it is agreed on the part of his Hawaiian Majesty that so long as this treaty shall remain in force he will not "lease or otherwise dispose of or create any lien upon any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominions," &c.

Mr. Chairman, if there are other countries with whom we have commercial relations guaranteed by treaty who claim that their sugar shall be admitted duty free into the ports of the United States, they can take this treaty, not upon that simple ground alone, but in its entirety. They cannot accept one of the terms of the treaty to the exclusion of the others, and if any other country which can bring sugar to the United States is willing to take this whole treaty and put us on the same footing guaranteed by the Hawaiian treaty, I for one should be glad to secure such treaties. But they cannot pretend that on the one article of sugar, or upon any other article in which we trade with them, they should be admitted on the same footing with the Hawaiian Islands and not stand upon the same footing in other respects. If they accept one provision of the treaty they must accept all; therefore the argument that if we permit the importation of sugar free of duty from the Sandwich Islands we shall be compelled by existing treaties with other countries to admit their sugar on an equal footing falls to the ground; for it is not to be believed that any other countries in relations with the United States are willing to grant us the terms secured by this treaty. There is no country on the face of the earth, except the Sandwich Islands, that will pledge itself to such conditions, and none but a weak nation in its extremity would make such an offer with any other power.

Mr. Chairman, I was surprised to find in a cursory reading of the debates in March the disparagement of the Sandwich Islands by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] I must think that his attack upon the character of these islands in their social, political, and natural features does no credit to that goodness of heart which has entitled him always to the respect of this House.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will say that I did not discuss their social or political condition. I avoided both.

Mr. MONEY. Well, we will see whether you did or not. If I mistake not, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his disparagement of these islands, read from a book that I have before me, by Mr. Nordhoff, in which he shows that the islands are arid and uncultivable.

Mr. KELLEY. That is the physical condition of the country; but I avoided any allusion to the social and political condition of the people entirely. I did discuss the physical condition of the islands.

Mr. MONEY. Moreover, in his disparagement of these islands the gentleman called attention to the fact that a portion of this territory, Molokai, a point of rock in mid-ocean, is simply a quarantine for lepers.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, I will.

Mr. KELLEY. Does not the leper asylum at Molokai contain 2 per cent. of the entire population of the eleven islands?

Mr. MONEY. I will admit that it does; but I say, sir, that it comes with a bad grace for a representative of the Caucasian race to hold up the fact of that quarantine of lepers in disparagement of the people of the Sandwich Islands; for the gentleman very well knows that when the first English navigators touched these islands the people there were a symmetrical, handsome, noble, and brave race.

The agents of civilization and Christianity which our friends carried there with them—rum and syphilis—have ruined these islands, and made necessary a quarantine in the Pacific. This condition of things dates back only a quarter of a century, and physicians in charge of that island assert that it owes its origin to the diseases left by Europeans and Americans upon the island. The degradation and misfortune of this people can be traced back to those of our own race who visited these islands. And it comes, I think, with bad grace from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to cite these things against this people.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will say that he does but elaborate now what I said, to wit, that these were the sad remnants of a people showing the effects of commerce and missionary labors upon the race.

Mr. MONEY. I do not deny the facts advanced by the gentleman, because I obtain them from the same source as himself. What I object to is the spirit with which he urges these things as objections to a treaty which secures to us the largest and most liberal advantages.

But I do not contend for this treaty upon merely commercial grounds. In this utilitarian age we are accustomed too much to confine legislation to matters that concern only to-day; we want bargains that bring immediate returns. I would look at this matter in a more liberal spirit. This House has seen too much of bills introduced and speeches made for home consumption; of gentlemen who come here to represent the whole country, and who turn their heads over their shoulders and see only their constituents at home; whose efforts here seem to be simply to secure their own renomination and election. For that reason I would not insist upon any view of this question from a sectional stand-point. Coming from the South, I do not urge the feeling which I know exists among southern sugar-planters against this treaty. I think they are mistaken in their view of this question, for I am satisfied, upon mature consideration, that it will not affect their interest.

Notwithstanding the disparagement by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, we must admit that there is something in the character of this people which is worthy our consideration. It is true, as he states, that they have diminished from three hundred and twenty thousand, according to their first census, to about fifty-five thousand at this time. But we must admit under the circumstances they are entitled to some respect. The area of the islands is seven thousand square miles. The population is 56,000. They have maintained an honorable public credit; they have paid their debts. To-day their credit stands as well as the credit of any other nation, I care not how large that nation may be. This nation, with its small population, by its tremendous advancement in civilization and Christianity, with a trade that is growing yearly, is entitled to more consideration than the gentleman seems disposed to admit. I claim that this matter cannot be dismissed with a sneer at the paucity of their population and the diseases which have been the gift of Americans and Europeans.

These islands are important to us not merely in a commercial respect. In a few years we will be amply compensated for any loss of revenue by the monopoly of their trade. There is a foreign population steadily pouring in there, and as their resources develop emigration is invited, and they are obtaining the attention and increased respect of foreign nations, which have been accorded to them since 1846, when the first treaty was made.

One objection to the list of articles admitted free of import duty is that it does not include clothing and spirits. As to the matter of clothing, it seems to me that objection should have little weight. It must be known to the gentlemen who raise that objection, if they have considered the subject, and I presume they have, that the universal import duty in the Sandwich Islands is only 10 per cent. ad valorem. In this country we have an import duty for the protection of the manufacturers of the East of from 40 to 240 per cent. upon clothing and the cloths used in manufacturing clothing. That duty is imposed to protect our manufacturers from the competition of the manufacturers of England. Now, if there is only 10 per cent. duty in the islands upon clothing imported from England, how can we, who now barely maintain competition with from 40 to 240 per cent. duty, hope to compete with them in the islands? If clothing had been in this treaty, it would have been of no effect whatever, so far as protecting our industries. I will say further that this treaty which is presented to-day for our action was made by the American authorities. The Sandwich Island authorities did not insist upon any single specification in that schedule of articles except one.

The other article which is excluded from admission free of duty is spirits—brandy, whisky, &c. The admission of that article was objected to by the Sandwich Island authorities, not upon commercial or business considerations, but upon moral considerations. It is one of the faults, or weaknesses rather, of these islanders that they are inordinately fond of drink. That is one of the boons of civilization to them. We have taught them the habit of intoxication. To provide against this abnormal appetite of the people has been the studied desire and intent of their government. We find that on two occasions the French government could not agree with the Sandwich Islanders upon a treaty because of this very article of brandies and wines. At one time the French admiral told the Sandwich Island authorities pointedly that he either must have free brandies and wines or he must have war. And this insignificant little power, so much derided and despised by some gentlemen on this floor, had the moral courage, for the purpose of protecting their population, to insist that wines and brandies should not be admitted free. In spite of the objections urged and of the menace of the French fleet, they insisted that brandies and wines should be subject to a duty of $3 per gallon. It was in consideration of the weakness of the people and to secure their protection that the mantle of this duty was thrown around them to save them from their besetting sin of intoxication.

The Danish nation was the first to make a treaty with that country in every way fair and honorable. They accorded to these Sandwich Islands all the rights and honors that they accorded to any other nation, however powerful. They engaged to respect their neutrality, a thing which had not been stipulated before by any other country.

But, Mr. Chairman, the mere barter and trade of this treaty, its merely commercial aspect, is to my mind the least of the considerations in its favor. We are here not to legislate for particular sections nor for to-day merely. Gentlemen, it has been charged against the democratic party that they are too much absorbed in the things of to-day; that they have no forecast and have not been able to look into the future and lay down the track upon which the Government can run for many succeeding years. It is also true that in the past—not within my recollection, but within that of some other gentlemen on the floor—Representatives from the South have sat here and upon a barren construction of the Constitution denied themselves the advantages of aid from the Federal Treasury enjoyed by other sections of the Union. I admire and honor their adherence to what they conceived to be a just principle. But we have suffered by such a policy; and the democratic party to-day stands lowered in the estimation of the American people by pursuing that policy. We should not commit ourselves to any such doctrine. We must look to the future.

Sir, for one hundred years the United States has shot like a brilliant meteor through a path of transcendent glory up to the very zenith of the broad firmament of nations; and it rests with us, legislators of to-day and those who may come after us in this Hall, to decide whether she has completed the crescent promise of her destiny or whether she is to remain there a fixed star forever.

We cannot concern ourselves merely with the affairs of to-day. We must look to the future; and I, as a member of this House, with abiding confidence and faith and hope and trust in the future of our Government, propose to consider this treaty in its relations to after-times. These islands are important, not so much in the view in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] would have us look at them, for what they are; but they are important for where they are; not so much for their area, their population, or their productions. The Sandwich Islands stand in the Pacific an ocean fortress. Indeed, sir, they are the Thermopylæ of the Pacific. If gentlemen will consult a map of ocean currents and winds, they will find that the Sandwich Islands are placed in the very gateway of the track of commerce.

Why, sir, the chief justice of the islands, and the minister plenipo-tentiary to this country, informs me that not only were the islands visited last year by one hundred and forty-three ships, bringing cargoes to them, but that numberless sails passed within sight of their cliffs without stopping. This shows that that country is in the direct path of commerce with Asiatic countries.

The statistics show that the marine of the Pacific is constantly increasing; that within the last one or two years the number of steam and sailing vessels built upon the Pacific coast outnumber those upon the Atlantic, where ninety-nine one-hundredths of our commerce is located. We have a right to believe from the past that the march of empire is westward and that our relations with the countries bordering upon the Pacific will in the course of fifty years be of paramount importance to the people of this country. We have that track across the globe to the trade of Asia that was sought by the adventurers of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

Every country that has seized upon the successive changes of travel to the East has grown rich in the trade derived therefrom. From the time of Vasco de Gama, who doubled the Cape of Good Hope in the fifteenth century, down to this day, the Dutch, the British, every people who have enjoyed Asiatic commerce have grown rich and prosperous. We must look now to our commerce as the chief element of our coming future, and gentlemen can see by reference to the map that these Sandwich Islands are a point in the Pacific that give the key to the whole North Pacific.

Gentlemen are accustomed to speak of these islands as being two thousand miles distant from our coast, but they should also recollect that distance is relative. If they are two thousand miles from our coast, they are five thousand miles from the next mainland, making that country really one of the dependencies of the United States. With that island in our possession—to which this treaty evidently looks—we shall make the North Pacific in effect an inland ocean. It is true the British possessions in that region are great and there are other foreign nations resting upon the border; but I say that in effect, so far as the control of those waters is concerned, they would be an inland ocean.

In the consideration of this and other bills we would do well to look to England, our great progenitor. We belong to a race which to distinguish it we call Anglo-Saxon. From our very origin down to this date we are filibusters. If there is any trait that distinguishes the Englishman and his American descendants, it is a greed for territory, and they are always supreme where their borders are upon the sea. England has set us an example which we are prone to follow, and if we will follow her policy with her sagacity and wisdom we are destined to accelerate the march of our progress to a supremacy among the nations of the earth.

Some gentlemen object to the cost of the maintenance of these islands if, in the course of events, they should fall into our hands like ripe fruit. Sir, did any gentleman ever consider the cost of maintenance of the British fortifications upon the rock of Gibraltar? When gentlemen speak of the 50,000 population of the Sandwich Islands, and their productiveness as exhibited in but a little over $2,000,000 of exports, let them consider the productiveness of the barren rock of Gibraltar, which yields no revenue, which has no population except a garrison; and then ask Britain what she would take for the release of her sovereignty there.

Ask her what she would take for her control of Saint Helena, which brings to her no revenue? She holds the island of Helgoland, in the German Ocean, in the very teeth of the German powers, and, sir, she supports fortification and armament there at immense cost, levying no tax whatever on the people and deriving not one cent of revenue. England understands the importance of protecting her marine by having these fortified places. And so she holds the island of Malta, in the Mediterranean, as a rendezvous for her fleets. As Daniel Webster eloquently said, it is "a power which has dotted over the surface of the whole globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning-drum beat, following the sun, and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England." The banner of Saint George to-day flaunts every sky and dallies with every breeze under heaven.

She has now possessions on our Pacific coast in British Columbia and in Oceanica which make her surround us as with a cordon; but, with this point in our control, her chain is broken and her communication is cut off. But, with the Sandwich Islands as a point d'appui for her operations, we, it is true, would not apprehend any descent upon our coast, for I take it there is no American who dreads any country or all countries of the globe making a descent upon and invasion of our soil. What would become of the commerce of the Pacific if this point was held by Great Britain? Mr. Chairman, must I warn the American Congress to-day that the eyes of Great Britain and other nations are now fixed upon these islands?

If this island had nothing on earth but the Bay of Honolulu and the port of Pearl River, it would be a pearl of great price to be secured to the United States at every cost.

Our neighbors, sir, across the Pacific, the Chinese, the Japanese, the Coreans, and the Formosans number 600,000,000 of people, skilled in the arts of mechanism of the production of the most valuable material, and their trade, which is a desideratum long sought by European countries, by the completion of our railroad across this continent must pass through our territory. This point of the Sandwich Islands rests immediately in the track of this traffic, and its possession gives us the gateway through which Asiatic commerce must pass in future years.

Mr. Chairman, the disposition of the people of this island is not only friendly, but it is cordial to the people of America. The men who govern the policy of that island, who constitute its active government, are Americans; Americans who have sat in this Hall as Representatives of our people and who are to-day at heart Americans, and whose most fervent desire is to see their country brought into most intimate and friendly relations with the United States.

The majority who have reported this bill have in their favor not only the action of the Senate upon this matter, but they have also the action of Secretaries of State, including such men as John M. Clayton, Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, William L. Marcy, and, I believe, Mr. Seward. While deprecating any seizure of these islands by the United States, yet at the same time in pursuance of the Monroe doctrine, they have declared that if any other power should occupy these islands they were to be dislodged at any cost of blood and treasure. Now, sir, the cheapest and most pacific way to prevent the occupation of these islands is by this treaty presented to you by the majority of your committee.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] put upon the stand Mr. Nordhoff, the author of a book on "Northern California, Oregon, and the Sandwich Islands," and, while we must admit the reputation of Mr. Nordhoff as a newspaper correspondent and book-writer, we have had no especial exhibition of his ability as a legislator. But take the witness the gentleman himself puts upon the stand. We will see to what conclusion this witness will bring him. He draws from him his facts with reference to the depreciation of these islands and neglects the summing up this gentleman presented. After all these statements in detraction and disparagement, Mr. Nordhoff, a gentleman of the widest and clearest comprehension, makes this conclusion:

> But justice, kindly feeling, and a due regard for our future interests in the Pacific Ocean ought to induce us to establish at once a reciprocity treaty with the Hawaiian government. We should lose but little revenue; and should make good that loss by the greater market which would be opened for our own products in the islands. Such a treaty would bring more capital to the islands, increase their prosperity, and at the same time bind them still more closely and permanently to us. It would pave the way to annexation, if that should ever become advisable.

That is the testimony of the witness whom the gentleman put upon the stand to prove this treaty was not consistent with the commercial interests of the United States.

I have not gone into statistics on this matter, because the subject has been treated in the most complete and exhaustive manner by the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] and it was unnecessary for me to do anything whatever, even if I had been informed, which I am not, fully on this point. The main question which suggested itself to me was not its commercial value to the United States merely, and it must be claimed to be great, for with the monopoly of this trade we certainly can derive a great advantage from it.

Gentlemen insist this release of duty on sugar is simply a bounty to the Sandwich Islands sugar-plantations. I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that I have never heard so narrow a view taken of so great a question. If we are to be deterred from the favorable consideration of a bill offering us superior advantages to those of any other nation by the fact that some agriculturists in the Sandwich Islands will be profited by that treaty, why, sir, we would reject every treaty brought up for our consideration; for it is impossible for us to believe that any country would offer us a treaty with the advantages all on our side. But does that lessen the advantages to be derived from this treaty, because some other people may profit by it? Is trade to be stopped because only one party can win? The very idea is preposterous, and not to be entertained seriously by this committee.

In my remarks concerning the importance of fostering and cherishing and providing for our commercial future, I am guided by the history of the past. I know of no nation in history that has ever become a great and conquering people unless they were a commercial people, from the Greeks down to this day, except perhaps the Romans. They were organized for war and conquest. From the rape of the Sabine women down to the day when the imperial purple was sold by the pretorian band in the capitol, Rome existed only as a warlike nation, with no dependence whatever on agriculture, because she had no fields; with no dependence on commerce, because she had no commercial marine. She existed on the supplies from the granaries of Sardinia, Sicily, and the Nile. She was organized for conquest. Every feature of the government of the Romans shows that they totally neglected and despised the arts of trade and of commerce. They perpetuated their conquests not by trade and commerce, but by a system of laws which were effective wherever their power extended. They established in every country they conquered municipia, in which all the citizens were invested with the right of Roman citizens, the highest right then known to the world. They disturbed not the customs, the costumes, nor the religion of the people they overcame, and for that reason they were firmly established.

But, sir, with this solitary exception, as I before said, every people who have conquered and colonized have been a commercial people. And if we desire to secure the permanency of our prosperity, we too, I say again, Mr. Chairman, must look to the future of our commerce. It is unnecessary for me to dwell upon this point. I am satisfied that the gentlemen of this committee from every part of the Union will unite with me in agreeing at least that that is of the last importance. But we consider the question simply with reference to the relation that the Sandwich Islands hold to the question.

If any members of this committee will turn to the map showing the ocean currents and trade-winds, they will see that the Hawaiian Islands dominate as completely the commerce not only of the North Pacific, but of all the nations of Eastern Asia, as did one of the robber fortresses of the barons of the feudal ages dominate the peaceful valleys and commercial highways that wound below. Sir, a bold, enterprising people on that island, with no other territory than its seven thousand square miles and with an active marine, would completely despoil the commerce of the Pacific, as completely as the eagle from his eyrie overawes the birds of the air. In the further consideration of this question we are called upon from a regard for the highest duties of legislators, who are here not representing sections, not representing to-day simply, but the whole country and the future, to give our assent, and by our legislative action put into operation this law establishing these relations between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands.

Discharging this duty only in the interests of the whole country, and as a southern Representative looking to the future for the highest position of honor and glory to this great Government, I shall not look back to contemplate the unhappiness of the past, but await the inevitable destiny of a nation united and restored in friendship and harmony, that shall be a model to the world and a hope to the oppressed everywhere.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will not long detain the committee with reflections of my own; but I have in my possession an important contribution to this debate, which I think the committee will be willing to hear and consider.

Before presenting it, however, I will say that I do not approve of the Hawaiian treaty, because it looks in the direction of securing possession of those islands. I wish to state distinctly on the general question of annexation of outlying islands or territory, except in the north—I make an exception there—that I trust we have seen the last of our annexation, and in this remark I include the whole group of West India Islands and the whole of the Mexican territory contiguous to the United States, inhabited as it is by a portion of the Latin races, strangely mixed and degenerated by their mixture with native races; a population occupying a belt of territory that naturally enfeebles man; a population and a territory that I earnestly hope may never be made an integral part of the people and territory of the United States. I cannot more strongly state my view of that subject than by saying that if the island of Cuba were offered to us by the consent of all the powers of the world and $100,000,000 in gold offered as a bonus for its acceptance by the United States, I would unhesitatingly vote to decline the offer. We occupy a portion of that great northern zone which girdles the world and which has been the theater of the greatest achievements of civilization, especially in the history of the Anglo-Saxon races; but should we extend our possessions into the tropical belt, we should weaken the powers of our people and Government. Hence I disclaim any purpose or suggestion of annexation of these islands as any part of my reason for supporting the treaty. On the contrary, one of the reasons why I favor the treaty is that it will be a satisfactory substitute for all probable schemes of annexation that may come if this fails. It is the best solution of the question.

Mr. Chairman, there are two reasons why I specially desire the passage of this bill in its relation to the treaty. The first is on the ground of the duty which the nation owes to the Pacific coast; the second is on the ground of the general good of the whole country. The Pacific coast, the latest born of our possessions, was in a most perilous position fifteen years ago. Far remote from us, there was great danger that a feeling of isolation and of alienation would spring up between the people of that coast and the people east of the Rocky Mountains, and that these distant commercial and industrial interests should be more closely united. And to me it is one of the sublimest facts in our recent history that in the face of the opening horrors and dangers of our great war, when it was in question whether our Republic should live or die, the great men of that period who filled these seats and the seats in the other Chamber dared to show their faith in the future of the Republic by proposing and finally carrying a measure to make the largest appropriation that up to that time had ever been made by any nation of the world in a single act, substantially to appropriate $100,000,000 in order to bind by material bonds of iron the Pacific coast to the Atlantic, and thus hold together in nearer ties of commerce, amity, and brotherhood the two coasts of this Republic. I speak, of course, of the legislation that looked toward the construction of the Pacific Railroad. It was a great act of statesmanship. The purchase of Alaska was another step in that direction, not so marked, not so important, but yet important, for it secured the whole of the American northern coast of this great Pacific Sea.

Now, as we still desire to complete the work of amity for our Pacific brethren, we must get a foothold on the southern line of our western border.

The whole Pacific coast, with hardly a dissenting voice, comes and asks us for this legislation; and if we have doubts ourselves on the ground of general policy, we owe it to these men, our brethren, who are among the choicest, bravest, and most enterprising spirits from all our Eastern, Middle, Western, and Southern States who have planted that wonderful civilization on the Pacific coast to meet their wishes, unless there be strong reasons why we should not. Their wishes are strong with me as controlling my view of this question.

The other reason relates to the interests of the whole country. It seems to me that no man can look in the remote or even the near future of this country, remembering the vastly important relations which have sprung up between us and the two ancient kingdoms of the East, where the correlation of our young country has met the old in that strange union which recent years have developed, and the quaint civilization of these old countries are pouring their influence upon us, and we answer back with our fresh young life. I say no man thinking of that new and vast development of the relations of our country to these can be insensible to or neglectful of anything, however insignificant, that may be considered necessary to perpetuate the new relations of these two civilizations.

Now, here is a group of islands midway between Asia and the United States, the resting-place for the great caravans of the sea, the halting-ground whereon travelers on the ocean stop to recruit their shattered ships it may be, or supply themselves with needed materials for carrying on the work of commerce. That group of islands, fortunately for us, is to-day dominated in all its leading influences by Americans, our own brethren. Their hearts warm toward us as their first choice in forming alliances. They are ours in blood and sympathy, and in this treaty they offer us the first place, an exceptionally favorable place, in our relations to them. And they are so situated that if we reject it they must go elsewhere for alliances. If we reject this treaty they will be compelled to go to England or to France. Both of these countries have for years and years been longing for just such an opportunity as we have to-day in reference to this group of islands. It is the simple logical result of the rejection of this treaty that before many months these islands will be taken, controlled, and dominated either by England or by France; and it is for us to say whether we shall consent to that alien union by rejecting this offer, or by closing with it ourselves make that other union impossible.

I have heard no argument against this treaty that appears to me to have any considerable weight beyond the one of cost; and, as applied to this bill, it is a strange one. It is not that cost that we must pay out of the Treasury from revenues we have collected as taxes from the people. It is only that cost that declines to tax. It is not an expenditure, but a remission of taxation, that the treaty calls for. It does not call for the appropriation of a dollar of any taxes collected. It simply calls for the repealing of taxes as to a class of our own citizens.

Now our friends on both sides of the House have already shown themselves anxious to reduce expenditures to such an extent that they could remit taxes. And the most grateful work that the American legislator is ever called upon to do for his people is to be able to tell them that he has remitted some of their burdens of taxation. And the thing proposed to be done by this bill, and the only thing that is seriously criticised, is that by it we do remit a little less than $400,000 of taxes which the people are now required to pay. That objection, it seems to me, wholly fails to rise to the height of this great question.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in the absence of that knowledge of the details of this subject which a man ought to have before he speaks with much particularity, I will ask the Clerk to read a letter which has been addressed to me within the past few days by a gentleman of ability and distinction, an honorable soldier in our late war, and now connected with one of the most flourishing educational institutions of Virginia. He was for twenty years a resident of the Sandwich Islands, a merchant and successful business man there. He left there long ago, and now speaks from no personal interest, but only from the interest of an American citizen on a great question. I ask the Clerk to read the letter of General Marshall, of Hampton, Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

HAMPTON NORMAL SCHOOL,
Hampton, Virginia, March 31, 1876.

DEAR GENERAL: I am very familiar with the history of the Hawaiian Islands. I resided there twenty years as an American merchant, during which period I held various posts of honor and trust under the Hawaiian government, having been honored by the king with "letters-patent of denization" in acknowledgment of services rendered by me as his commissioner to England on the occasion of the seizure of the group in 1843 by Lord George Paulet in behalf of the British Crown. This gave me the rights of a Hawaiian subject without the loss of my American citizenship, and I was for several years a member of the king's parliament and one of the commissioners to draw up the new constitution of the kingdom. I have no sort of personal interest involved in the action of the House upon the Hawaiian treaty now before it, and I therefore feel justified in asking your attention to some reasons why that treaty should be promptly passed.

The important position of this group has made it an object of interest to all commercial nations. England and France especially have each made repeated efforts to secure its possession, and Hawaiian history is full of outrages and intrigues on the part of these powers, or their representatives and citizens, the object of which was to involve this feeble nation in hopeless complications that should compel the surrender of its sovereignty.

In 1839, France, without any just cause, sent Laplace in the frigate L'Artémise, who threatened hostilities unless heavy demands were complied with which the king unaided could not meet. The assistance of the American merchants, who made a loan to the king, frustrated this design.

In 1843 Lord Paulet, commanding the British frigate Carysfort, compelled a cession of the group upon the most flimsy pretenses. I was sent by the king on that occasion as his commissioner to England to protest against the outrage and to ask the restoration of his sovereignty. On my way to England I had an interview with the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Webster, who assured me that the United States would not tolerate the possession of the group by Great Britain. Mr. Everett, our minister in London, was instructed to remonstrate against the outrage. The British government disavowed the act and restored the Hawaiian flag, the utter groundlessness of the charges against the king having been readily made apparent.

On another occasion a French fleet menaced the sovereignty of the group, and the day and hour were set for hostilities to commence. In his great straits the king offered to cede the islands to the United States as his only escape from ruin. The American minister accepted the proposal, and the American flag was to have been run up before the attack commenced, when the French consul, learning of the proposed cession, withdrew the fleet.

All these and other instances of attempts on the sovereignty of the group came under my personal observation, and illustrate the constant desire of these two powers to obtain control of these islands.

Any foreign naval power in possession of this group will dominate the commerce of the North Pacific.

Our trade with China and Japan is yearly increasing, and the Hawaiian group is the half-way house from our western coast to these ports. It is of vital importance that we secure a paramount influence at this group, and the treaty gives us this. Under its provisions no other power can obtain like privileges, and while annexation would entail needless expense and complications, for which there is no corresponding advantage that is not equally secured by the provisions of this treaty, we can obtain annexation if we wish it hereafter by terminating it at any time after seven years. The prosperity which will result under its provisions will depend upon its continuance, and if it is terminated there will be no escape from ruin on the part of the islanders, except through annexation.

The rejection of the treaty will force the group to seek other help, not from choice but necessity; and, having repeatedly rejected their overtures for a closer alliance, we can hardly refuse them the right to go elsewhere.

This is the third treaty of reciprocity that has been negotiated between Hawaii and the United States. The first, undertaken at my suggestion in 1856, failed of confirmation in the Senate through the opposition of the Louisiana Senators, Slidell and Benjamin, whose fears that the interests of the Louisiana sugar groves would be injuriously affected by it were, in my judgment, utterly groundless. Eleven years since, another treaty was negotiated which also failed in the Senate. This, by far the most favorable in its provisions to the United States, passed the Senate, as you are aware, by a decisive vote. For the House to fail to ratify it would, I am sure, be a serious injury to our Pacific interests, for which the apparent saving to our revenue would be a poor compensation.

Most of the trade of the group and most of its foreign population are American. The islands have been civilized and christianized by Americans and they and their children are truly Americans in feeling. During our late civil war they gave freely of their substance and their personal service in favor of the Union. Our muster-rolls show a brigadier-general, colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and several other officers, who were natives of the islands and who offered their services to fight for the land of their fathers which they had never before seen, but which they had been taught by their parents to love, while in money they contributed to our United States Sanitary Commission the respectable sum of $16,113.43, being more than was given by some of our oldest Northern States and more in proportion to their numbers than was given by any State in the Union. Are not such true Americans entitled to our protection and sympathy, and do not the interests of our country demand that we should bind the government and people of this important group to us by the closest possible ties?

I am, dear general, yours faithfully,

J. F. B. MARSHALL.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
House of Representatives, Washington.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have but a few more words to add. The statements contained in the letter just read by the Clerk are to me exceedingly striking, taken in connection with the reports which have been published on this subject. Remembering that every Secretary of State, of whatever political party, before whom this subject ever came has recommended it earnestly; that the men whom we are most willing to regard as our political teachers have held this view strongly; remembering also that it is clear that this group of islands must seek an alliance, if not with us, then with our rivals, I cannot conceive that the grounds upon which gentlemen base their opposition to this treaty can overcome the reasons in its favor.

I said in the outset of my remarks that one of my reasons for favoring this treaty was that it would obviate any necessity for annexing these islands. Let us make this alliance, and while it lasts the respect which the name of the United States carries with it among the nations of the earth will prevent any attempt on the part of any other nation to obtain control there. They will not undertake any scheme of annexation at the risk of quarreling with the United States. But if we do not make this treaty, schemes of annexation will vex us from year to year until we shall be compelled to annex these islands as a matter of self-protection. This treaty will completely avoid such a result as that.

In conclusion, I ask consent to submit a brief editorial article from the New York Evening Post of yesterday, written, as I am informed, by that honored poet and scholar, (clarum et venerabile nomen,) William Cullen Bryant, in which is stated, with great clearness and force, the grounds for believing that this treaty should be ratified. I have no doubt that members of this House will be glad of the opportunity to read the views of this distinguished citizen upon this subject.

The article referred to is as follows:

THE QUESTION OF TO-MORROW.

On Thursday the debate on the treaty which makes the Sandwich Islands ours without the expense and trouble of governing them is to be renewed. Their ports are to be opened to us if we accept the treaty, as they will be opened to no other nation in the world; the products of our industry are to be admitted there as freely as they are admitted in Florida; we are to be allowed to do the carrying trade between their marts and our own; we are to have a commodious and secure naval station in their sheltered waters, and we escape the result which otherwise threatens us of giving into the hands of Great Britain a station which, lying north of the equator, puts into her hands the key of the Pacific, completes the mighty chain of her dependencies from the remotest south to Vancouver's Island on the northwest coast of our continent, and links together the isles and coasts subject to her sway, forming them into a great ocean empire, inhabited by a hardy race of men accustomed to the sea, and having the same dominion over the Pacific which Britain once arrogated over the Atlantic. The possession of the Sandwich Islands—the virtual if not the nominal possession—is all that Britain now requires to make her supreme in those waters, and that she will have if we fail to carry the treaty into effect. For if we reject the treaty by refusing to conform our revenue laws to its conditions the authorities of the Sandwich Islands have already avowed their intention of entering into like arrangements with the austral possessions of Great Britain.

It seems to us that this treaty ought to unite the votes of every class. The mill-owners ought to vote for it because it opens a free market for the products of their looms and forges; the ship-owners ought to favor it because it gives employment to their vessels; the friends of free trade ought to insist on giving it effect because it will bring the United States and the Sandwich Islands into those relations with each other which should prevail everywhere between all the nations of the earth. Those who look with apprehension on the enormous growth of British predominance in the Pacific, and those who simply desire that a convenient naval station should be obtained in that great waste of waters for the Navy of the United States, should unite their voices in favor of the treaty. As for the cultivators of the sugar-cane in Louisiana and Texas, they can well afford to bear a little competition on our western coast for the sake of giving cheap sugar to the millions who inhabit California and Oregon.

In the course of years, when the Sandwich Islands shall have regained something like their ancient remarkable populousness, they will send us, if we take advantage of the treaty, large quantities of products peculiar to the lands which lie between the tropics, and which we shall receive with no other enhancement of the price than the cost of transportation. For it should be borne in mind that so temperate is the climate of those islands that the white race there can endure to perform field labor and keep their health and strength. There will come a time when we shall receive coffee from the islands equal to the Mocha, raised in spots too elevated to feel the blight which attacks the shrub in the lowlands. Then we shall import indigo, which there is literally a weed, and sandal-wood which grows wild; to say nothing of the sea-island cotton which grows in so few places on the globe, and of which the Sandwich Islands produce the best in the world. Let the treaty go into effect and American capital will accompany the migration of American adventurers to this new field, and these garden-isles of the Pacific will be essentially a part of our country.

One great advantage of this measure is that it strengthens our power without causing a drain upon our Treasury. We build fortresses, we establish garrisons, we lay the keels of ships of war, we cast huge guns of a new construction, we forge muskets and small arms by the million, and all these at a vast expense, and claim that we are providing for defense against the possible attack of an enemy; yet here is a proposition to put into our hands, without the payment of a dollar, a stronghold in the depths of the Pacific, in the very track of the power which threatens to be supreme in that quarter, and we hesitate at accepting the advantage. But it may be said that the advantage is not obtained gratuitously—it may be said that it will cost us the half million of dollars that would be levied in our ports on the Sandwich Islands sugar if the treaty should be rejected. Not a penny of it—the offered advantage will cost us nothing. If the half million dollars comes not to the Treasury in the shape of duties—a considerable part of which is always lost on its way thither—it will remain in its proper place, the pocket of the consumer; it will be left with its rightful owners, the people. Can the money that is not taken from the people in taxes be called so much money lost?

Let us hope that the question of to-morrow will be rightly decided. To us it seems impolitic in a degree little short of madness to put by the advantage offered us of holding a respectable maritime rank on the great ocean that bathes the beaches of our western coast. By rendering the treaty ineffectual we simply offer to Great Britain the advantage which we reject. The key-stone will then be fitted into the British possessions in that quarter; the portions now disunited will be firmly locked together for all coming time. We may not obtain from the British Parliament a vote of thanks for this service, but we shall amply deserve it.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, the considerations which have been offered by the members of the Committee of Ways and Means who reported this bill to carry into effect the convention with His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands have not been of a character to induce me to support it. It might be imagined from the remarks which have fallen from gentlemen in favor of this measure that there was no existing treaty between the United States and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, or that some great public exigency had arisen demanding the convention submitted for our approval.

But so far from this being true, we have already a treaty between the United States and His Majesty the King of the Sandwich Islands, proclaimed on the 9th of November, 1850, which I venture to assert will be found upon examination to be more satisfactory in every respect than the convention which is before us. I invite the attention of members of this committee to the careful consideration of the articles of the treaty of 1850, before they commit themselves to the abrogation of that treaty, or to the new policy upon which this proposed convention rests.

If gentlemen will examine especially article 2 of that treaty, they will find that it provides that no higher duties shall be placed upon the imports from this country than upon the imports from any other country with which His Majesty may hold relations; that no other state shall enjoy any favor, privilege, or immunity whatever in matters of commerce and navigation which shall not also upon like conditions be extended to the people of this country. Look also at article 4, which provides "that no duties of tonnage, harbor, light-houses, pilotage, quarantine, or that other similar duties, of whatever nature or under whatever denomination, shall be imposed in either country upon the vessels of the other in respect of voyages between the United States of America and the Hawaiian Islands, which shall not be imposed in like cases on national vessels." Also at—

ARTICLE VI.

Steam-vessels of the United States which may be employed by the Government of the said states in the carrying of their public mails across the Pacific Ocean or from one port in that ocean to another shall have free access to the ports of the Sandwich Islands, with the privilege of stopping therein—

Now mark the language—to refit, to refresh, to land passengers and their baggage, and for the transaction of any business pertaining to the public mail service of the United States, and shall be subject in such ports to no duties of tonnage, harbor, light-house, quarantine or other similar duties, of whatever nature or under whatever denomination.

There are also very liberal provisions in favor of our steam-vessels. Then there is a rendezvous for our whaling-ships and ample provision for their security. Then, sir, the like privilege of frequenting the same ports of the Sandwich Islands named in this article is also guaranteed to the public armed vessels of the United States. Our citizens who are resident in that country possess nearly all the privileges that citizens of one State of this Union enjoy in another—the right to manage their business, liberty of trade, liberty of conscience; in a word, complete protection and security in the enjoyment of all rights and privileges cherished as fundamental by American freemen.

Whence, then, arises the necessity for the abrogation of a treaty which has continued to foster friendly and multiplying relations between the people of the two countries for so long a period? Is there anything in the present state of trade and commerce which calls for or will justify a departure from the wise policy which has up to this time been pursued? Let us look for a moment at the facts. According to the tables furnished by the Bureau of Statistics it appears that the value of the imports into the United States from the Hawaiian Islands during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, was $1,153,154; for 1872, $1,285,320; for 1873, $1,316,270, and for 1874, $1,017,172, while the exports to those islands were in 1871, $840,385; in 1872, $620,295; in 1873, $654,103; and in 1874, $623,280.

And in order that it may be fully seen what commodities enter into these exchanges, I invite attention to the annexed tables marked A and B.

These tables show that the total value of all dutiable commodities imported into the United States from the islands during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1875, was $1,053,420. The value of sugar, molasses, and melado amounted to $948,379; of rice, to $60,000; miscellaneous articles to less than $40,000. Their exports consist of sugar and rice. The total value of all commodities imported into the islands from this country for that year amounted to $655,154.

Mr. Charles Nordoff, on page 89 of his interesting book on Northern California, Oregon, and the Sandwich Islands, furnishes the following valuable statements with regard to those islands, showing the supremacy which the United States have achieved under the wise policy of the treaty of 1850. He says:

The annual report of 1872 of imports and exports made up by the collector-general of the Hawaiian kingdom, shows how completely the islands depend upon the United States. Of one hundred and forty-six merchant vessels and steamers entered at Hawaiian ports during 1872, ninety were American, only fifteen were English, six were German, nine belonged to other nations, and twenty-six were Hawaiian. Of a total of 98,647 tons of shipping, 73,975 were American, 6,714 Hawaiian, and but 7,741 British. Of forty-seven whaling-vessels calling at the island ports during the year, forty-two were American, two Hawaiian, and three British.

Of a little less than 16,000,000 pounds of sugar exported during the same year 14,500,000, and of 1,349,503 pounds of rice and paddy exported 1,317,203 pounds, came to the United States. All the cotton, all the goat-skins, nearly all the hides, all the wool, the greater part of the pea-nuts and the pulu; in short, almost the whole exports of the islands are sent to the United States. On the other hand, of $1,234,147, the value of duty-paying merchandise imported during 1872 into the islands, $806,111 came from the United States, $155,939 from Great Britain, and $205,396 from Germany. Besides this, of the total value of bonded goods, $349,435, the large amount of $135,487 was brought from sea by whalemen, almost all of whom were Americans, and $99,567 were goods from the United States. Bonded importations, $235,000 of American products, against $21,801 of British and $23,904 of German.

It is plain the island trade is so largely in our hands that no other nation can be said to dispute it with us. If our flag flew over Honolulu we could hardly expect to have a more complete monopoly of Hawaiian commerce than we already enjoy. Moreover, almost all the sugar plantations, the most productive and valuable property on the islands, are owned by Americans, and the same is true of the greater number of stock-farms. Our political predominance is as complete on the islands as our commercial. In the present cabinet all the ministers except one are Americans. This was true also of the cabinet of the late king. Of the supreme court, two of the judges are Americans and one is German. Almost all the executive or administrative officers are in the hands of Americans or Hawaiians. What the islands are they are because of American effort, American enterprise, American capital. American missionaries civilize them. Americans gave them laws wisely adapted to the customs and habits of their people. American enterprise and Boston capital established the sugar-culture and other of the important industries.

* * * If the islands ever offer themselves to any foreign power, it will be to the United States. Their people, foreign as well as native, look to us as their neighbors and friends; and the king last summer blurted out one day, when too much wine had made him imprudent, this truth: that if annexation came, it must be to the United States. As I write, a negotiation has been opened with the United States Government for the purpose of offering us Pearl River in exchange for a reciprocity treaty. * * * In our present condition the chief use of distant naval stations appears to me to be as convenient out-of-the-way places for wasting the public money. Pearl River would be an admirable spot for a dozen pleasant sinecures and the expenditure of three or four millions of money. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be a dear bargain. For the accommodation of merchant steamers and ships Honolulu offers sufficient facilities. There are ingenious American mechanics who have taken a frigate upon a temporary dry-dock and repaired her hull.

Now, it is plain that all the commodities which are exported from these islands, that every pound of sugar and rice produced for exportation, come to the markets of the United States, and the entire commerce and shipping of the islands are in the hands of Americans, and that their laws, frame-work of society and government, have received the impress of America. Why should we desire to make any change in relations so highly satisfactory? Has any power threatened the independence of the islands? No intimation has been made to this effect. Are their institutions, their government, are the people falling into decay and exhibiting any symptoms of dissolution? It is true that the population has fallen off in numbers. But it was hardly to be expected that a people who a few years ago were untutored savages could undergo the severe schooling, the radical changes, and rigid processes essential to rescue them from their wild state without such a result. Indeed, all estimates of the population until they were brought within the embrace of civilization and a regular government established were conjectural, exaggerated, and unreliable. With this exception, which is easily accounted for, they have made marked progress in the arts of peace. They have schools and colleges, a government modeled upon our own, division of labor, and perfect security to life and property.

I repeat then, sir, what are the considerations of a public or patriotic character to abrogate the treaty under shelter of which the islands have progressed so satisfactorily, under which their independence is assured, and our commercial supremacy complete? What is the convention that is proposed to us to-day? It is in effect that sugar, which is the chief article of production and every pound of which for exportation it has been already seen comes to this country, shall be admitted free of duty. It has been estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury that the amount so remitted for the fiscal year 1873 is about $320,345. But with increased production the subsidy and consequent loss of revenue, will equal the sum of one, two, and probably three millions. This amount bestowed as a bonus on the twenty-five or thirty American sugar-planters would necessarily enhance their profits, and stimulate production. It would be an invitation to those planters to bring hordes of Chinese into the Hawaiian Islands, under the contract system which prevails there, and they would extend the area of sugar-culture so as to embrace every foot of arable soil.

I ask gentlemen if it is desirable, looking at the true welfare of the people of the Sandwich Islands, that we should be a party to a policy that shall convert the islands into one vast and crowded Chinese settlement devoted to the exclusive task of producing sugar?

Mr. Chairman, let us reflect upon precisely what the Chinese are not as they may be in their own country but as we see them in this country. They are the most immoral of mankind; they have none of the wants of civilized man; they contribute nothing to the real wealth of the State; they have no appreciation of free institutions, and they war upon all the elements that form the basis of the strength, safety, and prosperity of free people. They come without families; they merely camp on the soil. They are simply skilled barbarians when we contrast them with American workmen, American freemen. The great factor in modern civilization, the principle which has preserved and borne aloft the banners of Christian civilization and upheld the pillars of the modern state through wars, revolutions, and all changes, has been the family tie, the institution of the family.

Sir, open these islands to these eastern hordes, and you condemn their whole civilization, their institutions, their liberties founded upon law, the benevolent auspices under which these people are being gradually trained and growing up into a well-formed and compact commonwealth; you condemn them to a state worse than that from which you have but recently rescued them, to a moral and intellectual sterility in striking contrast to the gardens these Chinese materialists, debased and debasing, will plant upon all their slopes and plains, their hill-sides and valleys.

What markets will be created for our countrymen under this policy? There will be a demand for steam-engines and sugar-mills, for rice, and fish, and opium, and wearing apparel, and plantation implements.

Great Britain can sell them sugar machinery at lower prices than we can, and pay the 10 per cent. duty which would be exacted, and which is the uniform customs rate in the island. Rice they would produce for home consumption, or at all events we have none to export to them; of fish, like rice, they have an abundance; wearing apparel is not among the articles admitted free from our country; of opium the Government has a monopoly; and it is well known that in tropical countries agricultural implements required are few and inexpensive.

It then appears that, notwithstanding this gift to the sugar-growers of the islands, we shall not enlarge the demand for our products, or confer any genuine benefit upon the people of the islands. It has been insisted upon by the advocates of this bill that it would not cheapen sugar in the markets of the Pacific States. If, then, we confer the bonus upon the planters of the islands, and the effect shall be neither to give to our people cheaper sugar nor enlarged or new markets, upon what principles can the policy be defended? Where is the benefit? But is it clear that it would not lower the price of sugar? The islands contain about six thousand square miles, larger than the States of Connecticut and Rhode Island, and though much of the surface is volcanic and mountainous, yet the climate and soil are singularly adapted to the growth of cane. It is never cut down by biting frosts. They take off two crops in succession. Nordhoff says that the soil appears to be inexhaustible.

I have seen a field of thirty acres which two years ago produced nearly six tons of sugar to the acre. Four tons per acre is not a surprising crop, and from all I can hear, I judge that two and a half tons per acre may be considered a fair yield. The sugar products of the islands has constantly increased. In 1860 they exported 1,444,271 pounds of sugar; in 1864, 10,414,441 pounds; in 1868, 18,312,926 pounds; and in 1871, 21,760,773 pounds.

A distinguished Senator from New England, when this convention was under consideration in the Senate, said:

Their capacity is variously estimated, and will reach from three to five times the amount of the present production, which is stated to be from twenty-three to thirty millions of pounds, so that from one hundred to one hundred and fifty millions of pounds of the Sandwich Islands sugars will ultimately take the place of an equal amount coming from other places that are now subject to the payment of duties, averaging for the class which will be received not less than three and a half cents per pound, and may soon involve an uncompensated loss to the Treasury of two, three, or four million dollars annually. Our market for their sugars is the best they can possibly have, treaty or no treaty, charged with duty or not. The duty is a sheer loss to us and a sheer gain to the twenty-five owners of the sugar plantations, whether they reside in Hawaii or elsewhere. It is an immense subsidy to these wholly private interests, and far more obnoxious than any subsidy which has heretofore found congressional advocates. However honestly intended by the parties to the negotiation, I feel constrained to denounce it as a job, the chief result of which will be to put money into the purses of a few Hawaiian sugar-planters, who have captured a good enough king to march at the head of their triumphant procession through the country at our expense, and who, by the by, is to issue his royal proclamation ratifying the treaty. When the rejected Hawaiian treaty of 1869 was before us, it was claimed as a merit that all of the owners but two of the twenty-five were foreigners, and almost wholly Americans. There is no doubt they are so now.

Mr. Nordhoff says:

There is room on the different islands for about seventy-five or eighty more plantations on the scale now common, and there are I think still excellent opportunities for making plantations. A planter in his presence described the situation by saying, "If we had plenty of labor and a free market for our sugar we should be thoroughly satisfied."

Mr. Nordhoff speaks of some of these plantations as having cost $100,000, some which cost a quarter of a million, but he adds that they have depreciated in value on account of the improvidence and extravagance of the planters.

It is impossible to say from the data before us what may be the increased production of sugar in the islands under the stimulus of a bonus so great, but it will unquestionably exceed the production of our own country.

It has already been shown by gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, that under "the most-favored-country clause" in our treaties with other sugar-producing countries, they will be entitled, upon like terms and conditions, to introduce their sugars also free of duty. But as this view of the subject has been already discussed and will be more fully elaborated by gentlemen who are still to speak, I will not dwell upon it.

The total amount of sugar likely to be so imported will largely exceed our own production, and the inevitable effect will be to cut down the revenues of the Government by five or six millions and to overwhelm with ruin the struggling sugar interest of our own country.

The gentleman from New York who introduced this bill predicted that at no distant day we should have two or more railroads completed to the Pacific sea. Now it may be that the commonest kind of sugar cannot be brought to the Mississippi Valley or to the eastern markets by the Central American route, yet it is not impossible that refined sugars from these islands or the Pacific refineries may undersell such sugars of our own production in New Orleans, Saint Louis, and Boston. If the effect would be to cheapen sugars on the Pacific coast, it would be an injustice to tax the people of the whole country for their benefit. Our tariff should be regulated not by sectional lines or geographical positions, but upon the principle of uniformity and equality of burdens.

So far then, sir, I have been unable to discover the first single consideration growing out of our trade or commerce to induce us to vote this bonus, to make this donation, exacted from the industry of our tax-burdened people to this alien interest in these distant islands, owned by a few enterprising Americans who do not share with us the difficulties of our situation.

But gentlemen say that we should not be controlled by mere questions of trade; that we should contemplate the purposes and objects of this convention from the pedestal of a lofty statesmanship; that we shall secure by this convention vast political advantages. Now, sir, I challenge gentlemen to point out one single right or privilege of a political character secured to our country. Read the article of the convention, article 4, in which this precious boon is carefully preserved:

It is agreed, on the part of his Hawaiian Majesty, that so long as this treaty shall remain in force, he will not lease or otherwise dispose of or create any lien upon any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominions, or grant any special privilege or rights of use therein, to any other power, state, or government, nor make any treaty by which any other nation shall obtain the same privileges, relative to the admission of any articles free of duty, hereby secured to the United States.

Now, sir, unless the language of this article was intended not to express but to conceal its meaning, I affirm that there is not one word in it that secures to our country any lien or privilege in any port or harbor or on the territory in the dominions of the King of the Hawaiian Islands. It merely guarantees that he will not make any such grants in favor of any other power. It does declare that no other nation shall obtain the same privileges relative to the admission of any articles free of duty hereby secured to the United States. But we have already demonstrated that this provision was wholly without value to us. So that, when you come to examine this clause critically, there is not the first political right or privilege absolutely secured to us. There is nothing of the kind in it. By the treaty of 1850 the King of the Hawaiian Islands could not grant any privileges to foreign powers which we would not be entitled to upon the same terms and conditions. Hence it is clear that this convention substantially does no more for us in a political point of view than the treaty of 1850. And in all other respects it is not so satisfactory. It does not secure for our merchant-vessels, for our whaling-ships, for our war and mail steamers, for our citizens resident in the island, the same liberal advantages as does the treaty of 1850. And yet the advocates of this convention have discovered in these few barren phrases the basis for our dominion over the islands, a foundation extremely frail for a superstructure so ambitious and imposing.

Gentlemen have delighted us with the spectacle of a proud dependency far out in the Pacific Sea, a half-way house for our caravans laden with the rich treasures of the East; our flag flying over Honolulu; our garrisons passing in reviews before some general officer in command of the islands; our heaviest guns crowning their ramparts, and our invincible monitors quietly sleeping in the harbors of Pearl River, but ready at the first tocsin of war with Great Britain to wake the echoes of those silent seas with their loudest thunders and to drive the British fleet from the track of our commerce.

But gentlemen are mistaken. All this fine rhetoric, these bright visions, these dreams of extended empire, vanish at the touch of fact. Sober-minded men, charged with the responsibilities of government, will appeal from these fancy sketches to the prosaic terms of the convention itself. And when they shall analyze them, they will at once perceive that there are no flag-staffs, no ramparts, not even Pearl River harbors that were to have been offered to us according to Mr. Nordhoff, no emblems of empire, but only sugar, provided we will admit it free of duty! A serious proposition to buy trade; a matter of mere dollars and cents; a vulgar subsidy in favor of a few men and no reciprocity. Where, then, is your lofty statesmanship?

But suppose we were to accept the assurances of gentlemen. Let us take it for granted that this convention (violent as the presumption may be) does secure to our country the great political advantages set forth in such glowing language. Is it advisable that we should accept them at such a price? Is it prudent to tax our people at this time to raise this bonus in order to acquire the extension of our political dominion over these islands two thousand miles distant and more? The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] has attempted to re-enforce his argument in favor of this convention by the high authority of Daniel Webster; and other gentlemen who have preceded me have appealed to the Monroe doctrine as a vindication of the bill. Sir, no allusions could have been more unfortunate for the advocates of this measure.

Surely, gentlemen have forgotten that Mr. Webster, as Secretary of State, was the first to recognize the independence of the islands, and has left upon record his opinions upon the point directly at issue. In volume 6, page 464 of his works, will be found a message of President Tyler, written by Mr. Webster, dated December 31, 1842, in which the following language is used:

Considering, therefore, that the United States possess so very large a share of the intercourse with those islands, it is deemed not unfit to make the declaration that their government seeks nevertheless no peculiar advantages, no exclusive control over the Hawaiian government, but is content with its independent existence and anxiously wishes for its security and prosperity.

Again, in replying to a letter addressed to him by Messrs. Timoteo Haalilio and William Richards, commissioners on behalf of the King of all the Hawaiian Islands, expressing the wish of their government that its independence should be recognized by the United States and a convention entered into for the regulation of their mutual interests and concerns, Mr. Webster employed the following language—speaking as Secretary of State, Washington, December 19, 1842—to be found in volume 6, page 478:

The United States, therefore, are more interested in the fate of the islands and of their government than any other nation can be; and this consideration induces the President to be quite willing to declare as the sense of the Government of the United States that the government of the Sandwich Islands ought to be respected; that no power ought either to take possession of the islands as a conquest or for the purposes of colonization; and that no power ought to seek for any undue control over the existing government, or any exclusive privileges or preferences with it in matters of commerce.

These were the sober and wise sentiments of one of the purest, firmest, and ablest men who ever spoke the English language! Not one word in favor of an extension of our political dominion! Not one word in favor of securing exclusive privileges or preferences in matters of commerce! The treaty of 1850, the first made with the King of the islands, was projected upon the policy so clearly set forth by Mr. Webster.

I beg to refer for one moment to the Monroe doctrine, in order to show how completely it has been misapprehended by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] who has just taken his seat, as well as by the other gentlemen who have spoken. What was the Monroe doctrine? I will read it. In the message of President Monroe to Congress at the commencement of the session of 1823-'24, the following passage occurs:

In the wars of the European powers, in matters relating to themselves, we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparations for defense. With the movements in this hemisphere we are of necessity more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments. We owe it therefore to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and these powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

What were the circumstances, the political events, which called forth this famous declaration? In the fall of 1822 the allied sovereigns of Russia, Austria, Prussia, France, composing the Holy Alliance, held their congress at Verona. The question to be determined was whether Ferdinand should be re-instated upon the throne of Spain against the will of the people of that country. Canning, then prime minister of Great Britain, had sent the Duke of Wellington to represent the British government.

The allied sovereigns resolved upon the policy of intervention in the face of the protest of Great Britain. The doctrines proclaimed the year before at Saybach were to be vindicated. It had been declared there that they had the right to interfere in the affairs of another state and to remodel its government, in order "to prevent the effect of its bad example"—the bad example being always free government. France thereupon sent an army into Spain, the Cortes was overthrown, and Ferdinand restored to power. No sooner, however, did these events transpire than Ferdinand demanded that upon the same principles he had a right to call upon the allied sovereigns to assist him in the endeavor to recall his revolted colonies in the western hemisphere to their obedience and to reduce them to subjection to the Spanish Crown. The pernicious example of America and its baneful effects were pointed out. Mr. Canning, prime minister of Great Britain, informed Mr. Rush, the American minister to the court of Saint James, of these designs against free institutions upon the American continent, and gave to him at the same time the assurance that, if sustained by the United States, Great Britain would resist. Mr. Rush immediately communicated this to our Government. It was received with joy, for it was everywhere felt that if the Holy Alliance should interfere with success with the governments south of us they would surely turn their attention to us and put forth all their united strength to crush our free institutions.

Mr. Calhoun, who was a member of President Monroe's Cabinet, says:

I well recollect the reception of the dispatch from Mr. Rush as distinctly as if all the circumstances had occurred yesterday. I well recollect the great satisfaction with which it was received by the Cabinet. It came late in the year, not long before the meeting of Congress. As was usual with Mr. Monroe upon great occasions, the papers were sent around to each member of the Cabinet, so that each might be duly apprised of all the circumstances and be prepared to give his opinion. The Cabinet met. It deliberated. There was long and careful consultation, and the result was the declaration which I have just announced.

There, sir, is the famous declaration and the history of it. It was not a declaration by Congress, but by the President, and not against Great Britain, but with her cordial approval, if not by her invitation. It was made for a particular emergency. The Holy Alliance vanished before it and has not again re-appeared upon the stage.

Mr. Calhoun uniformly contended that this Government was not bound by this doctrine to intervene whenever there was any disturbance in the internal affairs of our neighbors, nor to extend our supremacy over them whenever we had the power or even if invited by them. Surely it was not intended as a defiance to Great Britain. It was hailed with joy and exultation all over Europe by the lovers of free institutions, but nowhere did it meet with such hearty concurrence as in England. Canning and Brougham expressed themselves to Parliament as proud of their connection with the people of the United States, and the latter observed that the policy disclosed by the message became a great, a free, and independent nation.

Mr. Webster, in his speech on the Panama mission, says:

I look on the message of December, 1823, as forming a bright page in our history. I will help neither to erase it nor tear it out; nor shall it be by any act of mine blurred or blotted. It did honor to the sagacity of the Government, and I will not diminish that honor. Over those hopes I will not bring a mildew, nor will I put that gratified patriotism to shame. But how should it happen that there should now be such a new-born fear on the subject of this declaration? The crisis is over; the danger is past. At the time it was made there was real ground for apprehension; now there is none.

Both these statesmen cordially indorsed the declaration, and they both insisted that it did not commit our Government to any specific and uniform policy inexorable in all cases.

Now, sir, there is not one word in that famous declaration which commits us to the policy of extending our political dominion over the Hawaiian Islands. Let us admit that it applies. It rather forbids us to embark in the policy of intervention and empire. Mark the language:

It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparations for defense.

It will not be pretended that our rights are now invaded or seriously menaced. Have we any public information to this effect? Has the President sent to this House any message informing us that Great Britain or any other power was invading or menacing our rights, or the rights or independence of the Hawaiian Islands? Sir, nothing of the kind is pretended. It may be that the sugar-planters or their agents are whispering vague rumors of war or intervention in the corridors of the Capitol, but they may be dismissed as the sole beneficiaries of the convention. We have no information to this effect. Sir, from the time of the revolution in this country, whenever all other means have failed, our fears and jealousy of Great Britain have been appealed to when a point was at stake to be gained.

Fee, fi, fo, fum,
I smell the blood of an Englishmun, was the nursery chant for many of us, and now we find the advocates of this convention appealing to our apprehensions of British power.

Well, sir, I do not share these fears and cannot be moved from my sense of duty and right by these appeals. When occasion shall arise, I doubt not we will put forth, if necessary or proper, another declaration of our principles and policy with regard to the Hawaiian Islands or any other question that may arise, and those who may have faced one another on opposite sides in the recent war—the men of Gettysburgh and Perryville, or their descendants—re-united, standing shoulder to shoulder as brethren, as Americans, will take care of the honor and the welfare of our common country on land and sea. We have outlived the dread of Britain, but I trust we shall never outlive our love of peace and our horror of war.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask gentlemen whether this is any time to be giving away our revenues or embarking in a new policy of entangling alliances? Have we not already upon our hands questions relating to our internal affairs of sufficient magnitude to absorb our whole time and tax all our powers? It may gratify the pride of gentlemen to indulge the dream of foreign dominion; of seeing our power stretched across the Pacific Ocean; to embrace the Hawaiian Islands as the advance post on our way to the conquest of the vast countries beyond. I confess, sir, I have no such ambition. I know too well the lessons of history. I trust I properly estimate the ample dimensions, the magnificent area of my country; but broad and boundless and fertile as it may be, this is neither the source of her happiness nor of her greatness. Other nations extend over a still wider area; and yet how weak amid all the prodigality and richness of nature! No, sir; these are in part the elements of greatness, but there is something more that is indispensable to mighty and lasting achievement.

The only power that will give to our country true greatness and carry her forward foremost in the march of civilization is the moral and intellectual supremacy of the people, coupled with a more thorough appreciation of the Constitution and the Union, the duties they impose, and the privileges they confer. We have never yet realized how much we are indebted to these free institutions, nor how great is the task of preserving them in all their original purity and strength, not for ourselves only, not for one portion of the country, but for the whole people, in the South as well as the North, of whatever condition and without distinction, and for those who may come after us. Never was an American Congress confronted with graver questions, and no member of this House contemplates the condition of public or private affairs without the deepest concern. Hic labor, hoc opus est.

Let us avoid these complications with distant countries; let well enough alone, and let us address ourselves to the work before us. The people are waiting upon us.

I ask permission to annex to my remarks the tables furnished by the Bureau of Statistics, marked A and B, the text of the treaty proclaimed November 9, 1850, and a letter of Mr. David Wells on the subject before us:

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS TREATY—IS BUYING TRADE LIKELY TO BE PROFITABLE?

To the editor of the Evening Post:

Although it is well-nigh certain that no further discussion of the subject can now have much influence upon the proposed Sandwich Islands reciprocity treaty—the ratification of which the Evening Post (strangely, as it seems to me) warmly advocates—I desire, nevertheless, to present once more to the public, through your columns, the points involved, in the form of a little story and dialogue.

Suppose an independent island in the Gulf of Mexico, inhabited by some fifty thousand Indians, averse to work, and capable, by reason of the climate and abundant natural productions, of living almost without work. Suppose, further, that to this island the American Screw Company, of Providence, Rhode Island, dissatisfied with the existing tariff, determine to emigrate, in place of going, as they propose, to Dundas, Canada—the main object for moving in both cases being a desire to buy the iron out of which the screws are made without paying, as now, a duty of 66 per cent. on its import. The natives not being willing to work, the company imports Chinese coolies; and under these favoring circumstances their product year by year increases. This product they sell to all who desire screws, but more especially to the United States; and this, too, at a profit, although the United States exact a duty of 50 per cent. on the import of all screws coming from other countries.

After a time, however, the screw people, being shrewd fellows, desire, like everybody else, to extend their business and make a little more money, and in order to do this they hit on the following scheme: They go to Washington, and, getting hold of the proper officers, say: "Look here, now. We used to live in Providence; we believe in the United States. We've got this island down here in the Gulf of Mexico for nothing; we are doing pretty well making screws there, but we want to enter into more intimate and friendly relations with the great American nation. We propose, therefore, to allow you to export to the islands everything—like lumber, provisions, leather, tobacco, &c., which you now sell to us cheaper than we can buy elsewhere, and in addition we will include a lot of other things in our free list, some of which we should not buy of you any way, treaty or no treaty, like glue, and manufactures of iron and steel, and others which would be especially suited to send two thousand miles by sea to a tropical island—like, for example, fresh fish and oysters, eggs, sugar, rice, fruits, nuts, green vegetables, furs, skins and pelts, warm woollen cloth, blankets, and even bullion. In return you must reciprocally consent to allow the natural products of the island, whenever the natives gather more than they consume, to enter the United States free of duty; and more especially you must allow all our product of screws, on which you now charge 50 per cent. import duty, to come in free; at the same time keeping up this 50 per cent. duty on all the screws imported from other countries, and an equivalent duty on all the material out of which screws are made; so that, if any one desires to make screws in the United States, he will not be able to do so, except at a cost of 50 per cent. in excess of what the island establishment can afford to export them." Then up jumps the intelligent Congressman and says: "Of course this is just what we ought to do. Why hesitate to extend the area of commercial freedom?" and the leading free-trade newspapers cordially acquiesce. But just then that troublesome fellow, the arithmetic man, comes along, and, desirous as usual of smashing somebody's slate, propounds a few questions to the screw man, somewhat as follows:

Question. How much of the products of all nations—imports—does your island annually require, Mr. Screwman?

Answer. In 1873 we required $1,155,422; but as the native population of the island is rapidly diminishing, we did not take so much as we did in 1871 by $340,000.

Q. How much of domestic product does the island annually sell to other countries?

A. Our total foreign trade—exports—is about $1,400,000 per annum, of which, in 1875, screws at six cents per pound represented $1,200,000.

Q. So that you don't send much out of the island but screws?

A. No, sir.

Q. How many of those screws are imported into the United States?

A. In 1875 we sent you about eighteen million pounds; a mere trifle, sir; only about 1 per cent. of the consumption of the country, and of course not in any degree affecting the general prices of screws to your bureau and washstand makers.

Q. What duty did these screws pay on coming into the United States?

A. On an average about three cents per pound, or about 50 per cent. of the value of the screws at the shipping ports.

Q. So that if the duty had been remitted, as you propose we shall do under the treaty, the United States would have virtually made you a present last year of $540,000 gold?

A. It would have been somewhat so.

Q. If we remit the duty on the import of screws, what, in your opinion, is likely to be the future screw-product of the island?

A. The product last year was twenty-eight million pounds. With a guarantee of 50 per cent. profit over and above what is realized at present, the product will certainly increase very rapidly. Some think we can produce fifty million pounds per annum; others fix it as high as one hundred and fifty million pounds, or about 6 per cent. of the total consumption of the United States. Suppose we say fifty million pounds.

Q. And you will probably send your entire product to the United States?

A. Of course. If we can get three cents a pound more in the United States than we can elsewhere, or fifty per cent. certain profit, we should be fools to send a pound to any other country.

Q. Suppose, then, you send us the supposed minimum of fifty million pounds per annum, and we remit the duty of three cents, would not that be equivalent to making you an annual payment of $1,500,000?

A. Those would be just about the figures, though it might go higher, and probably would if we could import a sufficient additional number of Chinese laborers, and put up new factories. These figures look rather large, I admit, but then you are rich, have few taxes, and we give you reciprocity; and if you can sell us cheaper than we can buy elsewhere (which I don't believe you can) you may in time possibly get our whole trade.

Q. Yes, I understand. How much did you say your total trade, I mean imports from all countries, now amounts to?

A. About $1,400,000; but, of course, with this guaranteed profit of 50 per cent. on screws, we shall have more money and shall buy more wines, spirits, fermented liquors, clothing, furniture, pleasure carriages, &c., from foreign countries.

Q. Yes, I think you will; but I observe that none of these things, which already constitute large items of your imports, are to be admitted free under your proposed reciprocity treaty.

A. It is very true they are not included in the treaty; but they are not of much account.

Q. But two of these items represent about one-tenth of the value of your total imports?

A. I admit it.

Q. So that, if this treaty is adopted and everything works as expected, the United States (as is not probable) selling everything to the island to the exclusion of all other countries, we shall pay you about $1,500,000 per annum for the privilege of selling you another $1,500,000; or, to put it differently, for every dollar that we sell to you you give us a dollar's worth of screws, paying 50 per cent. profit, and then we in addition make you a present of another dollar as an expression of gratitude that we have an opportunity of buying screws of you. This may be reciprocity, but it looks to me like buying trade and paying so high a price for the privilege that if we keep on we shall not have anything left to trade with.

A. I can't stop to discuss this dollars and cents side of the question; but I do know that Mr. FERNANDO WOOD and the Evening Post say it is reciprocity; and if we once make a start in this business, there is no knowing where we will bring up. If there is a big hole left in your Treasury, you can keep up or double the duty on soda-ash, analine dyes, and grindstones; or, if it is luxurics you are after, why, hold on to the taxes on hair-pins and toothpicks. I for one am astonished that you should make such a fuss on giving a million and a half in gold every year to encourage us to make screws. Why, it isn't to be compared to what you are doing for those who grow linseed in your country. You put such an import tax on that as to get a revenue last year of only $20,000.06; but you raised the price of oil, which every man uses who paints his house, from forty-eight cents in London to seventy-eight cents in New York; and as you required twelve million gallons that year, you taxed your people double the amount which you propose to tax them now on this more indispensable article of screws, to encourage this far-off colonial industry. Besides, the aggregate wealth of the United States and the screw island will obviously be the same as before, only a little differently distributed; somewhat as the darkey said when he helped himself surreptitiously to his master's poultry, "There'll be less turkey but more nigger."

Seriously, Messrs. Editors, if you will only in the above dialogue substitute the Sandwich Islands for the island in the Mexican Gulf, and some thirty white planters for the American Screw Company, you will have this scheme of the Sandwich Islands reciprocity treaty complete. It is, furthermore, a good time when the burden of taxation is overwhelming all our material interests, to venture on such a costly experiment for the sake of buying trade.

I am yours, most respectfully,

DAVID A. WELLS.

NORWICH, CONNECTICUT, February 22, 1876.

HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

HAWAIIAN ISLANDS, 1849.

Treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation, between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, concluded December 20, 1849; ratification advised by the Senate January 14, 1850; ratified by the President February 4, 1850; ratification exchanged at Honolulu August 24, 1850; proclaimed November 9, 1850.

The United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, equally animated with the desire of maintaining the relations of good understanding which have hitherto so happily subsisted between their respective states and consolidating the commercial intercourse between them, have agreed to enter into negotiations for the conclusion of a treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation, for which purpose they have appointed plenipotentiaries; that is to say:

The President of the United States of America, John M. Clayton, Secretary of State of the United States, and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, James Jackson Jarves, accredited as his special commissioner to the Government of the United States, who, after having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have concluded and signed the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

There shall be perpetual peace and amity between the United States and the King of the Hawaiian Islands, his heirs, and his successors.

ARTICLE II.

There shall be reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation between the United States of America and the Hawaiian Islands. No duty of customs or other impost shall be charged upon any goods, the produce or manufacture of one country upon importation from such country into the other, other or higher than the duty or impost charged upon goods of the same kind the produce or manufacture of, or imported from, any other country; and the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands do hereby engage that the subjects or citizens of any other state shall not enjoy any favor, privilege, or immunity whatever, in matters of commerce and navigation, which shall not also, at the same time, be extended to the subjects or citizens of the other contracting party gratuitously, if the concession in favor of that other state shall have been gratuitous, and in return for a compensation as nearly as possible of proportionate value and effect, to be adjusted by mutual agreement, if the concession shall have been conditional.

ARTICLE III.

All articles the produce or manufacture of either country, which can legally be imported into either country from the other in ships of that other country, and thence coming, shall, when so imported, be subject to the same duties and enjoy the same privileges, whether imported in ships of the one country or in ships of the other; and in like manner, all goods which can legally be exported or re-exported from either country to the other in ships of that other country, shall, when so exported or re-exported, be subject to the same duties and be entitled to the same privileges, drawbacks, bounties, and allowances, whether exported in ships of the one country or in ships of the other; and all goods and articles, of whatever description, not being of the produce or manufacture of the United States which can be legally imported into the Sandwich Islands, shall, when so imported in vessels of the United States, pay no other or higher duties, imposts, or charges than shall be payable upon the like goods and articles when imported in the vessels of the most favored foreign nation, other than the nation of which the said goods and articles are the produce or manufacture.

ARTICLE IV.

No duties of tonnage, harbor, light-houses, pilotage, quarantine, or other similar duties, of whatever nature or under whatever denomination, shall be imposed in either country upon the vessels of the other in respect of voyages between the United States of America and the Hawaiian Islands if laden, or in respect of any voyage if in ballast, which shall not be equally imposed in the like cases on national vessels.

ARTICLE V.

It is hereby declared that the stipulations of the present treaty are not to be understood as applying to the navigation and carrying trade between one port and another situated in the states of either contracting party, such navigation and trade being reserved exclusively to national vessels.

ARTICLE VI.

Steam-vessels of the United States which may be employed by the Government of the said States in the carrying of their public mails across the Pacific Ocean, or from one port in that ocean to another, shall have free access to the ports of the Sandwich Islands, with the privilege of stopping therein to refit, to refresh, to land passengers and their baggage, and for the transaction of any business pertaining to the public mail service of the United States, and shall be subject in such ports to no duties of tonnage, harbor, light-houses, quarantine, or other similar duties of whatever nature or under whatever denomination.

ARTICLE VII.

The whale-ships of the United States shall have access to the ports of Hilo, Kealakeakua, and Hanalei, in the Sandwich Islands, for the purpose of refitment and refreshment, as well as to the ports of Honolulu and Lahaina, which only are ports of entry for all merchant-vessels; and in all the above-named ports they shall be permitted to trade or barter their supplies or goods, excepting spirituous liquors, to the amount of $200 ad valorem for each vessel, without paying any charge for tonnage or harbor dues of any description, or any duties or imposts whatever upon the goods or articles so traded or bartered. They shall also be permitted, with the like exemption from all charges for tonnage and harbor dues, further to trade or barter, with the same exception as to spirituous liquors, to the additional amount of $1,000 ad valorem for each vessel, paying upon the additional goods and articles so traded and bartered no other or higher duties than are payable on like goods and articles when imported in the vessels and by the citizens or subjects of the most favored foreign nation. They shall also be permitted to pass from port to port of the Sandwich Islands for the purpose of procuring refreshments; but they shall not discharge their seamen or land their passengers in the said islands except at Lahaina and Honolulu; and in all the ports named in this article the whale-ships of the United States shall enjoy, in all respects whatsoever, all the rights, privileges, and immunities which are enjoyed by, or shall be granted to, the whale-ships of the most favored foreign nation. The like privilege of frequenting the three ports of the Sandwich Islands above named in this article as not being ports of entry for merchant-vessels, is also guaranteed to all the public armed vessels of the United States. But nothing in this article shall be construed as authorizing any vessel of the United States, having on board any disease usually regarded as requiring quarantine, to enter, during the continuance of such disease on board, any port of the Sandwich Islands other than Lahaina or Honolulu.

ARTICLE VIII.

The contracting parties engage, in regard to the personal privileges, that the citizens of the United States of America shall enjoy in the dominions of His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands and the subjects of his said majesty in the United States of America; that they shall have free and undoubted right to travel and to reside in the states of the two high contracting parties, subject to the same precautions of police which are practiced toward the subjects or citizens of the most favored nations. They shall be entitled to occupy dwellings and warehouses, and to dispose of their personal property of every kind and description, by sale, gift, exchange, will, or in any other way whatever, without the smallest hinderance or obstacle; and their heirs or representatives, being subjects or citizens of the other contracting party, shall succeed to their personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato, and may take possession thereof either by themselves or by others acting for them, and dispose of the same at will, paying to the profit of the respective governments such dues only as the inhabitants of the country wherein the said goods are shall be subject to pay in like cases. And in case of the absence of the heir and representative, such care shall be taken of the said goods as would be taken of the goods of a native of the same country in like case, until the lawful owners may take measures for receiving them. And if a question should arise among several claimants as to which of them said goods belong, the same shall be decided finally by the laws and judges of the land wherein the said goods are. Where, on the decease of any person holding real estate within the territories of one party, such real estate would, by the laws of the land, descend on a citizen or subject of the other, were he not disqualified by alienage, such citizen or subject shall be allowed a reasonable time to sell the same, and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation, and exempt from all duties of detraction on the part of the government of the respective states. The citizens or subjects of the contracting parties shall not be obliged to pay, under any pretense whatever, any taxes or impositions other or greater than those which are paid, or may hereafter be paid, by the subjects or citizens of the most favored nations in the respective states of the high contracting parties. They shall be exempt from all military service, whether by land or by sea; from forced loans; and from every extraordinary contribution not general and by law established. Their dwellings, warehouses, and all premises appertaining thereto, destined for the purposes of commerce or residence, shall be respected. No arbitrary search of or visit to their houses, and no arbitrary examination or inspection whatever of the books, papers, or accounts of their trade shall be made; but such measures shall be executed only in conformity with the legal sentence of a competent tribunal; and each of the two contracting parties engages that the citizens or subjects of the other residing in their respective states shall enjoy their property and personal security in as full and ample a manner as their own citizens or subjects or the subjects or citizens of the most favored nations, but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries respectively.

ARTICLE IX.

The citizens and subjects of each of the two contracting parties shall be free in the States of the other to manage their own affairs themselves, or to commit those affairs to the management of any persons whom they may appoint as their broker, factor, or agent; nor shall the citizens and subjects of the two contracting parties be restrained in their choice of persons to act in such capacities, nor shall they be called upon to pay any salary or remuneration to any person whom they shall not choose to employ.

Absolute freedom shall be given in all cases to the buyer and seller to bargain together and fix the price of any goods or merchandise imported into, or to be exported from, the states and dominions of the two contracting parties, save and except generally such cases wherein the laws and usages of the country may require the intervention of any special agents in the states and dominions of the contracting parties. But nothing contained in this or any other article of the present treaty shall be construed to authorize the sale of spirituous liquors to the natives of the Sandwich Islands further than such sale may be allowed by the Hawaiian laws.

ARTICLE X.

Each of the two contracting parties may have, in the ports of the other, consuls, vice-consuls, and commercial agents, of their own appointment, who shall enjoy the same privileges and powers with those of the most favored nations; but if any such consuls shall exercise commerce, they shall be subject to the same laws and usages to which the private individuals of their nation are subject in the same place. The said consuls, vice-consuls, and commercial agents are authorized to require the assistance of the local authorities for the search, arrest, detention, and imprisonment of deserters from the ships of war and merchant-vessels of their country. For this purpose they shall apply to the competent tribunals, judges, and other officers, and shall in writing demand the said deserters, proving, by the exhibition of the registers of the vessels, the rolls of the crews, or by other official documents, that such individuals form part of the crews; and, this reclamation being thus substantiated, the surrender shall not be refused. Such deserters, when arrested, shall be placed at the disposal of the said consuls, vice-consuls, or commercial agents, and may be confined in the public prisons, at the request and cost of those who shall claim them, in order to be detained until the time when they shall be restored to the vessel to which they belonged, or sent back to their own country by a vessel of the same nation, or any other vessel whatsoever. The agents, owners, or masters of vessels on account of whom the deserters have been apprehended, upon requisition of the local authorities, shall be required to take or send away such deserters from the states and dominions of the contracting parties, or give such security for their good conduct as the law may require. But, if not sent back nor reclaimed within six months from the day of their arrest, or if all the expenses of such imprisonment are not defrayed by the party causing such arrest and imprisonment, they shall be set at liberty, and shall not be again arrested for the same cause. However, if the deserters shall be found to have committed any crime or offense, their surrender may be delayed until the tribunal before which their case shall be depending shall have pronounced its sentence, and such sentence shall have been carried into effect.

ARTICLE XI.

It is agreed that perfect and entire liberty of conscience shall be enjoyed by the citizens and subjects of both the contracting parties in the countries of the one and the other without their being liable to be disturbed or molested on account of their religious belief. But nothing contained in this article shall be construed to interfere with the exclusive right of the Hawaiian government to regulate for itself the schools which it may establish or support within its jurisdiction.

ARTICLE XII.

If any ships of war or other vessels be wrecked on the coasts of the states or territories of either of the contracting parties, such ships or vessels, or any parts thereof, and all furniture and appurtenances belonging thereunto, and all goods and merchandise which shall be saved therefrom, or the produce thereof, if sold, shall be faithfully restored, with the least possible delay, to the proprietors, upon being claimed by them or by their duly-authorized factors; and if there are no such proprietors or factors on the spot, then the said goods and merchandise, or the proceeds thereof, as well as all the papers found on board such wrecked ships or vessels, shall be delivered to the American or Hawaiian consul or vice-consuls in whose district the wreck may have taken place; and such consul, vice-consul, proprietors, or factors shall pay only the expenses incurred in the preservation of the property, together with the rate of salvage and expenses of quarantine which would have been payable in the like case of a wreck of a national vessel; and the goods and merchandise saved from the wreck shall not be subject to duties, unless entered for consumption, it being understood that, in case of any legal claim upon such wreck, goods, or merchandise, the same shall be referred for decision to the competent tribunals of the country.

ARTICLE XIII.

The vessels of either of the two contracting parties which may be forced by stress of weather or other cause into one of the ports of the other shall be exempt from all duties of port or navigation paid for the benefit of the state, if the motives which led to their seeking refuge be real and evident, and if no cargo be discharged or taken on board, save such as may relate to the subsistence of the crew or be necessary for the repair of the vessels, and if they do not stay in port beyond the time necessary, keeping in view the cause which led to their seeking refuge.

ARTICLE XIV.

The contracting parties mutually agree to surrender, upon official requisition, to the authorities of each, all persons who, being charged with the crimes of murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery, or the utterance of forged papers, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall be found within the territories of the other: Provided, That this shall only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the person so charged shall be found would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime had there been committed. And the respective judges and other magistrates of the two governments shall have authority, upon complaint made under oath, to issue a warrant for the apprehension of the person so charged, that he may be brought before such judges or other magistrates, respectively, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered; and if, on such hearing, the evidence be deemed sufficient to sustain the charge, it shall be the duty of the examining judge or magistrate to certify the same to the proper executive authority that a warrant may issue for the surrender of such fugitive. The expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by the party who makes the requisition and receives the fugitive.

ARTICLE XV.

So soon as steam or other mail packets under the flag of either of the contracting parties shall have commenced running between their respective ports of entry, the contracting parties agree to receive at the post-offices of those ports all mailable matter and to forward it as directed, the destination being to some regular post-office of either country, charging thereupon the regular postal rates as established by law in the territories of either party receiving said mailable matter in addition to the original postage of the office whence the mail was sent. Mails for the United States shall be made up at regular intervals at the Hawaiian post-office and dispatched to ports of the United States, the postmasters at which ports shall open the same and forward the inclosed matter as directed, crediting the Hawaiian government with their postages as established by law and stamped upon each manuscript or printed sheet.

All mailable matter destined for the Hawaiian Islands shall be received at the several post-offices in the United States and forwarded to San Francisco or other ports on the Pacific coast of the United States, whence the postmaster shall dispatch it by the regular mail-packets to Honolulu, the Hawaiian government agreeing on their part to receive and collect for and credit the Post-Office Department of the United States with the United States rates charged thereupon. It shall be optional to prepay the postage on letters in either country, but postage on printed sheets and newspapers shall in all cases be prepaid. The respective post-office departments of the contracting parties shall in their accounts, which are to be adjusted annually, be credited with all dead letters returned.

ARTICLE XVI.

The present treaty shall be in force from the date of the exchange of the ratifications for the term of ten years, and further until the end of twelve months after either of the contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its intention to terminate the same, each of the said contracting parties reserving to itself the right of giving such notice at the end of the said term of ten years, or at any subsequent term.

Any citizen or subject of either party infringing the articles of this treaty shall be held responsible for the same, and the harmony and good correspondence between the two governments shall not be interrupted thereby, each party engaging in no way to protect the offender, or sanction such violation.

ARTICLE XVII.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the said States, and by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, by and with the advice of his privy council of state, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Honolulu within eighteen months from the date of its signature, or sooner, if possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same in triplicate, and have thereto affixed their seals.

Done at Washington, in the English language, the 20th day of December, in the year 1849.

JOHN M. CLAYTON. [SEAL.]
JAMES JACKSON JAROES. [SEAL.]

Mr. BANKS obtained the floor.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] will yield, I will move that the committee now rise.

Mr. BANKS. I will yield for that purpose.

The motion of Mr. WOOD, of New York, was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAYLER reported that the Committee of the Whole, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under further consideration the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect the convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th of January, 1875, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I now give notice that I shall ask the House, on Tuesday next after the morning hour, to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of having two more speeches made upon this treaty, and then I shall ask the sense of the House upon the passage of this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I would suggest to the gentleman that there is another special order set for Tuesday next, the steamboat bill, as it is sometimes called; the bill in relation to navigation.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest to the gentleman to say Saturday next; there will be a business session on that day.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I will say to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. KELLEY. One of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means, the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] is now absent. He has expressed a desire to be heard upon this subject, and I think the opportunity should be reserved for him to speak.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I do not think I have any right to delay the action of the House on this bill. I shall be ready to call for a vote upon the bill after the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] shall have spoken. I do not understand that there are any more speeches to be made, after I have concluded what I may desire to say in reply. I will therefore name to-morrow, after the morning hour.

Mr. BRIGHT. I object to that. To-morrow is objection day, and we will need it in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Then I will name Monday, after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that there are several special orders now pending, three at least, to run from day to day, and there will be no lack of business to take up Monday or any other day for many days to come. What is the motion of the gentleman?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Before making any motion, I would say that I understand this bill is the special order from day to day until disposed of. I ask unanimous consent that the House will now make the order that on Monday next after the morning hour the consideration of this bill shall be resumed and concluded in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last night, the House had proceeded in the consideration of this bill as far as the paragraph relating to the Supervising Architect. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read the following:

First Comptroller of the Treasury:

For First Comptroller of the Treasury, $4,500; deputy comptroller, $2,600; four principal clerks, at $1,800 each; four clerks of class four; ten clerks of class three; six clerks of class two; four clerks of class one; six clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; and two laborers; in all, $55,480.

Second Comptroller of the Treasury:

For Second Comptroller of the Treasury, $4,500; deputy comptroller, $2,600; four principal clerks, at $1,800 each; four clerks of class four; ten clerks of class three; ten clerks of class two; six clerks of class one; nine clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; and two laborers; in all, $65,780.

Mr. FOSTER. In the paragraph relating to the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, I move to strike out the words "four clerks of class four" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "eight clerks of class four." I make this motion more particularly to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that by this bill the reduction proposed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury is 20 per cent., while in the office of the Second Comptroller the reduction is 34 per cent. I know of no reason for that discrimination. Both of these Comptrollers claim that the business of their offices cannot be done by the reduced force proposed in this bill, especially the Second Comptroller's Office. Now I would like to know why this discrimination is made between these two Comptrollers?

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have a vote.

Mr. FOSTER. Can I not get an answer?

Mr. RANDALL. We made an examination of these Bureaus, and the gentleman was in the committee at the time. So far as this part of the bill is concerned the whole plan is one in regard to numbers, and it is believed that the public service can be properly conducted in the two Comptrollers' Offices with the force which we have given.

Mr. FOSTER. The force in the one office is reduced 34 per cent., and in the other only 20 per cent.

Mr. RANDALL. Because one is capable of being reduced more than the other.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Commissioner of Customs:

For Commissioner of Customs, $4,000; deputy commissioner, $2,250; two principal clerks, at $1,800 each; three clerks of class three; six clerks of class two; six clerks of class one; one messenger; and one laborer; in all, $30,760.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend by striking out "$4,000" as the salary of the Commissioner of Customs and inserting "$3,000." I notice on examination that there is a very wide difference between the compensation allowed to the different Commissioners. The Commissioner of Customs under this bill is to receive $4,000, while the Commissioner of Pensions has had his pay reduced to $2,750. Now, perhaps it is owing to my want of knowledge upon this matter; but I am unable to see why there should be so large a difference between the salaries of these two officers. I am unable to comprehend why the Commissioner of Customs should receive $4,000 and the Commissioner of Pensions only $2,750. From what I know of the two offices there is really no comparison in the amount of labor required of these two men.

Mr. RANDALL. By the Revised Statutes, section 316, the salary of the Commissioner of Customs is fixed at $4,500; and we reduce it 10 per cent., or a little over. When we reach the subject of the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions, I will then reply to the other question of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] insist on the amendment?

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend by striking out "$2,250" as the salary of the deputy commissioner of customs and making it "$2,600." Mr. Chairman, I cannot for my life see why this discrimination should be made between the deputy commissioner of customs and the deputies of the First and the Second Comptrollers of the Treasury. The salary of the two deputy comptrollers is now fixed by this bill at $2,600. They were raised last year, for the first time, from $2,000 to $2,800. The deputy commissioner of customs is a similar officer, the Commissioner of Customs being a controlling officer. The salary of the deputy commissioner of customs, whose duties are in all respects equally important with those of the deputy comptrollers, is reduced to $2,250. I cannot understand the reason for this discrimination between officers whose duties are equally important.

Mr. RANDHLL. The deputies of the First and the Second Comptroller were kept at $2,000 for many years, while all other officers of similar grade had their salaries increased. The act known as the "Kellogg bill" raised the salaries of these deputy comptrollers to $2,800. The committee has made a reduction of only $200 in view of the fact—that was my reason—that they had had no increase until the "Kellogg bill."

Mr. FOSTER. Then the gentleman concedes that $2,600 is too high.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, we took 10 per cent. off.

Mr. FOSTER. Only about 7½ per cent.

Mr. RANDALL. In reference to the deputy commissioner of customs, we took of 10 per cent. If gentlemen will turn to the Statutes at Large, volume 18, page about 290, they will find that the salary was fixed at $2,500. The reduction of 10 per cent. makes the salary what is proposed in the bill, $2,250.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not answer my point.

Mr. RANDALL. The deputy commissioner of customs is a much less important office. I do not suppose there are two more important offices in the Government than the First and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury. The gentleman is quite aware that those officers have power with which the President of the United States himself cannot interfere.

Mr. FOSTER. The Commissioner of Customs has equal power in his sphere.

Mr. RANDALL. Not finally. Their action is final.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand the action of the Commissioner of Customs to be final within his own province.

Mr. RANDALL. As to the deputies of these two Comptrollers of the Treasury, it should be borne in mind that Congress a few years ago assigned to their chiefs important duties in connection with the District of Columbia; so that the great bulk of the business of their offices for a year or two past has been performed by the deputies.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not apply to next year.

Mr. RANDALL. This matter is equitable and right as the committee have fixed it.

Mr. HALE. Taking these three offices, the First Comptroller, the Second Comptroller, and the Commissioner of Customs, I think there are very good reasons why the corresponding offices should be fixed at an even rate. What the committee is attempting to do in this bill is even-handed justice. Now the responsibilities resting upon these three leading and important officers of the Treasury Department do no differ materially. The Commissioner of Customs passes upon accounts, and is a final officer to that extent.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the salaries of the two Comptrollers are $500 higher than the salary of the Commissioner of Customs.

Mr. HALE. I do not think they should be.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not consider there are two more important offices in the Government than these two Comptrollers of the Treasury.

Mr. HALE. And the Commissioner of Customs likewise. As to these deputies they are very faithful, competent men in all these Bureaus. They are men of long service, not only in the Comptrollers' Offices but in this Bureau of Customs. The deputy commissioner is a man who has been there for years and is thoroughly conversant with the law pertaining to the immense number of accounts which pass through that Bureau. He has been there for many years and is thoroughly acquainted with all the details of the business. Under any system of civil service, such as would be acceptable in good government, that gentleman would be entitled to promotion and to salary equal to either of the deputies in the Comptrollers' Offices of the Treasury. He should be placed by his deserts and his knowledge as high as the same officer in these other Bureaus. I should be glad to see this equality in these deputyships continued. I would not maintain it by striking these others down. The process of leveling to do most justice would be to level up and to put them all on the same basis. If gentlemen wish to oppose it they can do so, but I think it a fair thing and ought to be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me suggest that the salary of the deputy comptroller of customs is $2,250, which is $250 higher than any deputyship until the last Congress. The highest then corresponding with that of chief clerk was $2,000 only. So there is an increase here of $250 within the last two years of the salary of this deputy, who was formerly chief clerk.

Mr. HALE. What is the effect in the Comptrollers' Offices?

Mr. HOLMAN. The same. They have been advanced. If the gentleman was proposing to reduce the First and Second Comptrollers' deputies back to $2,000, I think the argument would be unanswerable. I do not think the increase should take place. When he applies his remarks to what is a reasonable salary for that office he will see if we make it $250 higher than it was two years ago he cannot complain this salary is insufficient.

Mr. HALE. The salary of the chief clerks, now deputy comptrollers, in these other Bureaus was also at $2,000 a year, precisely as the case in this office. If you put up the deputies to $2,600 why not also put up this salary to $2,600?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not put the others down?

Mr. RANDALL. One word more about these Comptrollers' Offices. The First and Second Comptrollers' Offices have charge of all the civil accounts of the Government except the accounts of the customs and post-offices. The Second Comptroller has the accounts of the War and Navy Departments. The Commissioner of Customs has only the customs accounts.

Mr. HALE. And these are about $200,000,000 a year.

Mr. RANDALL. A comparison of the business of these offices is very largely in favor of the Comptroller's Office. I think the discrimination in the salaries of the chief officers, varying $500, is correct, and I think the difference should be continued as to the deputies.

Mr. FOSTER'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOSTER. I now call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the amendment he offered last night, lest it be forgotten. I presume he wishes the committee to act on it now?

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman refer to the consolidation of the Loans and Currency Bureau with other Bureaus?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL I have no objection to taking that up now.

Mr. HALE. Let that be considered to-night.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I move the following amendment, to come in at the end of the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to line 458 the following:

Whenever, in the judgment of a head of any Department, the duties assigned to a clerk of one class can be as well performed by a clerk of a lower class or by a female clerk, it shall be lawful for him to diminish the number of clerks of a higher grade and increase the number of clerks of a lower grade to the same extent.

Mr. HOAR. If my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will attend to this one moment, I will be much obliged to him. I think it will meet with his assent. The purpose of this amendment is not to put any discretion or power into the hands of the head of a Department, except discretion and power to reduce expenditures in particular cases. Suppose we assign in any Department of the Government ten first-class clerks and ten second-class clerks, and the head of the Department finds he can get along with fifteen first-class clerks and only five of the higher grade, making a reduction to the extent of the difference between the first and second class salary of five clerks, there would seem to be no reason why he should not be permitted by law to do this. So, too, in regard to the matter of female clerks. This provides in no case can there be a larger expenditure or a larger number of clerks of a higher grade than the law authorizes, but it permits the head of a Department, instead of five fourth-class clerks when he can get along with five first-class clerks, to make that substitution, thereby saving so much to the Government. And it will also give the head of the Department to that extent the power of trying clerks who are appointed as to their fitness and capacity for the office at a lower salary when they are first appointed and of holding out the hope of their being raised to the higher grade as a reward for faithful conduct and capacity in the service. I cannot see that there can be any objection to it.

Mr. RANDALL. A somewhat similar provision was embraced in the act of last year as to the General Land Office, and under it quite a number of nine-hundred-dollar clerks were appointed instead of twelve-hundred-dollar clerks; that is to say, in this way: three twelve-hundred-dollar clerks would make the expense $3,600, which would provide the pay for four at $900.

Mr. HOAR. This does not do that. This limits the number. Take an extreme case. Suppose you appropriate for twenty fourth-class clerks in a particular Department and provide for nothing else; this provision would permit the head of the Department to appoint to that duty twenty first-class clerks, if he thought they could do the work, or ten first-class clerks. It would not increase the number of persons employed. He cannot go beyond the number authorized, but merely has the authority to have a cheaper kind of clerks.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to hear the gentleman's amendment read again.

Mr. HOAR. I will say that, if, on examination, the chairman of the committee should object to this amendment, I will consent to its being stricken out.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to it except that I apprehend there might perhaps be a charge made that we are putting in inefficient clerks, giving an excuse for the appointment of a higher class of clerks.

Mr. HOAR. The amendment is very carefully drawn, and could not have that effect.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will make this suggestion to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that this should come in as an independent section, and its proper place would be at the close of the bill anyhow. I suggest that the gentleman withdraw his amendment at present and offer it at the end of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph to which I have referred in the appropriation bill of last session. I would like to have the gentleman from Massachusetts hear it read.

Mr. HOAR. My amendment avoids any evil that might arise under the provision referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, at his discretion, shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to use any portion of said appropriation for piece-work, or by the day, month, or year, at such rate or rates as he may deem just and fair, not exceeding a salary of $1,200 per annum; also, for three clerks of class four, two clerks of class three, four clerks of class two, and twenty-one clerks of class one, to be available from and after the 1st day of March, 1875, $52,533.33.

Mr. RANDALL. The effect of that was to produce confusion. When we came to take up the estimates for this year we knew nothing about that, and the result is that quite a number of clerks in the General Land Office under that provision have been—well, legislated out of office. I will say, in conformity with the suggestion of my friend from Maryland, that if the gentleman from Massachusetts allows us to examine his amendment, and if we find that there are not valid reasons against it, we will insert it in the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I am entirely contented with that suggestion. I desire, however, before withdrawing my amendment to make another remark. What has just been read is liable to the objection the gentleman from Pennsylvania states, and also to the objection that a portion of the appropriation is for work to be done by persons who are not made officers of the Government subject to the penalties applicable to officers. But my amendment does not increase the number of the officers; it authorizes no work which is not done by public officers, but simply says that when you give so many fourth-class clerks to the head of a Department to do a certain work, if he can do that work with the same number of clerks paid at a cheaper rate, he may do so.

Mr. RANDALL. I quite understand that the gentleman desires by his amendment to promote the efficiency of the service.

Mr. HOAR. In conformity with the suggestion which has been made, I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

First Auditor:

For the First Auditor of the Treasury, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; two principal clerks, at $1,800 each; two clerks of class four, four clerks of class three, six clerks of class two, ten clerks of class one, one messenger, and one laborer; in all, $39,810; and for the division of loans, namely: Two clerks of class four, two clerks of class three, two clerks of class two, and two clerks of class one; in all, $11,100.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the following amendment:

In line 460 strike out "$3,600" and insert "$4,000;" so that it will read: "For the First Auditor of the Treasury, $4,000."

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a few minutes ago said that the aim of the committee was to arrive at exact justice with regard to these officers. Now by the last Congress the pay of the Auditors was fixed at $4,000, and it is now reduced by this bill to $3,600. I am aware that that is the 10 per cent. reduction.

During the five years that I have been here in this House I have frequently heard it stated that we were to have a revision of the civil service of the Government. There was a partial reform made last Congress in the Treasury Department, and also in another Department of the Government. The bill of this year undoes all that was done in the last Congress, and it would require a great deal of learning, a great deal of study, and a great deal of skill to write out the civil service of the American Government, and to show the justice of this compensation and of that as compared among themselves.

Now here are the Auditors, very important officers, having very large trusts committed to them. We ask them to perform the services with which they are intrusted for the small compensation of $3,600, reducing their compensation below what it has been hitherto. These men have in their keeping millions and millions of dollars. Take for instance the Second Auditor of the Treasury, who went into his office fifteen years ago the present week, and during all that period has been in his place guarding the interests of the Government. A more faithful officer never served any government. All the bounties and all the larger Army accounts have passed through his hands, and there has never been a word said by anybody against the Second Auditor of the Treasury. And yet we propose to cut down his pay, bringing it proportionately far below that of officers who perform less work; giving $2,600 for instance to a deputy comptroller, and paying him $3,600. There is no just measure of proportion between the salaries that it is proposed to give to these different officers.

I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, that what was accomplished in the way of reform in the last Congress would have been preserved in this; but, sir, we are going on from bad to worse, and I am not amazed at the fact that the chairman of the committee finds it difficult to explain.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not say I found it difficult to explain.

Mr. DUNNELL. You said so last night.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of half past four has arrived, at which time the House takes a recess.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced the passage of bills of the House of the following titles, with amendments; in which concurrence was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 2655) to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes;

An act (H. R. No. 2434) to correct an error in section 5271 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

An act (H. R. No. 1118) granting a pension to Jane Dulaney.

It further announced the passage of the following bills, without amendment:

An act (H. R. No. 2304) granting a pension to Philip J. Shaw;

An act (H. R. No. 1988) for the relief of Hermann Kreismann, United States consul-general at Berlin;

An act (H. R. No. 610) granting a pension to Seth W. Homestead;

An act (H. R. No. 111) granting a pension to David J. Garrett; and

An act (H. R. No. 247) for the relief of James M. Coffinberry, of Cleveland, Ohio.

It further announced the passage of the following bills; in which concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 64) granting a pension to Julia Scroggins;

An act (S. No. 121) granting a pension to John Pierson; and

An act (S. No. 628) for the relief of John J. Anderson, surviving copartner of the firm of Anderson & White.

The hour of half past four having arrived, the House, pursuant to order, took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The hour of half past seven having arrived, the House resumed its session, Mr. HOLMAN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. COX. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment was offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I would ask the Chair if my time has expired?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman has exhausted about half of his time, and the Chair will now hold that he is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not know that I desire to occupy the five minutes assigned me through the courtesy of the Chair, but perhaps I might do so. I have stated that I was unable to see why the reduction should be such as has been made in the case of those other Auditors. The salaries provided, if we make a comparison with these officers of the Government who perform an equal amount of service—as I said, these officers are the most important in the Government; a very large amount of money passes through their hands; their services are such as call for great care and great labor, and in point of fact large experience. It was believed that, when the salaries of these officers was made $4,000 a year, as it was by the bill of last year, these men were being paid no more than what they deserved. We now propose by this bill, in point of fact, to disregard the law utterly, to disregard it, and, as the chairman of the committee admitted this afternoon, we are here in the act of appropriating a less sum of money for very many officers than the law declares them entitled to. Now, this manner of legislation, in my judgment, is unworthy. The law says that a certain class of these officers shall have $4,000 a year, but we are only willing to pay them $3,600 a year. The law gives them a fixed compensation, and when a man enters on his duties as such an officer he has a right to expect the compensation that is marked out in the law. I said that I hoped that some committee in this Congress would bring in a bill to promote reform in the Federal service, and that there might be a fixed compensation well grounded, and that there might be an appropriation in harmony with the law itself.

Why is it that we are having so much trouble with this appropriation bill? Mr. Chairman, it has already been five weeks before this House, and the chances are it will be before the House three or four weeks longer. What is the trouble with this bill? It is because an attempt is made to pass an appropriation bill in utter violation of the law. Men are to be paid a compensation other than the law provides, and the bill comes before us containing provisions other than those which are in accordance with law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on Mr. DUNNELL'S amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. TARBOX. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 472, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Five principal clerks, at $1,800 each; 6 clerks of class four; 35 clerks of class three; 70 clerks of class two; 45 clerks of class one; 1 messenger; and 12 laborers; in all, $229,860.

My amendment does not conflict at all with the reduction of salaries proposed by the bill; it is simply a retention of the present clerical force now in the office at the salaries fixed by the committee. From information and from some familiarity with the business of that Bureau I am convinced that the reduction of that clerical force contemplated in this bill would do violence to its efficiency in the transaction of its business. I beg gentlemen to remember that this office has to do with a class of citizens of whose interest the country are and ought to be specially tender, the men, and the widows, and the orphans of the men, and their representatives, who fought for the country, and the quick dispatch of their claims is a matter that we should be specially careful of.

Now, sir, this office for many years has been administered by gentlemen who have not been governed by political influences in the discharge of their duties. In the years 1873 and 1874 the force employed in that office was two hundred and sixty-seven clerks. In 1875 the force was reduced to one hundred and eighty-four. Again at the commencement of the present fiscal year it was reduced to one hundred and sixty-one clerks. The present bill proposes to reduce it still further to ninety-seven clerks, and the report will show that while the business of that office has diminished under recent legislation the reduction of its business has been in no proportion to the reduction already accomplished in its force; and in some departments of its labor there has been an actual increase of duties imposed upon it. I will instance one. It is the duty of this Bureau to respond to interrogatories put to it by other offices and Bureaus, notably the Pension Office, in the transaction of their business. It has been called upon to make responses amounting to more than two thousand a month. I submit that this office should not be crippled in its ability to discharge the duties that are imposed upon it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. This office at one time was a very important one, as regards the soldier, the soldier's widow, and his heirs. It relates to back pay and bounty. The committee have examined this subject thoroughly, as they believe, and find that the duties of this office and its business are now enormously on the decline. The force that we have allowed them in this bill for the coming fiscal year, I think the Committee on Appropriations, without dissent, deem to be adequate. I may say that, in my own opinion, the work can be done with less force than we have given it. We have in no way whatever, either through the gentleman at the head of this Bureau, to whom I accord all the qualities that have been stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. TARBOX,] nor through any agency of any member of the committee, has any remonstrance been received as to the manner in which we have fixed the force in this Bureau. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be voted down, because it involves an additional expenditure of $90,000.

Mr. POPPLETON. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] if, in the apportionment of labor in the Treasury Department, the Committee on Appropriations have increased the labor of the Auditor in this office?

Mr. RANDALL. Not that I know of.

Mr. POPPLETON. Then I would be glad to know why the salary of this Auditor is increased by this bill $600 over the salary appropriated for the last year?

Mr. RANDALL. You mean the Second Auditor?

Mr. POPPLETON. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is mistaken; the salary last year was $4,000, and we have reduced it 10 per cent., to $3,600.

Mr. POPPLETON. I understood that it was $3,000 last year.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; it was $4,000 last year.

The amendment of Mr. TARBOX was not agreed to.

Mr. JOYCE. I move to amend the pending paragraph in line 474, by striking out "twenty-five clerks of class three" and inserting "thirty clerks of class three."

By virtue of my right under a motion to amend I desire to avail myself of this opportunity to say a few words upon the impracticability and injustice of the policy adopted by the Committee on Appropriations with reference to reducing the numbers and cutting down the salaries and wages of the employés in the several Departments of the Government.

The democratic party came into power in this House by telling the people how extravagant and corrupt the republican party had been, and what marvelous things they would do to revive business and relieve the distresses of the people if they were permitted to have control of this branch of the national Legislature.

By deception in one quarter and force and intimidation in another they succeeded in carrying a majority of the popular elections, and in this Congress for the first time in sixteen years they find themselves largely in the majority.

When once in power, the situation demanded that at least a violent attempt should be made to satisfy the people, and induce them, if possible, to extend their lease and give them the control of the General Government for the next four years.

At the commencement of this session it was perfectly evident that, in view of the promises they had made of retrenchment and reform, their hope, if they had any in this emergency, lay in the Committee on Appropriations and in the organization of the House; all the political Moseses they could muster were placed upon that committee.

In their anxious and reckless haste to grind out political capital for the next presidential campaign a majority of that committee originated and adopted a policy which, if carried out by a majority of this House, will be a blunder much worse than a crime, and bring down upon the democratic party the well-deserved censure of every fair-minded and honest man in this country.

An honest purpose to reduce the expenditures of the Government and inaugurate a system of economic reform in all its different branches would have led that committee, before they put the filling into this bill, to make a thorough examination of all the Departments, consult fully and freely with those in charge, and then, with all the evidence before them, they would have been prepared to decide intelligently where the help could be reduced without detriment to the public service and where the salaries and wages could be cut down with a real saving to the Government, and without robbing honest labor of its hard-earned wages.

But, instead of pursuing this course, and doing as any wise and prudent man would do in the management of his own business, they decided in the first place that, in order to supply democratic orators and presses with sufficient ammunition for the coming campaign, they must reduce the current expenses of the Government at least thirty or forty millions of dollars, and so they sat down in their committee-room and, without any reliable data upon which to act, and in almost perfect ignorance of the amount of work to be performed, or the amount of help required to perform it, they cut and slashed regardless of personal rights or the public weal, with but a single idea, and that was an arbitrary reduction of 10 per cent. on the salaries and wages and 20 per cent. on the number of persons employed.

Now, sir, it seems to me that any man with the smallest possible modicum of common sense and discretion, or knowledge of business affairs, would have known at once that the number of employés in all these Departments and their wages could not be fairly and economically established and regulated by any such rule as the one adopted by the Committee on Appropriations.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, a thorough examination should have been made of each one of the Departments, and if any drones or sinecures were discovered, they should have been cut off, the help reduced to the smallest number consistent with economy and efficiency, none but competent and worthy persons retained, and to them should be paid a fair and liberal reward for their services.

The business of the Government, in this respect, should be conducted on the same principle that a shrewd and cautious man would run a manufacturing establishment; hire none but competent and industrious persons, who are qualified for the business, a sufficient number to do the work, and then pay them wages which will enable him to retain them in his employ.

Cheap help is always the most expensive, and overworked laborers are always a source of loss to the employer.

The truth is, and no men ought to know it better than the learned gentlemen who compose the Committee on Appropriations, that the wages now paid to the Government employés in this city, with present high prices and cost of living, is barely enough, if they have small families, to enable them to keep soul and body together.

And there is another thing which it may be well for us to remember with reference to this matter, and that is that a large proportion of the men employed in these Departments and about this Capitol are those whose constitutions have been more or less shattered and their health broken down by services and privations in a war which saved us a country and the blessings of our free institutions.

These men, who bring honorable scars from many a hard-fought field, and women whose hope and stay were swept away in the red storm of war, are the nation's wards; and while they are unable, many of them, to endure the labor and exposure of the farm and the factory, they are able to do good service in these Departments for the Government they helped to preserve, and thus save themselves, their wives and little ones, from grudging charity, the pangs of want, or the disgrace of beggary.

I insist then, Mr. Chairman, that the rule, or pretended rule, upon which this bill was made up by the committee, is radically wrong, and would, if they had kept within it, worked great injustice to an intelligent, hard-working, and deserving class of our citizens; but they have not kept within their own rule, and bad as it is, the committee in their feverish zeal to serve their party have gone beyond it, and parsimoniously, and as I say knowingly, reduced the salaries and wages of many of these people below the point of actual starvation.

Now, sir, I am in favor of establishing a fair, honest, and reasonable standard of economic reform everywhere and reducing the expenditures of this Government to the lowest possible figure consistent with the public good and the due execution of the laws; but I am utterly opposed to this clogging of the machinery of the Government, this ruthless slaughter of the innocents, and this bold, audacious, and high-handed robbery of those who toil and who earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow, for political or any other purpose.

And, sir, I can but look upon it as beneath the humanity and dignity of an American Congress to spend its valuable time and the money of the people in hunting out some poor soldier or widow whose already-scanty wages they can reduce still lower and save a few paltry dollars to the Government, while they are spending millions in bogus investigations and in schemes of all sorts to bolster up the waning fortunes of the democratic party.

Mr. Chairman, every dollar you get in that way is the price of blood; and, in the name of humanity and that old Jewish law which Christ and his Apostles held sacred, I demand that the money thus wrung from the hand of toil and of those who have reaped down your harvests shall be used to purchase a field in which those who vote for it shall be buried, and that not a penny of it go into the national Treasury.

Do you suppose, gentlemen, that in the rôle you are now playing you can deceive the people by this bold and shameless assumption of virtue and this hollow-hearted and brazen display of hypocrisy? If you do, the ides of November will convince you of your error. Your political history is known and read of all men.

You are now attempting to steal "the livery of the court of heaven to serve the devil in;" but you are already detected and your dissembling has been exposed, and millions of honest and intelligent men, who were last year cheated by your promises, now hold you in derision and look upon you as a political organization beyond the pale of hope and as being "banded together by despair of forgiveness and the universal detestation of mankind."

As a party you are not to be trusted, for, while you are holding up one hand in holy horror at republican corruption, with the other you are robbing the national Treasury of the last dollar in its till.

You are crying retrenchment and reform, and at the same time you are wasting and squandering the public money with a reckless dissipation unparalleled in the history of this or any other country.

With unholy design you are now seeking to get control of the Government in order that you may undo, vacate, and annul all that has been done and suffered during the past fifteen years, and then turn it over to men who for five years sought to destroy it, who now submit because they dare not rebel, and who to-day inwardly hate the people of the North, the Union, and liberty as bitterly and intensely as they did at Antietam and Malvern Hill.

Your history during the present session of Congress is enough to make the cheek of every American tingle with shame, and presents one grand series of unmitigated blunders; and the more you investigate and probe the body-politic the more your own meanness and dishonesty are exposed and made manifest.

Now, sir, let me ask the gentlemen composing the majority of this committee, when and by whom they have been called upon to stain the honor of the Government by robbing the honest, industrious laborer of his hire. Have the people required this at your hands? Have they demanded that you should do this great wrong?

Do you desire to celebrate the great centennial year of your independence amid the cries of your own citizens whom you have defrauded and oppressed and whose hard-earned wages you wrongfully withhold?

Sir, the people of this country are brave and generous; they like honesty and sincerity and despise buncombe and demagogism; while they are prudent and economical, they are liberal and just. They are opposed to jobbery, to subsidies, to salary grabs, to Credit Mobiliers, and corruption of all kinds; but they are in favor of a fair and honest day's work and of paying every public servant and employé a just and reasonable compensation for their labor.

Now, sir, I am well aware that any man who has the boldness to differ with the committee upon these points is at once branded as an opponent of all retrenchment and reform, and that this side of the House is helpless to prevent the consummation of this great wrong unless honest democrats, who care more for right and justice than they do for party, shall join with us in amending this bill.

I am told that if any democrat dares to wince at this nauseating draught he is at once informed by the chairman of the committee or his trusty lieutenant that the party demands the sacrifice; that Isaac, though a favorite son, must be offered; that in this case there is no ram in the thicket or angel to call upon these modern Abrahams to hold; and so they must harden their hearts, stifle their consciences, and perform the oblation.

Believing and knowing, as I do, that the provisions of this bill will discharge many persons from the Government employ whose services and labor are absolutely necessary to carry on the business of the several Departments, which must be done, and that the salaries and wages of those who are left are unjustly and cruelly reduced, I appeal to the candid and sensible men in this House to forget for a moment partisan politics and the presidential campaign, and join with me in so amending this bill that no waste or extravagance shall be committed on the one side, or injustice and cruelty suffered on the other.

During the remarks of Mr. JOYCE the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The five minutes of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] have expired.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to oppose the amendment, and will yield my time to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. JOYCE resumed and concluded his remarks as above.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment, for the purpose of saying that I have listened with attention to the general condemnation of this bill made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. JOYCE.] I want to direct the attention of the House, and if the country should take notice of it it would do no harm, to the fact that while the gentleman has made a general complaint against us, up to this time he has failed to point out a single detail in this bill with which he finds fault.

Mr. WILLARD. I have generally supported the Committee on Appropriations in reference to the various motions which have been made in regard to this bill, and I will take this occasion briefly to state the reasons why I have done so. I believe that when this Congress met there was a very general expectation, in view of the condition of the industries of our country, that we should take hold of the business of retrenchment in real earnest. I must say that when this bill was brought in I felt that I could give it my hearty support. It may be wrong in some of its details, but I have every reason to believe that the committee have given to this bill that attention which it requires.

For the laborers in this city engaged in doing service for the Government I feel as much as any one; but I feel also for that great body of laborers throughout the country from whom we are taking their wage-fund by onerous taxation. The other day, in looking over the first message of Thomas Jefferson, I came across this passage, to which I will call the attention of this committee:

Considering the general tendency to multiply offices and dependencies and to increase expense to the ultimate term of burden which the citizen can bear, it behooves us to avail ourselves of every occasion which presents itself for taking off the surcharge; that it may never be seen here that, after leaving to labor the smallest portion of its earnings on which it can subsist, Government shall itself consume the whole residue of what it was instituted to guard.

I believe that we should observe this rule in this peculiar period of our country's history. When there is such a surcharge resting upon labor throughout the entire country I believe we should come up heroically to the task of relieving the country from its burdens.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted upon the amendment and upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. JOYCE was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department:

For compensation of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, $3,660; deputy auditor, $2,250; eight principal clerks, at $1,800 each; four clerks of class four, and, additional to one clerk as disbursing clerk, $200; fifty clerks of class three; sixty-four clerks of class two; thirty-six clerks of class one; one messenger; and eighteen laborers; twenty assorters of money-orders, $10,000; also, fifteen female assorters of money-orders, at $900 each; in all, $263,050.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by reducing the number of assorters of money-orders from twenty to eighteen, and by appropriating for their payment $18,000, instead of $10,000; also by changing the total of the paragraph to $271,050. This amendment is offered at the instance of the Department. It will be observed that an appropriation of $10,000 for twenty assorters of money-orders would allow each person a salary of only $500, whereas the salary ought to be $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Treasurer:

For compensation of the Treasurer of the United States, $6,000; Assistant Treasurer, $3,500; cashier, $3,500; assistant cashier, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,500; five principal clerks, at $2,000 each; two principal book-keepers, one at $2,400 and one at $2,250; two tellers, one at $2,200 and one at $2,100; ten clerks of class four, ten clerks of class three, six clerks of class two, six clerks of class one; forty clerks, at $900 each; four messengers, five laborers, at $720 each; and seven laborers, at $240 each; in all, $127,590; and for the division of loans, namely: Ten clerks of class four, five clerks of class three, four clerks of class two, nine clerks of class one; one hundred and ten counters and copyists, at $900 each; four messengers, and twenty laborers; in all, $156,010; and for the force employed in redeeming the national currency, namely: For superintendent, $3,200; two principal tellers and one principal book-keeper, at $2,400 each; one assistant book-keeper, $2,300; and two assistant tellers, at $2,000 each; two clerks of class four, two clerks of class three, four clerks of class two, thirty-six clerks of class one; fifteen clerks, at $1,000 each; forty clerks, at $900 each; two messengers, three assistant messengers, three employés, at $432 each; in all, $127,336.

Mr. RANDALL. On behalf of the Committee on Appropriations I move to amend by striking out the following:

Assistant cashier, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,500; five principal clerks, at $2,000 each; two principal book-keepers, one at $2,400 and one at $2,250; two tellers, one at $2,200 and one at $2,100.

And inserting in lieu of the portion stricken out the following:

Assistant cashier, $3,200; chief clerk, $2,500; four principal clerks, at $2,500; one principal book-keeper, at $2,400; two tellers, at $2,400 each; two assistant tellers, at $2,200 each; five book-keepers, at $2,000 each.

In line 531 after the words "for the division of loans, namely:" strike out "ten clerks of class four" and insert "nine clerks of class four."

This is somewhat of a re-arrangement and exchange in some particulars of the salaries. It is done to meet the views of the Treasury Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit the following further amendment:

In line 542 strike out "two clerks of class four" and insert "four clerks of class four;" strike out "two clerks of class three" and insert "four clerks of class three."

In line 544 strike out "forty clerks, at $900 each" and insert "thirty-six clerks, at $900 each."

Change the total of the paragraph so as to read $129,836.

This amendment does not increase the number of clerks. It is a re-arragement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Register of the Treasury:

For compensation of the Register of the Treasury, $4,000; assistant register, $2,250; four clerks of class four; six clerks of class three; ten clerks of class two; eight clerks of class one; six copyists, at $900 each; one messenger; and two laborers; in all, $51,630; and for the division of loans, namely: four clerks, at $1,800 each; four clerks of class four; eight clerks of class three; two clerks of class two; four clerks of class one; seventy-five copyists and counters, at $900 each; four messengers; and four laborers; in all, $106,340.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend by inserting after the word "dollars" in line 552 the words "one chief clerk, $2,000."

My attention has been called to the appropriation of last year for the Register of the Treasury. The compensation of the Register was fixed at the same amount as in this bill. There was also an assistant register at $2,000, as in this bill. The bill of last year provided for a chief clerk at $2,000. That chief clerk has been the disbursing clerk in that Department, and has been under bonds for $10,000. It is now proposed to do away wholly with that disbursing clerk. The duties of this clerk must be performed by somebody. It will be necessary to have that duty performed by a clerk of class four. That chief clerk last year had $2,000. The clerk of class four who will be detailed to act as disbursing clerk will receive under this bill a compensation of $1,600, and will of course not be under bonds.

Now it seems to me very poor policy to take away an office so important as this, an officer who is under bonds—an important requirement for securing the faithful discharge of the duties of the office. I hope, after the very large reductions which have been made, this disbursing clerk will be restored to the Register of the Treasury; for it will be observed that there is an important difference between the appropriations of last year and those proposed in this bill. Last year we provided for seven clerks of class four; here we provide for four. Then we appropriated for ten clerks of class three; in this bill we appropriate for only six. The reductions in this office amount to some 33 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WILLARD,] who saw fit to compliment the Committee on Appropriations so much that he elicited a faint cheer on the other side, I want to ask him whether it is enough for this House to come here and spend the entire session in cutting down a little in the appropriations of this Government? Is this all the revolution promised the country? Were we to get nothing more from a democratic triumph than a 10 per cent. reduction of salaries? There has been no bill yet presented from the other side for the revival of industry. There has been no proposition to give labor a better reward than it had under a republican administration. There has been no bill presented to restore commerce or to benefit manufactures. It is a very small consolation to a man who stands on the street-corner with his hands in his pockets, without an hour's work to do, with starvation staring him in the face, to tell him, "My friend, I can tell you how you can live on thirty-six cents a day while it now costs you forty cents." That is not the question. The man cares but little how he may live on a few cents less per day unless, perchance, you give him an opportunity to work. Now, the country will not be satisfied with your simple cutting off 10 per cent. in official salaries. I say to the democratic majority here that superadded to this retrenchment there must be some affirmative measures for a revival of the business of the country. It will be a cheap argument in the campaign to talk of the little reductions you have made, amid the starving laborers of the country for whose benefit you have done nothing and about which you have talked so much.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota who has just taken his seat what measures the republican party inaugurated to relieve the suffering interests of the country during its long lease of office. The party he represents has been in power for the last fifteen years, and from the legislation of that party the great material interests of the country have not received any benefit. Does he expect that during this one session of Congress we can initiate and complete measures that will at once relieve the people? As much as can be done will be done.

Mr. DUNNELL. If the democratic party in this House lets this session go——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I do for a moment.

Mr. DUNNELL. If this long session of Congress shall not be sufficient for this democratic House of Representatives to take the first step toward a revival of business, how long, O, how long, do you think the people will wait for you to take that first step?

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Well, now, that is enough.

Mr. DUNNELL. One word; the gentleman is not quite answered. It was said by democrats some two years ago they only needed to reach this House and reforms would take place and there would be a revival of business. You had a bill here to repeal the resumption act, and yet your party allowed it to be slaughtered. You have a tariff bill here which is an insult to the laboring masses of the country.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Not so, sir.

Mr. DUNNELL. It has not one redeeming feature in it.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Now, that is enough. I do not yield any longer. This country is now suffering because of the extravagance of administration which obtained during the long possession of office by the republican party. To say upon the floor of this House that we can legislate here in regard to finance or tariff and revive the drooping industries of the country is to say what the facts will not bear out. What has finance, what has the tariff to do with the immediate revival of the depressed and suffering industrial interests? We have to go back to simpler habits, to retrench and reform, to travel the tiresome road back to good government; we have, however repulsive it may be to gentlemen on the other side, to retrench, to economize, to save the people from taxation; and to that end this democratic House of Representatives is exerting its very best endeavors. I believe in carrying out the policy which it has inaugurated we will not only have the best results for the Government, but we will secure the hearty approval of the people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I move to strike out the last word.

I do not desire to trespass long upon the time of the committee, but I trust my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] and my friend from Vermont, [Mr. JOYCE,] who sits near me, will not be too severe with our friends on the other side of the House. They are good-natured gentlemen, and they have their tribulations. I have thought myself this treatment was a little topical. The true physician deals with the seat of the disease and leaves nature to work the cure. Real statesmanship deals with fundamental laws and trusts to logical results. I may here inquire if $5,000 per annum was too much for a member of Congress to live on in Washington, with the incidental expenses attached to his office? Our friends have replied, "Whether it is or not, if we cut down these clerks' salaries upon an arbitrary reduction of 10 or 20 per cent., we ought to cut down our own." I think their position is a sound one, and I propose to stand by them on that theory, but I have thought it would be a little more logical first to inquire whether it is proper to cut down the salaries of these laboring and faithful clerks to begin with.

But our friends on the other side reply, "It is hard times, the people are in distress; members can afford to put in $500 each; these poor clerks can put in $100 each, and thus relieve the country!" I can understand how the principle of prudence and economy should be preserved in the public service and how this amounts to statesmanship; but will you dip up the flood with a pail and make no effort to find the source of the torrent? Will you seek to restore prosperity to this country by taking contributions from a few poor clerks, while public charity relieves their pinching wants? Is political favor to be purchased in this wise? However, our friends have had their trials sore and severe. They are not unlike the two terror-stricken boys in the boat when the storm overcast the sky and a crash of lightning seemed to split the very dome of the heavens. One said to the other, "Bob, can you pray?" "No, Jim; can you?" "No." "Well, by mighty, Jim, it's time to do something religious. Suppose we take up a collection." [Laughter.] So with our democratic friends; they are out in thick weather. For fifteen years they have clamored for power, and for fifteen years their statesmanship has been broken on the wheel of every vital issue which came before the country. Finally they came in, with a grand flourish, for "civil-service reform;" and on the second day of the session they sent true and faithful public servants trooping down the hill for partisanship alone. They proposed a constitutional amendment limiting the tenure of office of the Executive; they tried finance, but the democratic team halted and balked; tariff was tried, but it lingers in committee, uncertain whether to live or die; they tried amnesty, and went all to pieces.

The lightning of discord has been seen to flash from face to face over there, and the rumble of discontent has run through that side of the Chamber; matters were becoming serious; something "religious" had to be done; something which seldom fails in a political stress of weather; so they said, "Let us take up a contribution from the poor, hard-worked, half-starved clerks." [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I will ask for no further time now, and withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, withdrew his formal amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL's amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Comptroller of the Currency:

For Comptroller of the Currency, $4,500; deputy comptroller, $2,250; two principal clerks, at $2,000 each; six clerks of class four; ten clerks of class three; eight clerks of class two; eight clerks of class one; twenty-five clerks, at $900 each; two messengers; two laborers; in all, $80,470; and for expenses of the national currency, namely: one superintendent, at $2,200; one teller and one book-keeper, at $2,000 each, and one assistant book-keeper, at $1,800; fifteen clerks, at $900 each; and one messenger; in all, $22,340.

Mr. RANDALL. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to submit the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 565, strike out "2" where it occurs a second time and insert "5," and strike out "and 50" in the same line; so the bill will read, "deputy comptroller, $2,500," and make the total $22,590.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, to strike out "$500" and insert "$700;" so as to make the salary of the deputy comptroller $2,700.

My reasons for offering this amendment I will explain as briefly as possible. The present salary of this officer is $3,000. The bill as it now reads would reduce it to $2,250, about 25 per cent.; but the chairman of the committee proposes to make it $2,500, which is about 16 per cent. reduction. This officer has always been considered as entitled to more salary than the other deputy comptrollers. For instance, the salaries of the deputy comptrollers of the Treasury were fixed under the Kellogg re-organization at $2,800. This bill places their salaries at $2,600. The committee in their bill propose to reduce the salary of the first deputy comptroller of the Treasury about 7½ per cent. The present proposition of the chairman of the committee is to reduce the salary of the deputy comptroller of the currency about 15 or 16 per cent. I think, sir, there is here a clear case of injustice. This deputy comptroller is required to give a bond of $50,000, whereas the first deputy comptroller of the Treasury is not required to give any bond. The duties he performs are quite onerous, and I ask the chairman of the committee to agree to my amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Before what is known as the Kellogg re-organization the salary of this office was $2,500, the amount named in my amendment. The members of the committee around me, however, are willing to make the salary the same as those of the deputy comptrollers of the Treasury, $2,600.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I will agree to that.

Mr. RANDALL. I am aware that he is a very efficient officer.

The amendment, as modified by inserting $2,600, was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following amendment:

In line 564, strike out "$4,500" and insert "$5,000;" so that it will read: "For Comptroller of the Currency, $5,000."

Mr. Chairman, the Comptroller of the Currency is the head of the whole currency system of the country. He has a very large responsibility. He has the management and care of twenty-two hundred and eighty banks. He has to see that they are properly managed, and their reserves kept in proper order and to a proper amount. He must watch over the bank examiners who take charge of the banks in the different parts of the country and ascertain whether or not they are solvent, and he has also the charge of winding up all the banks that may fail, amounting to thirty or forty at the present time. He gives security to the amount of $100,000, and has had the charge of the national currency, amounting to $1,623,000,000, received, issued, and destroyed, since 1864. He has the care of as much currency and of as many accounts probably as the Treasurer of the United States, who gets a salary of $6,000. Under these circumstances I think it but right and proper that this officer should be allowed a salary of $5,000, which he has had heretofore. I trust the Committee on Appropriations will be willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. That would be doing injustice to all the other heads; and besides I do not think that the duties of the office warrant the distinction or exception that is sought to be made in favor of this officer.

The amendment of Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, was not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following amendment:

In line 565 strike out "2" and insert "4;" so that it will read: "Four principal clerks, at $2,000 each."

Mr. Chairman, there are now four heads of divisions in the Bureau of Currency, and I want to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to the work of this Department. As I understand, the committee have not been to that Department at all, and have made no inquiry of the Comptroller of the Currency as to the number of clerks that were necessary to carry on that Department, or the character of the services they have rendered.

As one of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I have been making some inquiry in regard to this matter. The duties of these chiefs of divisions are exceedingly important. There are four of them. This bill proposes to cut down the number to two.

Two of these have charge of the large amount of national-bank notes which is received from the engravers for issue and also that which is returned by the banks for destruction. The total amount of such currency since June 20, 1874, has been nearly $624,000,000, and the monthly average $32,800,000. The amount of such circulation issued and counted in the office since 1869 has largely increased, as will be seen by the table inclosed, the amount during the last fiscal year being $411,000,000. Two vaults are in charge of these two heads of divisions, containing in the aggregate more than $70,000,000 of national-bank notes. Then there is another chief of division, who has charge of the reports which come from the banks, and he receives more than seventeen thousand reports annually, which are carefully examined and have to be tabulated, and more than ten thousand letters are annually transmitted from this division to the national banks.

Then there is another chief of division who has charge of the organization of these banks and of the correspondence relative thereto. He ascertains whether such banks are organized in accordance with law; receives and examines the lists of stockholders and oaths of directors; reduces and increases the capital stock of banks; receives reports on dividends; prepares the tables and reads the proof of the reports of the banks for the Comptroller's annual report, containing six hundred pages; and examines the accounts and reports of receivers of national banks.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I ask, therefore, that these four chiefs of division shall be allowed to remain. It is a matter of great importance to the efficient working of the Department. The table referred to is as follows:

Statement of national currency received from engravers, issued to banks, together with the amount returned and destroyed, during each fiscal year ending June 30, from 1864 to 1875; also showing the number of banks organized.

Year.	Banks organized.	Received.	Issued.	Returned and destroyed.	Total.
1864	470	$41,365,000	$31,235,270	.....	$72,600,270
1865	1,370	138,773,950	115,171,455	.....	253,945,405
1866	1,653	130,722,565	135,787,565	$329,022	266,839,152
1867	1,671	16,224,875	20,804,436	3,621,775	40,651,086

Total	.....	708,374,913	638,886,580	276,024,428	1,623,285,921

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania does the committee injustice if he thinks we have not examined as to this Bureau. I cannot consent to the amendment, because the committee think there are too many chiefs of divisions there now, and believe that the service can be performed by two as well as by four.

The amendment of Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, was not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I offer another amendment.

In line 566 strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,160;" so that it will read: "two principal clerks, at $2,160 each."

Mr. Chairman, that will be exactly in accordance with the principle laid down by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to reduce these clerkships 10 per cent. The bill reduces them from $2,400 to $2,000. I ask now to make the amount $2,160 so as to come within the principle laid down by the chairman. I trust, therefore, he will have no objection to that.

Mr. RANDALL. I oppose the amendment and ask for a vote.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following amendment:

In line 566 after the word "each" insert "one stenographer, $1,800."

Mr. Chairman, since the organization of the Department there has been a stenographer allowed to it for the purpose of taking down from the lips of the Comptroller of the Currency replies to the letters which are to be answered, letters which have to be sent out daily to the amount of one hundred to the different banks of the country; and there are stenographers allowed to several of the other Departments which need them no more than this one; and unless this stenographer be allowed the Comptroller of the Currency will be at a great loss to get through with his work. I trust the chairman will have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. My own judgment is that there are too many stenographers employed about these Departments.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. It is a matter of absolute necessity that this officer should have a stenographer. He will not be able to get along with the business in his Department without him.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a new feature to employ stenographers in the service of the Government. They used to get along very well without any.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. The Government had not one-half the business to do before these stenographers were appointed.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee struck it out, and we knew what we were about.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman have any conversation with the Comptroller about it?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I think we knew all about it without any conversation with him.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to strike out the last word. I desire to say that if a stenographer is needed anywhere in any Department of the Government it is in this very place, and he will have to be continued; if he be not, a clerk will have to be detailed for that purpose. I desire to say that I do not make any factious opposition to the bill, as the majority have determined to carry it through as it is. I wish, however, to put on record my statement, so far as this Department is concerned, and many others which we have passed, that if this bill becomes a law the business of the country will be seriously embarrassed.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say in reply to that, that there has been very little complaint from any Department against reductions. They have come around gracefully to a re-arrangement.

Mr. FOSTER. That statement ought not to go out to the country in that shape. There is a complaint from all these Departments. They met us generously, and they proposed reductions themselves; but I want to say that not one of the gentlemen from the Treasury Department was called to appear before us. We have made up the bill in committee without the knowledge necessary to make it up. I think the reduction is too large. I agree in some of these reductions, but I believe, if my judgment is good for anything at all, that the Departments will be seriously embarrassed if the bill is passed in its present form.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not expect the gentleman from Ohio to fall in with everything that we have done; but I would like to have him read the speech he made on the day this bill was introduced, when he declared that the bill in the main met with the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. I repeat what I said on that day, that the minority of the committee would offer amendments amounting to one and a half million of dollars, and with that adddition I believed that the efficiency of the Departments might be preserved.

Mr. RANDALL. All the amendments that you have offered have not amounted to $50,000 or $60,000.

Mr. FOSTER. It is useless and fruitless for us to offer amendments; we know that the bill is to be put through under the whip and spur, and the opposition that was shown the other night satisfied us that no amendments could be made to the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. They led us up into the mountain and showed us the possessions of the world. But we stand here knowing that this bill is right.

Mr. CONGER. Why did not the gentleman lead us up there, then?

Mr. RANDALL. Because the other side wanted to do it for me.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I renew it. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what is the average number of letters per day to which the Comptroller of the Currency is obliged to dictate answers himself?

Mr. RANDALL. Well, he sends out the same letter to two thousand banks, and he sends them out in print.

Mr. HOAR. That is not my question. My question is, what is the average number of letters per day the Comptroller has to answer?

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Massachusetts can get that exactly by going to the Department.

Mr. FOSTER. Why did not you go?

Mr. RANDALL. I have not done so.

Mr. HOAR. I have heard a dozen, twenty, or thirty amendments proposed, and gentlemen who have proposed them have stated what seem to be good reasons—at any rate they are reasons stated as arguments showing that something is necessary. The bill will tend to embarrass the Departments. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has three answers only to make; one is that the committee have considered it very fully, another is the committee are confident, and the third is that they are right.

We hardly ever get an answer from the gentleman indicating that he either knows or cares what the facts are on which the proposed change of the law should have been based.

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer that.

Mr. HOAR. Here is a proposition on which the members of this House are to vote. I am perfectly aware that if the Committee on Appropriations have examined the subject great weight is due to their judgment. But it is disrespectful to this House, it is a thing new in this House, and in the relation of the Committee on Appropriations to its own party, for that committee to come in here and say: We will not tell you what our reasons are; we will not tell you what the facts are; we have looked into this matter, or we have not looked into it, but we choose to have it so, and you must swallow it.

Now, as to this matter of the Comptroller of the Currency, my friend from Pennsylvania on my left here, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who has moved this amendment, is one of the most candid and thorough men in this House, as I have no doubt the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will admit. He is a man as free from partisan influences or the influences of other minds as any man who has served the country for a generation, and that gentleman, thoroughly familiar as he is with the currency and finance of this country, more so certainly than any other man on our side of the House, gets up here and says that the Comptroller of the Currency has to carry on a correspondence embracing a great number of letters. Now, I think we have the right [here the hammer fell] to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether that be so, and, if it be so—[Here the hammer fell.] Am I to understand that the tap of that hammer means that my time is out?

The CHAIRMAN. The five minutes of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair should make that announcement. We cannot always tell what the tap of the hammer means.

Mr. RANDALL. I stated when this bill was brought in that one of its principal features was a reduction of 20 per cent. of the force in the Departments, and that we proposed to have the force in the Departments work the number of hours now required by law; that is, eight hours a day during six months of the year and ten hours a day during the other six months.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me——

Mr. RANDALL. Do not interrupt me.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to ask a question.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state to the House some fact or consideration by means of which we can judge whether this officer needs a stenographic clerk or not?

Mr. RANDALL. When we applied this 20 per cent. of reduction to the force, we at the same time, as the gentleman can ascertain by calculation, secured more work by an increase of the hours of service than is now had with 100 per cent. of the force and only six hours a day of service, which is the basis upon which the estimates are made; for, mark you, these estimates are made up on the basis of six hours a day. Four months ago some of the Departments increased the hours of daily work by their clerks to seven.

I desire now to say to gentlemen, and I appeal to the members of the Committee on Appropriations on the other side of the House, that this bill has had nearly two months' of careful and close study and consideration, night and day, by the Committee on Appropriations. There is not an item in it that has not been scanned and discussed in the committee. I therefore say that we have not cut down the number of clerks in these Departments so as in the least degree to produce any friction in those Departments, in my opinion or in the opinion of the majority of the committee.

Mr. HURLBUT. The gentleman has not answered the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] about a stenographer in this Bureau.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment, and move to strike out the last two words. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] in addition to the three speeches which I recited a few moments ago, now makes a new one: that all this bill has had the careful attention and consideration of the committee; that they worked over it for two months. He is very much in the condition of that celebrated Roman advocate who was engaged in a small case, and, after spending some hours in talking about the building of Rome, Romulus and Remus, Mars and Rhea, was finally asked by his client, "Are you not going to say something about my pigs?" I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, are you not going to say something about whether this Comptroller of the Currency needs a stenographic clerk or not? That is the amendment now before the committee. If you have worked over this bill two months, day and night, if you have examined every item in it, then you must know the reason for striking out the stenographic clerk of the Comptroller of the Currency.

That matter has nothing whatever to do with the question whether you should cut down salaries 10 per cent. or not; it has nothing to do with the question whether the force of clerks may be reduced or not, or whether the clerks should work four hours a day or eight hours a day. The gentleman from Pennsylvania on my left, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who knows the subject thoroughly, who never made a partisan utterance or gave a partisan vote in his life, gets up here and tells you that there is a great mass of correspondence with the national banks, and that this stenographic clerk is needed to enable the Comptroller to properly conduct that correspondence. We want to be able to judge whether that is so or not. We want to know whether that is a correspondence which would require the head of the office to dictate his letter to a stenographic clerk instead of the slow and laborious process of writing the letters himself.

Now it is no answer to say that thirty years ago his predecessor did not have a stenographic clerk. Years ago we did not have railroads or telegraphs or any decent system of short-hand; there was no such thing as stenography then. What we want to know (I hope the gentleman from Indiana, who generally does know something about things, will be able to tell us) is the reason that this clerk was struck out, and whether he ought to be put back?

Mr. HOLMAN. As this stenographer seems to be so vital to the proper management of that office, will the gentleman inform us when this position was first created?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I can answer that question.

Mr. HOAR. Who has said anything about that?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is just as pertinent as the question you are pressing.

Mr. HOAR. O, no. I have not said anything about whether this office is vital or not. I say it is not my business to find out that fact for this House; it is the business of the Committee on Appropriations. That is the very thing I am asking the chairman or somebody else to tell us. It is not a good answer to say "We have spent two months on this bill, and we will not tell you what the fact is; you must tell us." That is the very thing we are complaining of.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts must know that this Bureau has never had a stenographer until two or three years ago; it is a new office.

Mr. HOAR. But was it introduced for a good reason or a bad reason?

Mr. HOLMAN. It was introduced for convenience; certainly it is convenient enough to have such an officer. But the gentleman from Massachusetts must know that a large number of clerks are competent to exercise that art. There is scarcely a Department in which you will not find sixteen-hundred-dollar clerks amply competent to perform that duty. No Bureau is going to suffer from a reduction of this kind. This office is a new feature entirely, and may be very well dispensed with.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I desire to answer the query of the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend by striking out the last word. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] inquires when a stenographer was first introduced into the Currency Bureau. The Comptroller of the Currency told me to-day that the stenographer has been employed ever since the organization of the Bureau.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not the gentlemen tell me under what law?

Mr. RANDALL. There was no appropriation for it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I understand all that. This officer may not appear in the law as a stenographer; but a clerk was always detailed for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is just what we supposed; that there was no law for it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I want to go one step further. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has told us that the number of clerks and the salaries have been reduced 10 per cent.; but when you take up this bill you find that the clerks in the Department of the Comptroller of the Currency have been reduced from ninety-five to sixty-five in number—a reduction of about 30 per cent.—and the amount of compensation of clerks has been reduced from $126,000 to $80,000—a reduction of over 30 per cent. More than that, not a single member of the Committee on Appropriations has been within the walls of the Department of the Comptroller of the Currency from the time this bill was begun until the present day.

Mr. HOLMAN. How do you know that?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. The Comptroller told me so. They have not asked for any information. They have just taken their own judgment for it; and, as I said in my first speech, wherever they saw a head they hit it, like the Irishman at Donnybrook fair. They are endeavoring to-day, as if they had a hatred of the national-banking system, to cripple the Department of the Currency.

The Comptroller of the Currency says that unless this amount of clerical force is allowed to him it will be impossible for him to carry on that Department with satisfaction to the country and with justice to the system. I trust the majority of this House will have strength enough and manliness enough to vote to continue the force of the Comptroller of the Currency as it stands at present, and not curtail it according to the programme of the committee. I trust my amendment will pass.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am in general sympathy with this bill and have voted for nearly all its reductions. But in respect to the Comptroller of the Currency, I cannot conceal from myself, and I feel that I ought to give utterance to the fact, that the compensation is unsuitable for the position. If the occupant of the position is worthy of it and competent to perform its duties, I do not hesitate to say that the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations will ascertain that $4,500 is not a fit salary for that officer. No first-class commercial establishment in the country, doing one-hundreth part of the business which that Department is required to supervise, would dare, even in these times, to ask a competent man to accept $4,500 for the performance of the duty.

I have no hesitation in saying that anything like a proper investigation in respect to the salaries paid by our banks, by our insurance companies, by our commercial establishments, would show incontestably that to reduce this salary is wrong—wrong in principle and wrong toward the occupant of the position, assuming that he is competent, as I believe him to be.

No man realizes more than I do the necessity of reducing salaries, of cutting down compensation, of removing all sinecures, and in every possible way setting an example on the part of the Government of economy and prudence. But, sir, (if I may properly bring my own experience here,) I have myself paid year after year $5,000 to a man who was in no wise competent to fill this position; and in the city where my home is I can point to a hundred men receiving $4,000 to $5,000, in responsible positions in banks and insurance offices, who would not esteem themselves competent to fill that place. My judgment is that the Comptroller will not occupy it at your price. He ought not to. I should be sorry if his circumstances would not permit him to resent it. And I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to reconsider this question. The Comptroller of the Currency occupies a position which very properly removes him above the large class of subordinates. It is a position of the very highest importance, and is worthy even in these times of more than $4,500 per annum with or without a stenographer to assist him.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment to the amendment now pending, and debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, when we examine the report recently made by the Comptroller of the Currency it is not surprising gentlemen in favor of national banks insist that officer should have a high salary, for he has done them great service in that report. It is more in defense of the national-bank system than a fair report of the affairs of these institutions.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I would not object to paying a large salary to a man who would execute and carry out the duties of his office, but I appeal to those gentleman here who are urging this gentleman's salary should be increased—I ask them to point out a single case where the Comptroller of the Currency has attempted to carry out the provisions of the national-banking law in regard to interest. That law provides national banks shall be entitled to such rate of interest as is legal in the States where the banks are located, in the absence of any contract.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be better order in the House, so we can hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I say, sir, the national-banking law provides the banks shall be entitled to such rate of interest as is legal in the States where they are located, in the absence of any contract. In my State the legal rate of interest in the absence of contract is 6 per cent., but the national banks get from 10 to 12, and I know of no instance where the Comptroller of the Currency has attempted to enforce the law. Yet he is acting under oath. He takes an oath to see the law is faithfully executed, and the people have been paying him for his services. I insist the national banks should pay that gentleman for his service, inasmuch as they get all of his service and the people get none.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to make any factious opposition to this bill, but I believe that for the proper dispatch of public business and in the interests of true economy the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to prevail.

I know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, said a little while ago that we had no stenographers in our Departments. That is very true, sir; but I say to him a little while ago there were none known in our courts and none known in our law offices, and yet at the present time there is hardly a respectable law office in the country where there is not a stenographer employed in it for the dispatch of business. Depositions are oftentimes taken by stenographers, taking down the questions and answers so as not to detain professional men, and afterward written out.

I believe this office to be an office in the interest of the people of the country notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS.] I believe it is important to have a Comptroller of the Currency at the present time. I believe he has a large amount of business to do, and I think he ought as a matter of justice to have a stenographer.

It is no argument to say that we ought not to do this because a little while ago we had no stenographers in any of the Departments. A little while ago we had no railroads, we had no telegraphs, we had none of a great many things which the progress of the age has given to us as a people and a country. I believe in the interest of a true economy and for the proper dispatch of public business. As I have already remarked, it is important that this officer at least should have a stenographer.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this paragraph.

Mr. CONGER. I have the right to oppose the amendment for five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I will give the gentleman five minutes when we get again into committee.

Mr. CONGER. I do not think there is any need for rising.

Mr. RANDALL'S motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move that debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be closed in five minutes on the pending paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, debate on the pending amendment is limited to five minutes.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, modest a man as I am, I did not demand the committee should rise to go into the House for the purpose of making an order that I should have five minutes. I only want to say a word or two in the interest of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I want to rebuke and reprove in my feeble way some of my friends on this side of the House for their factious opposition to this committee. It seems as if gentlemen were unwilling to understand, or if they did understand, unwilling to apply the rule which the chairman of the committee has stated fifty-three times within the last three nights, that the rule of that committee, adopted by them after solemn consultation, after three months of arduous labor and patient investigation, was that all salaries should be cut down in these Departments 10 per cent., and the force of laborers and clerks should be cut down 20 per cent.

Now, for some cause, whether from negligence or from carelessness, I know not which, the chairman of the committee has failed to explain in regard to this stenographer why he is cut out, why this particular stenographer of the Comptroller of the Currency is removed. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows why it is, and he or the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] ought to have answered the question long before this time. But as neither of those gentlemen will give that answer to the House, let me tell the reason.

Sir, there are one hundred stenographers in the Treasury Department. Under the old rule that number were employed in one and another of these Bureaus and offices satisfactorily to the Department. And it was thought they were necessary to the Government. But under this wise, prudent, judicious, mathematical rule of reducing 20 per cent. of the force, it was necessary—cannot the House feel it?—that twenty of them should be removed. Where is the intelligence of this side of the House that they cannot see so plain a mathematical proposition as that? [Laughter.] I am ashamed of my colleagues here, [laughter,] for they have been told so often by the chairman of the committee what the rule was, and the propriety of it, and when that statement has been enforced with all the careful, cautious, and shrewd explanations of the gentleman from Indiana, than whom no better expositor of so grand a rule as this lifts his voice in this House. With a reduction of 20 per cent. of the force, what will be the reduction on one hundred stenographers? Surely my friends on this side never went so far as the rule of three. It is clear that twenty stenographers must be removed. And they are removed by lot, as we draw our seats here, and the lot fell on the Comptroller, and his stenographer is removed. I submit to my friends here that it is time to stop this paltry quibbling with the mathematical proposition of the committee. It is time for us to stop if we would stand well before the eyes of the great American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, one word of personal explanation. Mr. Chairman, if you were upon this floor to exhibit this matter with all the grace and beauty of language in which you can do so, I would not have attempted it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, there were—ayes 83, nays 103.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Commissioner of Internal Revenue:

For Commissioner of Internal Revenue, $5,500; one deputy commissioner, $3,200; seven clerks, at $2,250 each; one stenographer, at $1,800; twenty clerks of class four; thirty clerks of class three; forty clerks of class two; twenty clerks of class one; sixty clerks, at $900 each; four messengers and ten laborers; in all, $242,310

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following amendment:

In line 583 strike out the word "clerks" and insert in lieu thereof the words "heads of divisions;" so that it will read: "seven heads of divisions, at $2,250 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer the following amendment:

In line 585 strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-five;" so that it will read: "twenty-five clerks of class four."

Mr. Chairman, I would consider myself derelict in duty if I did not call the attention of the House to the very large reduction of force that is made in the Office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I know something about the duties of that office and what it has to accomplish. I have given it especial attention, and I undertake to say that there is no Department in the Government anywhere that possesses the confidence of all the people to the same extent as the head of that Department. I think that this committee has unlimited confidence in the head of that Department as well as in his aids and chiefs.

We have made a reduction here in force amounting to fifteen or twenty clerks more than the Department say they can possibly stand. They met us cordially. They met us in the spirit of reform. They met us in the spirit of economy. And they say that if fifteen clerks can be added to their force they will be satisfied. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue and his aids and chiefs all say that with the force we give them it is impossible to successfully run this Department. They collect $120,000,000 of revenue this year, and any lack of sufficient force in any branch of the Department may cost us ten times or one hundred times more than we undertake to save by this reduction. I put this amendment on the broad ground that taking their statement, which, in my judgment, was corroborated by a careful examination of the facts, you certainly injure the working force of that Department if you make the reduction proposed in the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Ohio states what is true, that we had the fullest conference with the officers of this Department; and I had supposed that in the arrangement of the clerks we had met their views, or at least we had met the views of the head officer of that Bureau; and I still think that he is not seriously opposed to the reduction that we have made in his Bureau. I know that subsequently, some days afterward, a letter was prepared in the Department and signed by the chief of that Department, asking for an increase. Whether it was to the extent that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio provides or not I do not know. But it is my opinion and the opinion of the majority of the committee—and we gave several nights' diligent study to this matter—that the force provided in the bill is adequate. And I believe that if you will ask Mr. Pratt straight up and down whether it is not so, he will say that it is.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has he said so to you?

Mr. RANDALL. I know that he signed the letter which has been referred to. But subsequently to the receipt of that letter I saw Mr. Pratt, and he met me just in the spirit which the gentleman from Ohio has described, and said he would undertake to run the Bureau upon the force provided for, as I understood him, in this bill.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I move to strike out the last word.

I do not desire to cripple the operations of this Department of the Government, because I conceive it to be a very important one; but I believe they have been very derelict in their duty. I have before me the Revised Statutes, and if I rightly interpret the section there has been a greater loss to the people of this country than all your whisky frauds, and it comes to us by reason of not having the institutions to which it alludes conform to the law. I call the attention of the learned gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] who is a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, to this fact, and ask him whether the committee has taken into consideration this section of the Revised Statutes?

SEC. 3408. A tax of one-twelfth of 1 per cent. each month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or person, including as circulation all certified checks and all notes and other obligations calculated or intended to circulate or to be used as money; but not including that in the vault of the bank, or redeemed and on deposit for said bank; and an additional tax of one-sixth of 1 per cent. each month upon the average amount of such circulation, issued as aforesaid, beyond the amount of 90 per cent. of the capital of any such bank, association, corporation, company, or person.

Now, I presume that the learned gentleman from Massachusetts understands what a certified check is. If you keep an account in your bank and you take A, B, or C's check to that bank and get it certified, it is charged to the party who draws it and becomes circulation, and you have never enforced that section of the law. I will say to you further that that section of the law, as I interpret, it has not been enforced in regard to certified checks.

Now I call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to that section of the Revised Statutes, and I would like to have the report of the Committee on the Judiciary upon it.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York. I should not have risen except to correct a statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. If I understood him correctly, he made the statement that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is satisfied with the bill as it stands.

Mr. RANDALL. Did he not say that to us in the committee?

Mr. FOSTER. No, sir; he did not. I want to tell the gentleman where he made his mistake. When we went through the bill we left twenty-eight clerks of class four, and the bill only provides for twenty clerks of class four; we left him thirty-five clerks of class three, and the bill only allows thirty; we left him forty clerks of class two, and the bill allows thirty, making a difference of ten; not as I understand the number agreed upon by the committee. I called upon Mr. Pratt and his associates and asked if it was possible for them to agree to it, and they said that if we would add four messengers they would agree to it. The bill allows ten clerks less than the memorandum I took to the Commissioner. The Commissioner says that we allow him ten clerks too few, and he cannot do the work with the number as proposed by the committee.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word. I desire to say a word in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the importance of giving this Bureau a sufficient force to do the work. Members of the present House who were members of the last Congress will recollect that we changed the method of assessing the revenue, we repealed the law providing for assessments, and provided that returns should be made directly to the office, and the office work that was formerly done by assistant assessors and by assessors should be performed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the clerks under his charge. We did not then give him the force that the last Commissioner thought was necessary. He said, however, that he would try to get along with that force. We put it at a less number then than we thought it could be done by effectually and as it ought to be done.

Now this is a very important matter. We collect two-fifths of the revenues through the internal-revenue system, and we do it more cheaply than we collect the revenue from customs.

We employ twice as many men, at least, as the Internal Revenue Department does. This business is scattered through the whole territory of the United States. Why, I had occasion to look up the number of States in which there were located distillers and brewers. There are four thousand distillers, including fruit-distillers, and some six hundred registered distillers scattered through every State and Territory of this Union. These collectors, representing this Department, must make their returns to the Internal Revenue Bureau, and I believe it would be a mistake if we should attempt to cripple the force that is necessary, and thus diminish the efficiency of the service of the Revenue Department. The Commissioner, who I know is in the interest of economy as has been represented, recommended the reduction himself, has made reductions in the force and in the number of districts to the amount of 20 per cent., and who favored every reduction made in the interest of economy—if he says to the committee that he ought to have the force proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] I think he ought to have it.

Mr. BLOUNT. A great deal has been said about the reduction of this force which I think is entirely unnecessary. If it was a simple reduction of numbers I could conceive where a great embarrassment would occur, but if the gentleman will take the pains to make a calculation of the hours added to the service required under this bill as compared with former laws, he will find the same working force there as now.

Now, sir, previous to this time it is well known that the working time in the Department was only six hours a day; but just before Congress convened an additional hour of service was added.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Does the gentleman suppose that clerks or other persons can work as efficiently at mental labor, at clerical labor, if you confine them for eight hours as if confined for a less period? In other words, if you increase the period of time of labor involved in mathematical calculations, can they do proportionately as much more as the time is increased?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not assume that every man in the Department is engaged constantly every hour in mathematical calculations; there is a great deal of labor there that is merely clerical. For that reason I think the gentleman is entirely in error in his supposition. I conceive that they are perfectly capable of performing eight hours' labor. We here work that much every day, and some days far beyond that, and a very different class of labor.

I hope the House will not increase the force allowed by this bill one iota. The Committee on Appropriations have carefully considered the several parts of this bill. If you take it up and make the calculation, you will see that we have provided for the same amount of service that we had before, by increasing the hours of labor. It is time that these people began to work. It is well known that there have been drones about these Departments. Who has not gone there and found men idle? Who will undertake to deny that in each one of these Departments there is an amount of force far beyond what the necessities of the service require? I will say this: that there is not a single officer of the Departments who has been before the committee but what has made that concession. No matter what else he may have complained about, he has conceded that there has been an overgrowth of force in the Departments. If that be true, and if we have provided the same amount of service by increasing the number of hours of labor for each day, notwithstanding the reduction in the amount of force, how can the gentleman make any complaint?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew the amendment to the amendment. I desire to address myself for a moment to the majority of this House, to their judgment and sense of right, in one particular. In the first place, I desire to ask them if they assume that this bill brought in by the Committee on Appropriations is absolutely perfect and that no suggestion that can be made on this side of the House is worthy of consideration? I believe it has been the practice here for many, many years to treat this bill and the other great appropriation bills as business propositions, to be considered on grounds of business propriety. During the four years that I had the honor of being the chairman of that committee I felt that I was bound to give a reason, a fair reason, that would satisfy both sides of the House, on mere matters of business, before I could sustain a change in the existing laws.

I want to say to our friends on the other side of the House that this singular spectacle has been presented night after night during the consideration of this bill. When gentlemen of long experience, members of the Committee on Appropriations, have arisen in their places and stated that here was what they regarded as a very serious crippling of a special interest, in reply to all they have said a mere general answer has been returned, as stated by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] and then we have seen the spectacle of a united party vote against the suggestion so made. We have just seen that spectacle in regard to the amendment to restore the stenographic clerk in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Now we have a new fact, and one which is to me a very startling one. An honorable member of the Committee on Appropriations rises in his place and says that in the particular paragraph now before us there has been a cutting down of ten clerks in the printed bill below what he understood was authorized by the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. He does not say that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly he does. My colleague from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations, has just made that very statement, in a speech of perhaps ten or fifteen minutes ago.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not without the authority of the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. He states that he made a careful memorandum upon his book of estimates of what the Committee on Appropriations had agreed to, and that with that memorandum he visited the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and asked him if he could get along with the proposed reduction as indicated by that memorandum. All his interviews and negotiations with the Commissioner were upon that basis. The gentleman now tells us that the printed bill shows a reduction of ten clerks in this Bureau below the number indicated by his memorandum, which memorandum was based upon what had been agreed upon in the committee. It may have been done by the committee, but if so it was without his knowledge. It may have been properly done by the committee in his absence. He does not charge that it was done surreptitiously; he only charges that it was done since he knew of the action of the committee.

No word of explanation is made to us for this change. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue says to my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] and to this House that this clause as proposed will cripple the collection of the internal revenue. The Commissioner is a man well known to gentlemen here on both sides of the House as a most honorable and worthy gentleman, [here the hammer fell,] and that he doubts whether under it he can properly collect the revenue. Now, will his representation be listened to, or will this proposition of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] be voted down by mere brute force of numbers?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. In answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] I will say to him that, so far as I am concerned and I believe those on this side of the House at least, it would be sufficient for us to rely upon the report of the Committee on Appropriations. I will say further that, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to believe that that report of the committee is absolutely perfect, for the reason that the members of that committee have been delegated by the Speaker, the organ of this House, to attend to certain duties. No one doubts that each member of that committee is an intelligent man, and that most of them have had large legislative experience in this House, the chairman having served here twelve years as a representative of the people. It is their business to investigate the matters properly belonging to their committee. When they make their report to this House, it is fair and proper to presume that they have done their duty faithfully and in the most intelligent manner. Sir, what do you or I or other gentlemen on this or the other side know individually of the matters which it has been the duty of this committee to investigate? It is not our business to go around and inquire how many clerks are necessary in this or that Department or whether this or that clerk is paid too much or too little. It is our duty, in the main at least, to be guided in our action by the reports of our committees. Why, sir, almost every motion that has been made from the other side of the House, (and I have been a silent observer; it is not my habit to participate in discussions like this)—almost every motion from that side has tended to contravene the proper business of legislation and to retard the work of reform.

The only sensible speeches which I have heard from that side of the House this evening have been made by two gentlemen who I believe come from the State of Michigan. One [Mr. WILLARD] said that he believed the interests of the people demanded economy and reform, and he commended the exertions of this committee as being in the right direction. The other [Mr. CONGER] impeached the intelligence of his side of the House, because gentlemen there could not understand the policy and the rule by which the committee had operated. [Laughter.] They were very sensible speeches; and I beg leave to pay my respectful homage to those gentlemen.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. The gentleman will please wait till I get through. Sir, everything coming from that side of the House seems to be (I say it in the best humor) actuated by a partisan purpose. When have we had from that side a proposition to diminish the number of clerks? When have we had a proposition to reduce the salary of a single clerk? No, sir, the propositions from that source look always to increasing the number of officers or enlarging salaries. Wherever our committee has seen proper to recommend that an official should be dispensed with, gentlemen on that side have always wanted him retained. Is that the economy and reform which their constituents as well as ours demand? Sir, let gentlemen on this side of the House march on to the motto of the noble Hampden, who struck for the liberties of the English people. Let us support our committee and vindicate the liberties of the American people. "No step backward!"

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last three words. What I am about to say may not be pertinent to the question of striking out those three words; but, sir, I feel as if it were my duty, having received the courteous attention of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JONES,] to repay it in kind.

Why, sir, to my utter astonishment, I find the leading Representative of that grand old State of Kentucky, which formerly in this House had a voice that led, controlled, and directed the whole country—led it by reason, argument, eloquence, logic, and affection—I find its leading Representative on this floor to-night standing in the presence of the American Congress and subscribing his subserviency to a committee, telling the American people that he knows nothing of these questions and is not expected to know anything of them himself, [laughter;] telling the American people that—representing as he does that grandest of all the old heroic States, who sent here in former days the grandest of all the statesmen that ever stood on this floor—he has come to a time in his history and in the history of his grand old State when it is enough for him to blindly follow the lead of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.] The time was when a representative of Kentucky had a will of his own, had knowledge of his own, had a voice of his own, and eloquence that thrilled the hearts of all who heard him. Ah, Mr. Chairman, I regret to believe that my friend from Kentucky, the gallant soldier of Kentucky, represents truly the subservient feelings of all his fellows on that side of the House.

The gentleman says he will follow blindly the lead of that committee. Does he do so? Why, sir, there is still ringing in my ears the gentle voice of my friend from New York, [Mr. J. H. BAGLEY,] who, leaving his associations on the republican side of the House and going over to have the countenance and sustaining spirit of his friends, ventured to make a recommendation for an increase of salary to the extent of only $200; and the gentleman from Kentucky followed his political friend in that motion, against the committee, who had already raised the salary to $2,600.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I did not understand the last remark of the gentleman. I would like him to repeat it.

Mr. CONGER. I say that the gentleman from New York—my brother democrat, Mr. BAGLEY, from New York, (if I may be allowed to name him)—left his associates and his seat on this side of the House and went over into the bosom of the democracy, and reposing there ventured to oppose the committee, and moved to raise still higher the salary of one of the deputy comptrollers; I do not know why; from a sense of justice doubtless; and not only the gentleman from Kentucky, but all his colleagues voted to raise that salary; and he even so far controlled that immaculate committee, which the gentleman says he will follow unshrinkingly, as to lead the chairman of the committee himself to give up $100 against his will! [Laughter.] It was a spectacle which, if it was not so very serious, we might have smiled at.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] for the eloquent tribute he has paid to the State I have the honor in part to represent, and, I admit, in a very humble manner. But the gentleman, I think, has wasted his eloquence on the desert air. Now I do not claim to be a leading representative of the State of Kentucky on this floor. I take it for granted, sir, that Kentucky can take care of herself, and each one of her Representatives, in my opinion, is able to take care of himself.

The gentleman has put words into my mouth which I never uttered. He quoted me as saying that I followed blindly the lead of the committee. I did not use the word "blindly;" not at all, sir. I said this Committee on Appropriations was composed of intelligent men who had duties to perform which it was utterly impossible for me to attend to, and I could not; and I ask the gentleman whether he could leave his place in this House, neglect his other duties, and go about inquiring into the duties of every committee appointed by the Speaker of this House? I could not do it, and it was utterly impossible for him to do it. The gentleman's proposition, therefore, is perfectly absurd.

I said, sir, that in the main it was enough for me to know our committees were composed of intelligent members whom I believe did their duty, and upon matters which did not come under my special observation it was enough for me to sustain their reports, and take them as true. And that must be the case with every man in this House. I have no doubt the gentleman has blindly followed the lead of his committees and always has done it. I do not consider his remarks worthy of any further reply.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, the committee will observe there have been various amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to the bill as originally reported. Now, these amendments—and I want the gentleman from Ohio to listen to this—these amendments almost uniformly have been suggested by gentlemen charged with the administration of the Departments, or by some gentleman of the committee who has had a conference with the heads of Departments. So we have not with unvarying precision adhered to the bill, but we have, in the spirit of trying to meet the Departments, so that no possible excuse can be made for the charge we mean to embarrass them, offered these amendments in the various places I have suggested, which amendments this committee have adopted. So much for the charge of tenacity on the part of the committee in adhering to its original theory. There have been a great number of amendments, some of which I have not approved myself, but which I have offered, and they have been introduced in the spirit I have said by order of the Committee on Appropriations so that no harm shall come to the administration of the Government. I now ask for a vote.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. Mr. Chairman, in justice to the committee I will say that the amendment was to correct a manifest error. I suppose the chairman would have made that amendment if I had not done so. I do not think the committee followed, except because it was a simple act of justice.

In relation to my leaving my seat on the other side, I will say I have pleasant companions there, and I have no disposition to make a change. I was located there as a victim of circumstances over which I had no control. I have no disposition to change. The gentleman who addressed the House and mentioned my name is an intimate friend of mine and my colleague on a committee, and a gentleman for whom I have great respect. I do not think he meant to do me injustice.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I did not understand the allusion the gentleman made. I did not hear the gentleman make his motion; I do not think I was present when the thing was done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the formal amendments have been withdrawn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to renew the amendment. I wish to complete what I failed to do in the five minutes I had. I have invited, and still desire to invite, the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the very serious statement of my colleague from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] in regard to the bill now before the House. If my colleague is correct in his understanding of it, this is not the bill agreed to by the committee so far as this particular Bureau is concerned. We are now to vote on continuing or maintaining a series of clauses not the agreement of the whole committee, but some subsequent change not yet explained.

And I wish to call attention to another thing while I am up. Last year on this special clause we are now acting on, the Committee on Appropriations asked the co-operation of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the Committee of Ways and Means appointed a subcommittee of two or three members, one my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] the other, the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Beck, not now in Congress, and whether there was a third member I do not now remember, but perhaps those two only constituted the subcommittee of the Committee of Ways and Means. They went earnestly through all the divisions of the Internal-Revenue Bureau to determine how far we might safely cut down the force and still not cripple the machine for collecting the internal revenue. A subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations made an independent examination, and, as the result of nearly two weeks' work of each subcommittee, we did then cut down a little more than Mr. Beck and the other member from the Committee of Ways and Means thought we ought to have done. Now, with so careful a work as was done on this special Bureau on last year by democrats and republicans alike, cutting down lower than the Bureau thought could safely be done, it is proposed this winter to cut down a great way lower, and, according to the statement of my colleague, the print of the bill has ten clerks lower than the committee itself agreed to. We are expected to vote for this without protest, and, if we make a protest, to have no answer except the general answer we have had.

Now I appeal to gentlemen whether this is not a work of reason rather than of the mere force of numbers counted by ayes and noes; and unless there is some answer to this we will have a right to say that this is not a deliberative body, but that we are acting upon what is substantially a party-caucus bill. I do not want to charge that, but we will have a right to charge that if this is not answered.

Mr. RANDALL. If I understand the gentlemen from Ohio, or either of them, to say that this paragraph is not as ordered by the committee, I contradict them flatly, and say that this paragraph as read is by the order of the committee, and I have my colleagues here to say the same thing.

Mr. FOSTER. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania let me say that what I stated was this: that I took from my book the memorandum as agreed upon in committee, and there are other books of other members of this committee bearing precisely the same memorandum as mine to-day. And I took it up to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I do not say that it was not changed afterward; but if it was, it was when I was not present. That is the statement I made. I presume it was changed at some time when I was not present in committee.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, there is another statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to which I want to give a flat contradiction, that this bill has ever been considered in any caucus whatever.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not say that.

Mr. RANDALL. Or alluded to in any caucus. The gentleman said something like that. One would draw that inference from what he said.

Mr. WILLARD. I rise to a question of order. It occurs to me that this debate as to what was done in committee is entirely out of order. I find in Barclay's Digest, page 67, the following ruling:

> It is not in order to allude on the floor to anything that has taken place in committee, unless by a written report sanctioned by a majority of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. The point of order is no doubt well taken, but I was not the first to introduce this matter. I did not originate it. I move that the committee rise to close debate on the pending paragraph.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not necessary. Let us agree to dispose of this paragraph, and then rise.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well.

The question being taken on Mr. FOSTER'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

The clerk read the following paragraph:

> For dies, paper, and stamps, $450,000; and hereafter the transmission of internal-revenue stamps to the officers of the internal-revenue service shall be made through the mails of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a matter to which I desire to call the attention of gentlemen before the committee rises. It is well known that the action of the House in what is known as the silver bill has cut off, or is likely to cut off, the fractional currency printing, and I notice by this afternoon's paper that that bill has been reported to the Senate from their committee favorably, except as to one section; that it is reported favorably as to the cutting off of the fractional currency. It has been suggested to the Committee on Appropriations, and the committee want the reflection of the House on the subject, that very much of the hardships incurred by reason of this change can be obviated or mitigated by the proposition to print the revenue stamps in the Bureau here, instead of doing it under contract. For the purpose of getting information on this subject I addressed an inquiry to the Department, and received from the Secretary of the Treasury a reply communicated by the head of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, that if this change was made two-thirds of the discharges of the force that would necessarily result from the doing away of the printing of fractional currency and the substitution of silver coin for it would be avoided.

The Secretary of the Treasury, under the terms of the contract with the bank-note companies that are now printing the revenue stamps, has the right to give a notice at the end of ninety days that he will conclude that contract. The Secretary, if I understand him rightly, and I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] can correct me if I do not, states that he has already given that notice, so that at the beginning of the fiscal year for which this bill provides appropriations he can, if Congress shall so determine, print these revenue-stamps in the Bureau. If this is done, it ought to be stipulated that it shall not cost in the Bureau more money than it now costs under the contract. And it ought not to cost more, because when you come to consider the rent, the insurance, the machinery, the light, and many other matters which a contractor in competing with the Government has to provide for, it seems to me that these revenue-stamps can be printed in the Bureau for a less sum; and I am informed by those who understand the subject that it is possible that they can be printed for a less sum than is now being charged by the contractor.

Now this is a question that the Committee on Appropriations desire to bring to the attention of all the members of the House, so that when we come again to consider this bill they will come to it with an understanding of this point.

I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BAKER, of New York: Remonstrance of the Oswego Board of Trade, against any change in the Light-House Board of the United States, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama: The petition of George W. Ashburn, for compensation for services rendered in the seizure of certain goods in Tennessee, being used by the southern confederacy, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. COX: The petition of Daniel Sullivan, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FREEMAN: The petition of workingmen of the city of Philadelphia, that the tariff laws be left undisturbed, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, resolutions of the Board of Port-Wardens of Philadelphia, asking that a survey may be made between Petty's and Smith's Islands, in the Delaware River, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. PARSONS: A paper relating to the granting of a pension to Daniel Cay, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. POTTER: The petition of Henry Ford and 43 citizens of Van Buren County, Michigan, against any change in the tariff laws, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. ROBERTS: The petition of Christopher W. Robertson, late a private in Company C, Sixth Regiment Maryland Infantry Volunteers, to be relieved from the charge of desertion, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of 69 workingmen of Harford, Maryland, against any change in the tariff laws, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. SCALES: A paper relating to the establishment of post-routes from Midway to Bethany, from Thomasville to Midway, from Midway to Yadkin's College, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SHEAKLEY: Remonstrance of citizens of Mercer County, Pennsylvania, against any reduction of the present tariff, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, a petition of soldiers of the late war, that they be granted one hundred and sixty acres of land, to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. SOUTHARD: The petition of James Coats and 150 other citizens of Port Washington, Ohio, that the tariff laws may not be amended, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. VANCE, of Ohio: The petition of Robert Lynch and 23 other workingmen of Lawrence County, Ohio, that existing tariff laws be left undisturbed, to the same committee.

By Mr. WALLING: Remonstrance of Siebert & Lilly and 32 other manufacturers and dealers in printed envelopes, &c., against the manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes by the Post-Office Department, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WELLS, of Missouri: Memorial of the Saint Louis Type Foundery, R. P. Studley & Co., F. O. Sawyer & Co., and others, of Saint Louis, Missouri, opposing the manufacturing, selling, and printing of envelopes and postal cards by the Post-Office Department, to the same committee.

By Mr. WOODWORTH: The petition of A. P. Howells and 122 other citizens of Massillon, Ohio, for the repeal of the specie-resumption act of January 14, 1874, and for the retirement of national-bank notes, and that a bond, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, payable in legal-tender notes and convertible into legal-tenders at the option of the holder, be issued, the proceeds to be applied in payment of outstanding gold-bearing bonds, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 7, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. H. PALETHORP HAY, D. D., of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House testimony in behalf of Samuel Lee, contestant in the case of Lee vs. Rainey, from South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

CHARGES AGAINST COLONEL MACKENZIE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers relating to the charges preferred against Colonel Mackenzie by Colonel Reynolds.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 111) granting a pension to David J. Garrett;

An act (H. R. No. 247) for the relief of James M. Coffinberry, of Cleveland, Ohio;

An act (H. R. 610) granting a pension to Seth W. Homestead;

An act (H. R. No. 1988) for the relief of Hermann Kreismann, United States consul-general at Berlin;

An act (H. R. No. 2304) granting a pension to Philip J. Shaw;

An act (S. No. 169) giving the consent of the United States to the county of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, to construct county buildings in Washington Square, in the city of Dubuque, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States; and

An act (S. No. 235) providing for the sale of part of custom-house lot in Rockland, Maine.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire if there is objection that the bills on the Speaker's table from the Senate shall now be laid before the House for appropriate reference? The Chair hears no objection.

LIMITATIONS IN CRIMINAL CASES.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 2655) to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes, relating to limitations in criminal cases, returned from the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I think the amendment is of a trifling nature and the House might adopt it without reference.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 3 strike out all after "follows" to the end of the bill, and insert:

No person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for an offense, not capital, except as provided in section 1046, unless the indictment is found, all the information is instituted within three years next after such offense shall have been committed. But this act shall not have effect to authorize the prosecution, trial, or punishment for any offense barred by the provisions of existing laws.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes, relating to limitations in criminal cases."

Mr. HOAR. I believe it is merely another mode of expressing the same thing, providing, for greater caution, that the bill shall not revive liabilities for actions already barred by the statute. I suppose there is no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I prefer that the bill shall be referred to a committe and take its regular course.

Mr. HOAR. Then let it go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill, with the amendment of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTRADITION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2434) to correct an error in section 5271 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to extradition; which were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MRS. JANE DULANEY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1118) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Dulaney.

Mr. HUNTON. The amendment of the Senate to this bill is to correct a deficiency in the original bill. It gives the widow the smallest pension ever given to the widow of such an officer. I ask that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the Senate will be read.

The Clerk read the amendment of the Senate, which was to insert after the word "pension" the words "at the rate of $30 per month;" so that it will read, "and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. HOLMAN. What was the provision in the original bill?

Mr. HUNTON. No amount was named.

Mr. RUSK. Let the original bill be read.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Jane Dulaney, widow of William Dulaney, late colonel United States Marine Corps, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of the act.

Mr. RUSK. The amendment of the Senate does not change the rate of pension at all, and I see no objection to it.

Mr. JENKS. The law fixes the rate of pension as indicated by the amendment.

There being no objection, the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

JOHN PIERSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 121) granting a pension to John Pierson; which was taken from the table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JULIUS SCROGGINS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 641) granting a pension to Julius Scroggins; which was taken from the table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JOHN J. ANDERSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 628) for the relief of John J. Anderson, surviving copartner of the firm of Anderson & White; which was taken from the table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. DURHAM. Is it in order to ask that that bill be now considered?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think it had better be referred.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on War Claims.

MENOMONEE INDIANS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 697) authorizing the sale of logs by the Indians on the Menomonee reservation in Wisconsin, under the direction of the Interior Department; which was taken from the table and read a first and second time.

Mr. TUFTS. The Committee on Indian Affairs have had the subject of this bill under consideration and are unanimously of the opinion that it should now be passed, because it relates to property which will be destroyed unless action is taken at once. I ask that it be now considered.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be sold at public sale to the highest bidder, for cash, after due advertisement and in such lots or quantities as he may deem judicious, all pine timber cut upon the Menomonee Indian reservation in Wisconsin under the direction of the United States Indian agent, J. C. Bridgman. The proceeds arising from the sale of such timber are to be applied, first, to the payment of any and all indebtedness incurred for labor, supplies, and other expenses incident to the cutting and sale of the timber; and the surplus, if any, is to be deposited in the nearest depository to the credit of the United States, for the benefit of the said Menomonee Indians.

Mr. WALLING. I object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Objection being made to the consideration of the bill, it was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BUTLER, MILLER & CO.

The last business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 627) making an appropriation to pay the claim of Butler, Miller & Co.; which was taken from the table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

COLLECTION OF ABANDONED PROPERTY, ETC.

Mr. ELKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3030) to amend section 3755 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to contracts for the collection and preservation of abandoned property, &c.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH E. LLOYD.

Mr. SMALLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3031) referring the claim of Elizabeth E. Lloyd, of Chester County, South Carolina, to the commissioners of claims, under the act of March 3, 1871; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT WRIGHT.

Mr. SMALLS also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3032) for the relief of Robert Wright, of York County, South Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION CONTEST—BUTTZ VS. MACKEY.

Mr. SMALLS also presented papers in the contested-election case of Buttz vs. Mackey, of the second congressional district of South Carolina; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

UNEXPENDED BALANCES IN AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 97) to return to the Treasury certain unexpended balances; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent for immediate action upon this resolution. It will occupy but a moment.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that the sum of $58,227, the total of unexpended balances heretofore appropriated by acts of Congress for the Agricultural Department for postage on seeds, reports, circulars, and letters for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1875, and June 30, 1876, (said aggregate sum being composed of an unexpended balance of $9,227 for the fiscal year of 1875 and $49,000 for the year ending June 30, 1876,) be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. CONGER. Does this come from the Committee on Agriculture? If so, I have no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. It is presented upon consultation with that committee.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF WAR DEPARTMENT ESTIMATES.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, requested to review and revise so much of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting estimates of appropriations required for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, as relates to estimates for military establishments of the War Department for said year of 1877, and report to this House at the earliest possible day, naming the reductions that can be made therein without injury to the efficiency of the Army.

ALBERT H. PFEIFFER.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2787) for the relief of Albert H. Pfeiffer, of Colorado Territory, and that the same be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

JOHN S. FILLMORE.

Mr. PATTERSON. I also ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2786) for the relief of the heirs of John S. Fillmore, late of Denver, Colorado, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at fifteen minutes before one o'clock. The regular order this morning is the calling of committees for reports of a private nature; and the call rests with the Committee on Military Affairs.

SURGEON-GENERAL CLEMENT A. FINLEY.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2387) to fix the retired pay of Surgeon-General Clement A. Finley, retired; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

OTIS N. CUTLER.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Otis N. Cutler, of New York, for relief; and moved that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

DOROTHEA IRONS.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2017) for the relief of Dorothea Irons, mother of Lieutenant Joseph F. Irons, late of the First United States Artillery; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

COLONEL W. H. EMORY.

Mr. GLOVER, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1846) authorizing the retirement of Colonel W. H. Emory with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MAJOR GODFREY WEITZEL.

Mr. BANNING, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 98) authorizing Major Godfrey Weitzel, United States Army, to accept position of trustee of Cincinnati Southern Railroad.

The joint resolution, which was read, authorizes Major Godfrey Weitzel, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to accept the office of trustee of the Cincinnati Railway Company, and to perform the duties of that office; provided they do not interfere with the performance of his official duties as an officer of the United States Army.

Mr. HALE. I must rise to the point of order on this that it is not a private bill. It interferes with the general law. You cannot change a general law by taking up one officer at a time.

Mr. BANNING. This is a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The point of order, if good, will lie to a joint resolution as well as to a bill.

Mr. BANNING. This joint resolution relates to a single individual, and does not provide for the change of any general law.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly it relates to a single individual, but if we allow the general law to be changed as in this case then you can change every general law in the frame-work of our Government by passing, under the guise of private bills, propositions like this.

Mr. BANNING. There is no private bill brought into this House which does not change the general law in some respect.

Mr. HALE. That is not the point of order I submit. The ordinary claim of an individual does not change existing law. Here, however, there is a clear infraction of law applying to the whole Army. It did not occur to me when I raised the point of order that there could be any doubt about it.

Mr. CONGER. This is the same character of bill or joint resolution allowing officers of the Government to receive presents from foreign governments, and those always have been regarded as private in their nature. This provides that Major Weitzel shall be allowed to do that, without interference with his duties as an Army officer, which under the present law he is prohibited from doing.

Mr. HALE. The bills and joint resolutions to which the gentleman refers are private bills, because there is no general law on the subject. In this matter there is a specific law controlling all officers of the Army.

Mr. CONGER. There is a general law prohibiting the taking of presents from foreign governments, and that is why private bills are introduced for that purpose to permit it to be done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is embarrassed by the fact that the distinction between private bills and public laws is so extremely indistinct and undefined. The Chair believes this joint resolution goes to the verge, but he is not able, as at present advised, to sustain the point of order and hold that it is a public law. It is a joint resolution, proposing to permit a public officer not exactly to receive a gift, but to perform a service, which service he could not perform properly without this permission. The Chair thinks it is essentially an act for the benefit of the person named in it, and therefore overrules the point of order, although with reluctance.

Mr. HALE. I fear, Mr. Speaker, the precedent will be a very bad one.

Mr. BANNING. I call for the reading of the joint resolution again.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I at first hesitated in reference to the point of order made against this joint resolution, but I am now satisfied the Chair is correct, because every special act brought in here is to give relief or permission to some person to do something or to obtain something which the general law prohibits. I think the safest ruling, and the only ruling the Chair could have made, is the one he has made.

Mr. BANNING. I think there can be no objection, Mr. Speaker, to this joint resolution in the shape in which it is now drawn and reported to the House. It merely authorizes General Weitzel to accept this position, as trustee, to which he has been elected, provided there shall be no interference whatever with his duties in the Army. Surely no one can object to that.

This railroad, as I said before, is a great public enterprise, being constructed by the city of Cincinnati, from that city to Chattanooga, at her own expense. The people of that city pay $16,000,000 to build this road, and this joint resolution merely authorizes General Weitzel, who is an able engineer, to give his advice to the engineers engaged in the construction of that road, provided it shall not interfere in any way whatever with his duties as an Army officer. I hope the joint resolution will be passed.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, this really as a matter of principle is the same subject up the other day when, upon a vote taken by the House, the bill was laid upon the table; but afterward it was agreed the bill might go back to the Committee on Military Affairs. I supposed then that the bill would not be heard of again, and certainly not brought up here again so soon for action.

The objection in principle against this joint resolution is as strong as against the bill the other day. Officers of the Army have been heretofore kept free from all detail and employment outside of their military duties; they have been kept free from all entanglement, all temptation, all embarrassment arising from connection with business enterprises. That it seems to me to be entirely right. As one of the results of so guarding the Army heretofore, it has maintained a high reputation in the country and throughout the world for integrity and honesty, especially so far as money matters are concerned. Now, this joint resolution, while it provides in terms it shall not interfere with General Weitzel's duties as an Army officer, still it does allow him to accept the position of trustee, which is equivalent to that of director of this railroad corporation, a large corporation, a corporation that has under its control millions of dollars.

I do not deny General Weitzel's service and his skill as engineer would be valuable to this road. I admit he is one of the best of his corps; but if this road wants him and will pay him handsomely, General Weitzel ought not to be excepted by us here from the operations of the general law. Let him do what was done before the war by Generals Sherman and McClellan, and by other able and skillful engineers in the service when they were called to other positions at higher compensation, and that is, resign or go out of the Army and leave the road open to promotion of men who do not ask they shall be allowed to exercise a divided duty. Let General Weitzel accept this position. Let him become absorbed as he will in the important duties of this new position, and in either event he will give the most of his attention to it. But at the same time he stands on the Army roll, and is a bar to the promotion of men who give their whole time and services to the Army. He is a meritorious officer, but there are hundreds of meritorious officers in the Army besides General Weitzel. And I say that this House should not commit itself to a precedent that will be urged in hundreds of instances hereafter whenever a valuable and skillful officer believes he can obtain better compensation in civil employments. Whenever that happens they will come to us and ask that they be permitted to accept trusteeships, directorships, and secretaryships of railroad corporations, of banking institutions, of insurance companies, and of everything that goes to make up the great business of the country.

Let him stick to the Army or let him go out of the Army; but do not let us now, while passing a bill originated on the other side of the House to reduce the pay of officers of the Army, embark on this pernicious practice of piecing out the pay of officers of the Army by letting them get entangled in any civil occupation whatever. There will be no end to this sort of thing if you once pass this bill. To-morrow another officer will come and say, "I can get employment in civil engineering, in banking business, in insurance business, and I want at the same time to retain my position in the Army and my rank, so that I will be the subject of promotion when it comes; but give me the opportunity of going outside the Army for higher compensation, and I will have a saving clause put in the resolution that it shall not interfere with my services in the Army." This is a matter of so much importance, Mr. Speaker, that if this resolution is pressed I certainly will desire a record of the House upon it by yeas and nays.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Mr. Speaker, there are some facts connected with this question that the House, it seems to me, ought to understand before voting the resolution down. The Engineer Corps of the Army to-day, a very large majority of them at least, are engaged in constructin , highways from one section of the country to another. They are engaged in opening up harbors, and in opening up rivers, so as to let commerce pass from one portion of the country to another. Cincinnati has already spent about $10,000,000 upon a great national highway. She has voted recently to spend $6,000,000 more upon that highway. By the appointment of the new Secretary of War a vacancy was made in the list of trustees to expend that money. In filling this vacancy the city of Cincinnati, which is furnishing so many millions of dollars, desires to appoint temporarily for the construction of this highway, not as a permanent employment or a permanent position, one of the ablest engineers of our Army.

The question has been before the Committee on Military Affairs whether it would be better to grant this officer a leave of absence or whether it would be better to require him to perform the duties in the Army that he is now performing, which are connected with a similar matter, that of river and harbor improvements, and allow him to give what assistance he could to this work so far as it does not take away his time from other duties. It is a case, in my judgment, the like of which has not been presented before, and I cannot well see when another case of like importance would present itself. The Government has recently appointed a trustee of this railroad to be Secretary of War. This officer of the Army will fill the position, it is understood, only till the road is completed.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THORNBURGH. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. When the former trustee of this road was appointed Secretary of War, did he not vacate the trusteeship?

Mr. THORNBURGH. He did. He vacated the trusteeship by sending in a resignation.

Mr. HALE. Then should not General Weitzel give up his position in the Army in order to accept this appointment?

Mr. THORNBURGH. He could not be expected to do so in order to act as trustee in the construction of a road that may be finished perhaps in a year from this day.

The ability and public reputation of General Weitzel are such that they will give confidence to the people of Cincinnati, who are furnishing this money, that it will be well expended and expended under the advice and with the consent of one of the ablest engineers of the Army.

It is a temporary employment, the expectation being that the road will be finished within eighteen months from the present day, at the outside. The Committee on Military Affairs have fully considered this question, and I hope the House will not vote down the recommendation of the committee without some better reason against it than has yet been assigned.

Mr. BANNING. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. I made objection to this resolution in its former shape for the simple reason that I did not desire that General Weitzel should be relieved from the discharge of very important duties upon our northern lakes. He has been assigned to the charge of two of the largest public improvements on those lakes, the completion of the Saint Mary's Falls Canal and the harbor of refuge on Lake Huron, both works of national importance. He was transferred from another department, having finished the canal at Louisville, to the charge of the works upon these lakes, on account of his peculiar fitness and ability to carry on works of such great importance to the navigation interests of the country.

My objection to passing this bill was for my constituents, for the people of that region and the whole country. I was unwilling to lose his services until these works were completed, for no new man can go and take charge of them and learn all that it is necessary for him to learn for their completion without some months of careful study and attention to them. The committee, however, have modified the resolution, so that in accepting this trusteeship he shall not be called upon to leave the works he has now under his charge; that it shall not interfere with the carrying on of these great works of Government and the people. With that modification I am willing that the resolution shall pass; but I would not vote in favor of a resolution that this distinguished officer should resign and leave these works. They are of more benefit to the whole country in his hands than they would be in the hands of any other officer, in my judgment, in the whole Engineer Department.

Now, if it be so that, acting in an advisory capacity as one of the trustees, he may be useful to the city where he resides and the interests of its people on this railroad without conflicting with his duties as engineer, I have no objection. If it did take him from his duties there I should object, and I should especially hope that he would not resign his place as an engineer officer for the next year or two until he has completed these important works.

Mr. HALE. Does not the gentleman see that if General Weitzel is made a trustee for this road his services on it must interfere with his duties in the gentleman's neighborhood; or else, on the other hand, as the gentleman says he is not to be interfered with in his duties in Michigan, Wisconsin, and above the lakes, why then he cannot render such services to the road as would make it indispensable that he should be employed there. One or the other is true—either he is going to be called from his public duties to perform services for this road or, if he is not, then he cannot do the road any good. It is as broad as it is long.

Mr. CONGER. In answer to the gentleman, I can only say that I am informed—I cannot say it of my own knowledge, for I have no knowledge on the subject—that the duties of this trusteeship are temporary, and that the citizens of Cincinnati and those interested in this road desire a man of great engineering talents and skill and of great integrity of character to act as one of the advisory members to supervise the construction of this road and its management for a short time.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] stated the other day that it was entirely different from that; that they wanted his actual skill, service, and labor in the construction of the road.

Mr. CONGER. They do not propose to make him the practical engineer of the road, of course. But his great knowledge of engineering might enable him at any meeting of the board to give advice, to correct errors, to regulate the action of the board without occupying more than one day.

I am not here to advocate the joint resolution. It was laid aside when it was last up partly on my objection, because I did not desire that the services of this officer should be withdrawn for this or next year from the great works of public improvements on the northwestern lakes, which are so necessary to the cheap transportation of the products of the Northwest to the seaboard. If those services can be retained, then I have no further objection to make to the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to his giving counsel and advice to this corporation. That he may do if he chooses; but for us to formally endow him with a trusteeship I do object to.

Mr. BANNING. I wish to say one word. I did state the other day that we did want the services of General Weitzel on this road; but in order to remove the objection of gentlemen, and in order that the Government might not lose his services, we have changed the resolution to the form in which it now stands, providing that the acceptance of this position shall in no manner whatever interfere with his duties as an officer of the Army.

Now, I know that there have been many officers of the Army accepting positions without authority of law, and they have placed themselves in a bad position by so doing; but they did it without authority of law; they did it under the orders of the President unauthorized, as I believe; and General Weitzel will not accept this position unless the Congress of the United States authorizes him to do so. Now, why may they not? The gentleman says there are no precedents for what we are doing. I beg his pardon; we have authorized and have to-day officers of the Army acting as professors in institutes in different parts of the country.

Mr. HALE. That is in the line of military education.

Mr. BANNING. Yes, sir; it is in the line of military education, and in the naval service we have the same thing, and this is in the line of building a public improvement: a railroad from Cincinnati to Chattanooga; a public improvement that an engineer officer of the Army may well labor upon; for if we had had this road during the war it would have saved in military operations thousands and thousands, yes, millions of dollars.

Why, Mr. Speaker, we have officers on foreign service drawing two pays; but this resolution gives no additional pay. General Weitzel will not violate the law. He will not accept the position unless we pass this resolution authorizing him to do so. He knows the law and will not violate it. This resolution will change the law in General Weitzel's case. Certainly we have the right to make the change.

Mr. WADDELL. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for the purpose of making a statement?

Mr. BANNING. Certainly.

Mr. WADDELL. I desire to state, and perhaps the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] is aware of the fact, that there are now two officers of our Navy detailed for service on the steamships running from San Francisco to Australia and China, and still receiving pay from the United States.

Mr. HALE. Has that not reference to the action of Congress in regard to carrying the mails upon those routes?

Mr. WADDELL. I think not, so far as I may judge from the correspondence with the Navy Department upon the subject.

Mr. HALE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] one question. I know he is anxious to get through with this joint resolution, so that his committee can report other business. I would ask him where we will draw the line in this matter? To-day this road asks the service of a valuable officer of the Army; to-morrow the Pennsylvania Central asks the service of another valuable officer; next day the New York Central makes a similar request; then a canal company asks that favor of the Government; and an enterprise in California wants the services of another officer. They will all ask to be allowed to remain on the Army roll. Now I would ask where the gentleman would stop?

Mr. BANNING. I will answer the gentleman. This proposition will be putting the brains and education of West Point to some practical use to the country. I will tell you where we will stop; we will stop right where we are, and not continue violating the law by sending our officers abroad as you have done. In every instance we will require them, as in this case, to come to Congress first, and ascertain if they can get permission. We have made a law forbidding this detail of Army officers, and we have the right to make a law changing this or any other law. When it will result to the benefit of the country we ought to change the law. When a road comes here that is being built by one city at a cost of $16,000,000, a road which is a great public improvement and a benefit to the country generally, may we not say that that road shall have the advisory use of the brains which we have educated at West Point? I now call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the gentleman calls the previous question I wish to ask him a question for information simply. Where is General Weitzel now stationed, what particular branch of the public service has he under his charge, and how many civilians from private life are now employed as engineers in connection with public works, such as river and harbor improvements?

Mr. BANNING. I will answer the gentleman. General Weitzel is now employed at Detroit, and my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] objected the other day to this joint resolution because it would take General Weitzel away from him. We have modified the joint resotion so that this detail shall not interfere with his duties there.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no. How many persons are employed from civil life as engineers at this time in connection with the public works of the same class as those with which General Weitzel is now connected?

Mr. BANNING. That is a matter that the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Military Affairs are both trying to find out; and when we do find out I hope we will be able to correct an evil that now exists.

Mr. HALE. This is a bad way of correcting it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there are now one hundred and six persons from civil life employed in connection with these public works.

Mr. BANNING. That may be. This joint resolution is recommended by General Sherman, whose letter was read here on Saturday last; and it is recommended by the present Secretary of War, and approved by the Chief of the Engineer Corps. I hope the House will pass this joint resolution.

Mr. HALE. Has the gentleman heard any recommendation of this from that large and intelligent body of civil engineers throughout the United States, who have not been educated at the expense of the country?

Mr. BANNING. I thought that at last we would get at the true inwardness of the gentleman's objection. I now insist upon my call for the previous question.

Mr. HALE. I shall not object to this joint resolution in the intermediate stages, but upon its passage I shall call for the yeas and nays, as I consider it involves an important principle.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. HALE. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 89, nays 127, not voting 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, George A. Bagley, William H. Baker, Banning, Blackburn, Bright, William R. Brown, Burleigh, Cabell, Campbell, Candler, Cason, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, Conger, Cook, Cowan, Culberson, De Bolt, Dibrell, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eden, Egbert, Ellis, Evans, Forney, Foster, Fuller, Gause, Glover, Goode, Gunter, Hancock, Hardenbergh, Henry R. Wiley Wells, Whitthorne, Andrew Williams, James Williams, Wilshire, and Benjamin Wilson—73.

So the joint resolution was not passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN S. DICKSON.

Mr. BANNING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, a bill (H. R. No. 2404) for the relief of John S. Dickson, late captain of paroled prisoners; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF GEORGE SCHWARTZ.

Mr. STRAIT, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (S. No. 168) for the relief of the legal representatives of George Schwartz, deceased, late a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

A. F. M'MILLEN.

Mr. STRAIT also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3033) for the relief of A. F. McMillen, late captain First United States Heavy Artillery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EXPLOSION AT FRANKFORT ARSENAL, PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. JENKS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back a petition asking for a pension to Hugh McLaughlin, on account of loss of his son John, killed at Frankfort arsenal, Philadelphia, August 7, 1875, by explosion of ammunition, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JENKS also, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Michael Farrell, Henry Steiger, and other sufferers by the explosion at the Frankfort arsenal, Philadelphia, on August 7, 1875, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

WIDOW OF CAPTAIN DAVID RITCHIE.

Mr. JENKS also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1078) authorizing the Commissioner of Pensions to place upon the pension-roll the name of the widow of Captain David Ritchie; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

OLIVER T. EVERHART.

Mr. JENKS also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3034) granting a pension to Oliver T. Everhart; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LAFAYETTE DECKER.

Mr. BAGBY, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2330) granting a pension to Lafayette Decker, of Richmond County, New York, late a private in Company E, Fourth New York Heavy Artillery; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SMITH BELL.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3035) granting a pension to Smith Bell, late sergeant Company I, Twenty-sixth Regiment United States Colored Troops Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY M'LAIN.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3036) granting a pension to Mary McLain, widow of Charles McLain, late lieutenant-colonel Two hundred and eleventh Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL D. FALLS.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3037) as a substitute for House bill No. 1392, granting a pension to Samuel D. Falls, late unassigned recruit Ninth Regiment Minnesota Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported adversely in the following cases; which were laid on the table, and the reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1586) granting a pension to Harriet Bowman, Logan County, Illinois;

A bill (H. R. No. 1246) to correct the date of commencement of pension to Anna Brasel, widow of David Brasel, late sergeant in Captain Gordon's Company Mounted Illinois Volunteers; and

The petition of William H. H. Gillespie, Company I, First Missouri Cavalry Volunteers, for pension.

ALMON F. MILLS.

Mr. RICE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3038) granting a pension to Almon F. Mills, late a private Company K, Twenty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY A. CASTERWELLER.

Mr. YEATES, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1641) granting a pension to Mary A. Casterweller, widow of John Casterweller, a soldier of the late war; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ABIGAIL T. DAWNEY.

Mr. YEATES also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1849) granting a pension to Abigail T. Dawney, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARTHA WESTERVELT.

Mr. BLISS, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3039) granting a pension to Martha Westervelt; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SARAH J. GOSS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3040) granting a pension to Sarah J. Goss; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANTONE NEIS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, also, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 293) for the relief of Antone Neis; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM M'LAY.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2081) granting a pension to William McLay, late private Company G, Twelfth Illinois Infantry Volunteers, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JAMES RUFFIN WOOD.

Mr. SINNICKSON, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R No. 3041) granting a pension to James Ruffin Wood, of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARTHA J. BROWN.

Mr. SINNICKSON also, from the same committee, reported back adversely a petition of Martha J. Brown, widow of William C. Brown, late private Company H, Thirty-second Regiment Kentucky Infantry, praying for a pension; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

NAVY-YARD INVESTIGATION.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That for the purpose of enabling the Committee of this House on Naval Affairs to discharge the duties imposed upon them by the House resolution instructing them to inquire into certain alleged abuses and frauds at different navy-yards of the United States and the misapplication of appropriation made for the construction of eight vessels of war authorized by act of Congress approved February 10, 1873, &c., it is hereby directed that said committee, through a subcommittee appointed for that purpose, consisting of Messrs. WHITTHORNE, JONES, HARRIS, and BURLEIGH, shall make said investigation as far as it relates to the Philadelphia and League Island navy-yards at said yard and at the city of Philadelphia.

LIMITATIONS IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. HUNTON. This morning, when the bill (H. R. No. 2655) to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes came back from the Senate with amendments, a motion was made to concur in the Senate amendments. Objection was made, and the bill and amendments were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman who made the objection is willing to withdraw it, and I move that the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary be reconsidered, and that the Senate amendments be concurred in.

There being no objection, the vote by which the bill and amendments were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary was reconsidered, the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same, and the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

MANUFACTURE OF SILK.

Mr. CUTLER. I ask unanimous consent to present a memorial of the citizens of Paterson, New Jersey, for reference to the Committee of Ways and Means. I ask also that it may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is brief and contains some valuable facts in reference to the silk interest, which I am sure every member of this House would be glad to know. The memorial is signed by over five thousand operatives in the city of Paterson, a city which employs more labor, gives employment to more operatives, and has more capital invested in silk than any one city or congressional district in this Union.

There being no objection, the memorial was received, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

This memorial of the citizens of Paterson, New Jersey, respectfully submits:

1. That there are about eight thousand operatives employed in the silk manufacture, in its various branches, in this city alone, and many thousands in other places in the country.

2. That under the present duty on silk goods the American silk manufacture has, during the past ten years especially, developed with incredible rapidity until the value of home production has reached over $20,000,000 annually, the product of last year (1875) being the largest ever known. The imports of raw silk for December, 1875, were 208,456 pounds, compared with 131,673 pounds in December, 1874; and the total receipts of raw silk for American manufacture in 1875 were nearly 40,000 pounds more than in any preceding year; the grand total being over a million pounds for last year. That this was achieved in a period of general depression was mainly due to the immense development of the business into channels formerly filled by foreign products.

3. That the silk trade has created another important branch of industry in America in the manufacture of silk machinery, which, during the late panic, has kept many of our machine-shops busy.

4. For this reason and for others, including the great competition of foreign imports, the products of our looms, especially ribbons, handkerchiefs, fancy silks for trimmings, ties, &c., have largely taken the place of the foreign fabrics, although at present there are some sorts where the manufacture is still in its first steps of development.

5. Notwithstanding the present protection, the imports of manufactured silk goods into the port of New York for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, were $22,810,483, compared with $22,669,653 for the preceding year.

In the opinion of your petitioners the heavy imports have crippled our industry. The recent disclosures of smuggling and customs frauds, that have acted with material detriment to our trade, may shortly tend to the further development of the American silk industry, this being, as we believe, very injurious to us in a time of national depression.

From the above facts it must be clear to your honorable House that the present protection is absolutely necessary to protect the home industry.

To make the changes which the pending bill proposes in raw and manufactured silks would be equivalent to an order closing every silk mill in the United States.

Believing that these important facts, which can be readily verified, will receive due consideration from an American Congress, they are respectfully submitted.

JOHN C. WHITE.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3042) for the relief of John C. White, first lieutenant First United States Artillery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. DURAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Private Calendar. This being objection day, one objection carries a bill over. The Clerk will read the first business on the Calendar.

The Clerk read the title of the bill at the head of the Calendar, being the bill (H. R. No. 819) to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the call of the Calendar to-day begins at the point where the Committee of the Whole last left off.

Mr. BRIGHT. The bill the title of which has been read was under consideration upon the last consideration day. This is objection day, and I submit as a point of order that the bill should go over until next Friday before it can be considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is very manifest that the committee should begin now where the consideration of the Calendar closed on the last occasion that the House was in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. It seems to me that the only question is, What was the last bill considered by the committee?

Mr. BUCKNER. The last bill considered in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 344) to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not on last Friday.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS UNDER ACT OF JUNE 16, 1874.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that in resuming the Calendar at the point where its consideration was last left off, the first business is the bill (H. R. No. 1218) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported to Congress, under section 2 of the act approved June 16, 1874, by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Clerk commenced reading the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several persons in this act named the several sums mentioned herein, the same being in full for, and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final discharge of, the several claims examined and allowed by the proper accounting officers since June 30, 1874, under the second section of the act of Congress approved June 16, 1874, namely.

Mr. EDEN. I ask that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that there should have been a report accompanying this bill. It appropriates a very large sum of money.

Mr. BRIGHT. I object to debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the original bill. This seems to be a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that this is the original bill with the addition simply of some names.

Mr. NEAL. I object to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill having been once objected to, five objections are now required.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] desires time to examine this bill, I think the objection should be sustained.

Mr. EDEN. After the bill has been laid aside to be reported to the House, the gentleman can have all the time he requires to examine it, and may, if he wishes, offer amendments in the House. If the bill is not reported now to the House, I give notice that I shall move on Monday to suspend the rules and pass it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would say to the gentleman from Ohio that, if it be understood that in the House the previous question shall not be called, but that the bill shall be open for consideration and amendment, it may be as well to allow it to be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. NEAL. All I desire is to be heard on this bill before it is put on its passage; I do not care whether in the committee or in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair not hearing five objections, the bill is laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELIZABETH B. THOMAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2163) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Thomas.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth B. Thomas.

Mr. BAGBY. This bill is precisely the same as the Senate bill No. 431 on page 8 of the Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be substituted for this one.

Objection was made.

No objection being made to the bill it was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

PETERS & REED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2287) for the relief of Peters & Reed, naval contractors, at the Norfolk navy-yard, in the year 1860.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be paid to Peters & Reed the balances due them for labor done and material furnished at the Norfolk navy-yard in 1860, upon the contracts with them personally, and the balances due them as the attorneys in fact of the contractors John E. McWilliams and F. W. Parmater, in said navy-yard, during the same time, amounting in the aggregate to $15,170.89, as certified by the engineer in charge, and approved by the commandant, in June, 1860; and for the purpose aforesaid appropriates the sum of $15,170.89 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MRS. SUSAN E. RHEA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 590) for the relief of Mrs. Susan E. Rhea, widow of Dr. J. Burrows Gardiner.

The bill authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to Susan E. Rhea, who was the widow of J. Burrows Gardiner, a surgeon in the navy of Texas at the time of the annexation of said republic to the United States, the compensation that he would have received had he been living at the date of the passage of the act of Congress of March 3, 1857; provided that the acceptance of the provisions of this act shall be a full relinquishment of all claims on the part of the said Gardiner, or any other person or persons, for further compensation in this behalf from the Government of the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MARGARET C. BELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2300) granting a pension to Margaret C. Bell.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret C. Bell, widow of Admiral Henry H. Bell, late of the United States Navy, and that she be paid a pension of $50 per month from and after the passage of the act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

TITLE TO LANDS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2456) to release any title of the United States to a certain tract of land in Braxton County, West Virginia, to Sarah Wilson.

The bill was read. It provides that whatever title the United States may have in a tract of land of about one hundred acres, in Braxton County, West Virginia, which was conveyed by George Wilson to Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, by George Wilson by deed dated September 10, 1836, be released to Sarah Wilson, her heirs and assigns.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

WILLIAM L. NANCE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 309) for the relief of William L. Nance.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $6,000, in full compensation for certain property of said William L. Nance, taken for the use of the Government of the United States during the late rebellion.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JAMES G. WILLIAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2457) for the relief of James G. Williams.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I wish to state that the Committee on War Claims referred that case to me as a subcommittee, and upon the facts then before me I reported favorably upon it. From subsequent facts which have come to my knowledge, I desire that the bill be recommitted to the committee that I may make an adverse report upon it. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

BARTHOLOMEW COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2458) for the relief of the Bartholomew County (Indiana) Agricultural Society.

The bill appropriates the sum of $1,500, to be paid to the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society in full payment and satisfaction for the use and occupation of the fair grounds of said society for military purposes from September, 1863, to June, 1865.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MISSION OF SAINT JAMES, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of the mission of Saint James. (Objected to by Mr. JACOBS.)

JAMES B. SINCLAIR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1071) for the relief of Lieutenant J. B. Sinclair, United States Army.

The bill directs the President to restore James B. Sinclair, first lieutenant United States Army, retired, to the rank of captain of infantry, as held by him December 31, 1870; and that his name be placed upon the retired list of the Army as of the rank he held at that date.

The report was read, as follows:

This is an act to place the name of James B. Sinclair, first lieutenant United States Army, retired, on the retired list of the Army as a captain, (not mounted.)

James B. Sinclair was commissioned first lieutenant United States Infantry October, 1861, and served continuously during the war, and on the frontier since the war, until February, 1871, when he, then being captain Twenty-third United States Infantry, was discharged, though he was never examined by or ordered before a board, as provided by the act of July 15, 1870.

He was, March 9, 1871, upon the recommendation of Brigadier-General E. R. S. Canby, Brigadier-General George Crook, Major-General J. M. Schofield, Colonels Sidney Burbank, Roger Jones, W. L. Elliott, and other officers of the Army, re-appointed a second lieutenant, and retired with the rank of captain, (not mounted.) Under the provisions of the act of Congress to fix the rank and pay of retired officers of the Army, approved March 3, 1875, Captain Sinclair was, by General Orders No. 33, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, March 23, 1875, reduced to the rank of first lieutenant.

The record of Lieutenant Sinclair is that of a brave, faithful, and efficient officer. It is shown by the certificates of five surgeons that he was wounded in action in the head, hip, upper third of the thigh, and four separate and distinct times near the knee, and that these wounds have almost entirely disabled him. It is further shown that, while Lieutenant Sinclair was a captain in the Fourteenth United Stated Infantry, he was urged by the Army medical officers to go before the retiring board, and had he done so he would have undoubtedly been retired with the rank of captain, and would not have been subject to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1875. This he declined to do; but, notwithstanding his wounds, remained with his company and rendered gallant and valuable service against the Indians, as is fully set forth in General Orders No. 9, district of the Owyhee, complimenting him for gallant and meritorious services. His request is approved by the Secretary of War. In accordance with the above facts, the committee, being of the opinion that justice requires that the petition of James B. Sinclair should be granted, report the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill just read is not the bill before the committee. What has become of the bill for the relief of the mission of Saint James?

Mr. BUCKNER. In reference to that bill, I understand that a Delegate objected to it; and I suggest to the Chair whether a Delegate has any power to object to a bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point comes too late.

No objection being made to the pending bill, it was laid aside, to be reported to the House favorably.

THEODORE F. MILLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2459) for the relief of Theodore F. Miller, late private Company G, Third Regiment Iowa Cavalry Volunteers.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow and pay to Theodore F. Miller, late private Company G, Third Regiment Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, the bounty to which he would have been entitled under the law if he had been regularly mustered out and discharged with his regiment.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

CHARLES W. HILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2460) for the relief of Charles W. Hill, of Urbana, Ohio.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Charles W. Hill, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $201.50, in full of his traveling expenses from Helena, Montana Territory, where he was discharged from service as clerk to a paymaster in the Army in January, 1871, to his residence at Urbana, Ohio.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

COMPENSATION FOR LOSS OF CLOTHING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2461) for the relief of certain officers of the Third United States Artillery who suffered loss by fire at Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, on the 3d of March, 1875.

The bill authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury of the United States to settle with the first lieutenants of the Third United States Artillery who lost their personal effects by fire at Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, on the 3d of March, 1875, at a sum not to exceed $600 each.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move to amend that bill by adding to it the words "and a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. HOLMAN. That amendment is not necessary, and I must object to it. Claims of this kind are paid out of the general appropriations for the support of the Army.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. The amendment can do no harm at any rate.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be favorably reported to the House.

HENRY E. WILKINSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1402) for the relief of Henry E. Wilkinson, late first lieutenant of Company I, Ninty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Henry E. Wilkinson, late first lieutenant of Company I, Ninty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, the sum of $414.20, being the amount justly due him as first lieutenant from September 1, 1862, to December 26, 1862, for which time he has never received any pay or other allowance.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

NEWPORT BARRACKS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1055) to authorize the Secretary of War to convey to the city of Newport, Kentucky, the grounds at the confluence of the Licking with the Ohio River, in Campbell County, Kentucky, known as the Newport Barracks.

Mr. HOLMAN. I see it stated that the Government contemplates a renewal of the use of those grounds for military purposes, and I trust therefore that this bill will not be pressed.

Mr. TERRY. I understand that there is some prospect of the ground being used for military purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be passed over; I object to it.

REDICK M'KEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 620) for the relief of Redick McKee.

The bill provides that the memorial and claims of Redick McKee, late disbursing agent of the Indian Department in California, (Miscellaneous Document 102, printed February 25, 1871,) be referred for examination and settlement to the Secretary of the Interior. If the Secretary shall find the allegations and statements of the claimant verified by the records of the Department or other satisfactory evidence, he shall allow him such relief as may be equitable and just, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The report was read, as follows:

That, in 1850, or thereabouts, the said McKee was appointed by President Fillmore one of three commissioners upon Indian affairs in California, and also purchasing and disbursing agent for the commission.

That in the execution of this trust, which was then one of great difficulty and importance, and which he seems to have fulfilled with remarkable success, the said McKee avers that an indebtedness of the United States Government to him was contracted, the evidence of which, he also avers, exists upon the records of the Interior Department, but which has never been paid.

That the Interior Department, from which information respecting this matter has been sought, has "stated that it was not prepared, without a full examination of the case, to give an opinion upon the merits of the allowance suggested by the claimant in his memorial," and also that, "should the proposed joint resolution meet the approval of Congress, Mr. McKee's claim will receive careful attention at the hands of the Department."

And also that an act in precisely the same terms as the present bill passed the House of Representatives March 19, 1872, but failed of action in the Senate.

The committee therefore report back the bill, with a recommendation that it pass.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

COLLEGE OF WILLIAM AND MARY, IN VIRGINIA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2462) for the relief of the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, for property destroyed during the late war.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. That bill ought to be debated, and I object to it.

NIRAM W. PRATT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1944) granting a pension to Niram W. Pratt.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Niram W. Pratt, late a private in Captain A. J. Millard's independent company of Sioux City, Iowa Cavalry.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ROSE MILLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1235) granting a pension to Rose Miller, widow of Reason F. Miller, deceased, late a private in Company E, One hundred and twenty-third Illinois Infantry.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Rose Miller, widow of the late Reason F. Miller, who was a private in Company E, One hundred and twenty-third Illinois Infantry.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ADAM SMOUSE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2463) granting a pension to Adam Smouse.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Adam Smouse, of the township of Bell, Jefferson County, Pennsylvania, the father of Charles Smouse, late a private in Company F, One hundred and fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, during the life of the said Adam; and in case Eve, the wife of said Adam Smouse survives him, then to the said Eve during her life.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

DIANA BREYSACKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2464) granting a pension to Diana Breysacker.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Diana Breysacker, and her successors, guardian of William Parks, born May 7, 1860, minor child of Cornelius Parks, late private in Company C, Fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteers,

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

EMILY SCHWARTZ.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2465) granting a pension to Emily Schwartz.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emily Schwartz, widow of Adolphus Schwartz, late major of the Second Regiment of Artillery Illinois Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

BUTLER FITCH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2466) granting a pension to Butler Fitch, late captain Eighth Independent Battery, New York.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Butler Fitch, late captain Eighth Independent Battery, New York.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The report was read, as follows:

That Butler Fitch enlisted in the service of the United States on the 24th day of September, 1861, and organized an artillery company known as the Eighth Independent New York Battery, of which he was elected captain. He served as such as a gallant and meritorious officer, and was discharged on the 20th day of September, 1864, on his resignation, based on a medical certificate, having been in service three years.

This officer and his command performed most efficient service for the Union cause in the eastern campaigns. Captain Fitch at the time of entering the service was an able-bodied, healthy man, weighing about one hundred and sixty-five pounds. For years before entering the service he was entirely healthy. The evidence is clear and unquestioned on this point. The evidence further discloses that while in the service his command was much of the time on duty in low, malarial regions, and in consequence of such exposure claimant became sick, reduced in flesh, and was finally taken with congestive chills, and that on account of continued ill-health, occasioned by said malarious influences, and by the advice of the surgeon of his command, he was compelled to resign, and was honorably discharged as above stated.

In the medical certificate, on which his honorable discharge was based, the surgeon states that claimant was unable to perform his duties as a soldier for reason, first, of "incipient phthisis," indicated by physical signs in upper lobe right lung, namely, dullness upon concussion, bronchial and puerile respiration, with cough; also, second, that he has been for some months very much reduced and debilitated by frequent attacks of malarial fever of congestive type, which has rendered his general health so feeble that there is imminent danger of developing rapidly his constitutional phthisical condition. In this condition he quit the service weighing only one hundred and eighteen pounds.

The evidence is conclusive that he has ever since remained in ill health, having had four congestive chills on different occasions since his discharge from the service; also, that he is now very much enfeebled in health and a confirmed consumptive, and all his indisposition directly traceable to the disability caused by work and exposure, as above stated, while in the service of the United States and in the direct line of duty. He is now so much reduced as to be unable to perform any manual labor. He has a wife and family to support, and even the attempt to perform physical labor causes great suffering and pain.

Hope of regaining his health has deterred claimant from applying earlier for a pension.

In view of the facts above stated, and feeling it to be but a simple act of justice to a gallant and meritorious officer, the committee would make a favorable recommendation.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

FRANCIS CURRAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1176) granting a pension to Francis Curran, Thirteenth Indiana Cavalry.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Francis Curran, late sergeant of Company E, Thirteenth Indiana Cavalry, and to pay him a pension from and after the passage of the act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN GROPPER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1178) granting a pension to John Gropper.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the conditions and provisions of the pension laws, the name of John Gropper, late of Company I of the Twenty-third Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension from and after the passage of the act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

SARAH J. KING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2467) granting a pension to Sarah J. King.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah J. King, widow of James E. King, late corporal of Company B, Second Regiment Illinois Cavalry Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

HENRY H. WHARFF.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1204) granting a pension to Henry H. Wharff, of Company C, Eighteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Henry H. Wharff, late a private of Company C, Eighteenth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JULIA A. SCHUTT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 197) granting a pension to Julia A. Schutt, widow of Martin Schutt, a deceased soldier.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Julia A. Schutt, widow of Martin Schutt, a private in Company I, in the Fourth Regiment of Heavy Artillery, New York Volunteers, to take effect from the death of said Martin Schutt, as shown by evidence on file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

DAVID M'COMB.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2468) granting a pension to David McComb.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David McComb, late employé in the naval service of the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ANDREW J. BARRETT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 648) for the relief of Andrew J. Barrett.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Andrew J. Barrett the sum of $154 in payment of draft No. 3609, on the United States depository at Richmond, Virginia, drawn by Peter A. Kellar, the disbursing agent, upon W. M. Harrison, the officer in charge of the United States depository at said place, in favor of said Andrew J. Barrett; said draft bearing date January 28, 1861, and being for the first payment for taking the eighth census.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The report was read, as follows:

This is a claim for $154, and the facts on which it is based are as follows, namely: That the disbursing agent for the eighth census, Peter A. Kellar, drew a draft for that sum January 28, 1861, on the United States depository in Richmond, Virginia, in favor of the claimant, to pay him for services as assistant marshal in taking that census, the claimant giving a receipt for the same, which was used in the settlement of his accounts for taking said census.

He soon after paid over said draft, indorsing it, in a business transaction, to William Thompson, then sheriff of Boone County, Virginia. The said draft lay in said Thompson's hands for some time, when he attempted to use it by turning it over to J. M. Bennet, auditor of public accounts of Virginia, and said Bennet declined to take it. Thompson then tried to get it cashed at the United States Treasury, but this was refused, because the accounts of said Barrett had been closed, and the Department would not re-open them. Mr. Barrett then received back said draft from Mr. Thompson, paying him its full value.

The committee are satisfied that Mr. Barrett never received the amount represented in said draft, though the same was and is justly due him, nor has the United States ever paid the same to any person; they therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN HALEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2585) granting a pension to John Haley, late a private in Company C, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Haley, late a private in Company C, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MARTHA R. ROBINSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2198) granting a pension to Martha R. Robinson, of Portsmouth, Ohio.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Martha R. Robinson, widow of Major Joshua V. Robinson, late of the Thirty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

SARAH EMMONS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1939) granting a pension to Sarah Emmons.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah Emmons, widow of Charles E. Emmons, late a private in Company H, Sixth Regiment Michigan Cavalry Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

HENRY H. KAISER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2079) granting a pension to Henry H. Kaiser, late a private in Company H of the Eighth Regiment United States Veteran Volunteers.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry H. Kaiser, private in Company H, Eighth Regiment of United States Veteran Volunteers, and to pay him a pension from and after the passage of the act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MRS. HANNAH W. SUMNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2271) to increase the pension of Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of the late Major-General Edwin V. Sumner, who died March 21, 1863, while in command of the Department of the West, at the rate of $50 per month, to commence from the passage of the act, and to continue during her widowhood, and to be in lieu of the pension heretofore granted to the said Hannah W. Sumner under the provisions of the general pension laws.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The bill increases the pension of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner, from $30 per month to $50. This increase is asked on account of the long, arduous, and distinguished services of her late husband in the Army of the United States, and that such increase is necessary for a decent support of the said Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner for the few years she may be permitted by a kind Providence to remain on earth with her children.

The widow is over seventy years of age, and can survive but for a short time. General Edwin V. Sumner entered the service in 1819 as second lieutenant. He served in 1832 in the Black Hawk war with much credit. In 1833 he was commissioned by General Jackson as captain, and assigned to duty on the western frontier, where he continued on active duty until war was declared against Mexico, in 1846. The First Dragoons were ordered to New Mexico, and Edwin V. Sumner was assigned to the command of the same. During this campaign he was appointed major of the Second Dragoons, then near Vera Cruz. While on his way thither, at New Orleans, he received an order from General Scott appointing him to the command of a new regiment just then raised. He commanded this regiment at the battle of Cerro Gordo, where he was severely wounded. He was, soon after his recovery from the wound, assigned to the command of the Second Dragoons, then about to leave Puebla for Mexico. He was engaged in the action of Churubusco, and led his regiment in a gallant charge upon the enemy. On the 8th of September he commanded the dragoons at the battle of Molino del Rey, the bloodiest of all the battles of Mexico, and General Worth, in his report of the battle, speaks in the highest terms of the courage of Sumner. For his services at Cerro Gordo and Molina del Rey he was brevetted. After the close of the war he was (in the fall of 1848) assigned to the command at Jefferson Barracks. In the spring of 1849 he was ordered to Leavenworth, where he continued in command until the spring of 1851, when he took command of the Department of New Mexico. He was in several different commands up to the breaking out of the late war, when he was appointed a brigadier-general, in place of General Trigg, who had been dismissed from the service because he was suspected of disloyalty. In April, 1861, he was ordered to repair to San Francisco, and to assume command of that department and to relieve Colonel Sidney Johnston. His administration in that department was highly successful.

In November, 1861, he was placed in command of one of the divisions of the Army of the Potomac, in the command of which he continued until the battle of Fredericksburgh. He took an active and prominent part in the battle of Williamsburgh, and an honorable part in the battles of Fair Oaks, Seven days around Richmond, and Fredericksburgh. On the 5th day of July, 1862, he received General George B. McClellan's recommendation for promotion, in which he says: "I have the honor to recommend and request that the gallant veteran, Brigadier-General E. V. Sumner, United States Army, may be appointed a major-general in the Army, or, if there is no vacancy, be brevetted as such. The extreme gallantry evinced by this noble and honest soldier on many a hard-fought field during this campaign, his uniform cheerfulness under the most trying circumstances, the judgment and energy he displayed in saving the day at the battle of Fair Oaks—these and other causes render it eminently just that he should receive the reward I ask for him." This was indeed a high compliment, coming as it did from one of the most distinguished officers of the Army.

There being no vacancy, Sumner was brevetted in accordance with this recommendation. Soon after the battle of Fredericksburgh, General Sumner, at his own request, was relieved from duty in the Army of the Potomac, and in the month of March following he was assigned to the command of the Western Department. While on his way thither he was attacked by disease, which proved fatal on the 21st day of March, 1863. This brave and honest soldier, after forty-four years of arduous and brilliant service, fell at his post of duty, "leaving no blot upon his name;" and his gallant deeds should be enshrined in every American heart; and the country which he served so long, faithfully, and well, and for which he gave his life, ought to support decently and comfortably his aged widow. It is the sacred duty of the Government to support the widows of our soldiers who have given their lives for its preservation.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN L. BARTLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2586) granting a pension to John L. Bartley.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John L. Bartley, late a private in Company C, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MELVINA INGLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2587) granting a pension to Melvina Ingle.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Melvina Ingle, widow of Joseph H. Ingle, late a pivate in Company H, Second Illinois Light Artillery Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

WIDOW OF GENERAL L. H. ROUSSEAU.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 326) for the relief of the widow of L. H. Rousseau, deceased, late brigadier-general and brevet major-general of the United States.

The bill was read. It provides that the pension heretofore granted to the widow of Lovell H. Rousseau, deceased, late a brigadier-general and brevet major-general in the Army of the United States, be increased from the sum of $30 to the sum of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

RE-IMBURSEMENT OF MAYOR, ETC., OF BALTIMORE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2690) to refund to the mayor and city council of Baltimore certain moneys illegally assessed and collected for internal-revenue tax. (Objected to by Mr. HOLMAN.)

F. M. BLOUNT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 915) for the relief of F. M. Blount, of Chicago, Illinois.

The bill was read. It authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to F. M. Blount, a clerk in the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States at Chicago, Illinois, $500, to re-imburse him for a like sum paid by him into the Treasury of the United States out of his own private means, and so paid by him to make good a loss to the Treasury caused by his having taken, in the discharge of his duties as such clerk, a counterfeit $500 United States Treasury note.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JAMES J. WARING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 776) for the relief of James J. Waring, of Savannah, Georgia. (Objected to by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.)

CLAIMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2691) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department. (Objected to by Mr. HOLMAN.)

B. F. WEST & CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 40) to re-imburse B. F. West & Co., of Martin's Ferry, Ohio, for internal-revenue stamps stolen from Cambridge (Ohio) post-office.

The bill was read. As amended by the committee, it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to B. F. West & Co., of Martin's Ferry, Ohio, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $357, to re-imburse B. F. West & Co. for revenue stamps purchased by them of the collector of internal revenue of the sixteenth district of Ohio, on the 4th of May, 1871, and stolen from the post-office at Cambridge, Ohio, on the night of May 4, 1871.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the reading of the report; and it was read, as follows:

It appears that the petitioners, B. F. West & Co., of Martin's Ferry, Ohio, in the year 1871 were the owners of a distillery registered as No. 3, in the sixteenth revenue-collection district of that State; that they filed with the collector of the district in Cambridge an entry for the withdrawal from their distillery warehouse packages of distilled spirits numbered from 63 to 76, inclusive, and accompanied the entry with $357, the amount of the tax on the spirits contained in the packages, according to the requirements of the law. Whereupon the collector issued to B. F. West & Co. tax-paid spirit-stamps properly filled out and signed, denoting the payment of the tax, and, on the evening of the 4th day of May of that year, he inclosed said stamps for said B. F. West & Co. and addressed them to the United States ganger at Barnesville, Ohio, to be by him delivered to said West & Co., and deposited the same in the post-office at Cambridge; that on that night the post-office was entered by burglars and the package containing said stamps, with other mail matter, was stolen therefrom and destroyed; that afterward, on the 11th day of July, 1871, upon the application of West & Co. and upon their paying therefor, other stamps were issued for the same packages of spirits. By reason of the loss of the first lot the petitioners were compelled to pay the tax twice, and they ask that the value of one set of stamps may be returned to them. This claim seems to be meritorious. The only cost to the Government in the re-issue would be the cost of production, which is but a trifle. Had the law authorized it, it would be but justice that the lost stamps should have been replaced, as the filling up and signing is the cancellation of them, so that they stand virtually as vouchers or receipts for so much tax-money paid and applicable only to the casks for which they were issued, therefore not usable by any other parties or in any other place; but, there being no law for it, West & Co. were compelled to pay a second time the tax on the thirteen casks of whisky, and the Government received $357 of money, the property of the petitioners, that they might under the law withdraw from the custody of the Government their property to put it into the market. The committee are of the opinion that the amount, $357, ought to be paid. The bill calls for $414.

The committee therefore report the bill back with an amendment, and, when so amended, recommend that it do pass.

There being no objection, the amendments were agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MARINE-HOSPITAL LOTS, SAN FRANCISCO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2692) to relinquish the title of the United States to certain property in the city and county of San Francisco, California. (Objected to by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.)

MISSION-LAND PATENTS IN OREGON, ETC.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 631) providing for the adjudication and issue of patents in mission-land cases in the State of Oregon and the Territories of Washington, Idaho, and Montana. (Objected to by Mr. DUNNELL.)

HOT SPRINGS RAILROAD COMPANY, ARKANSAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2382) granting the right of way to the Hot Springs Railroad Company over the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas.

The bill was read. It recites in the preamble that the Hot Springs Railroad Company has constructed and equipped, and is now maintaining and operating, a first-class line of railroad from the town of Malvern, on the Saint Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railroad, in Hot Springs County, in the State of Arkansas, to the town of Hot Springs, in the county of Garland, in the same State, which passes over a small portion of the Hot Springs reservation, in Arkansas, reserved from sale or other disposition by act of Congress approved April 20, 1832; that the construction, operation, and maintaining of this railroad will be of great convenience and comfort to the thousands of feeble and crippled invalids who annually visit the Hot Springs to receive the benefits of the wonderful curative powers of the waters of those springs, thus affording comfortable, quick, and cheap transportation.

The bill therefore grants the right of way to the Hot Springs Railroad Company, a company duly incorporated and organized under the laws of the State of Arkansas, to construct, maintain, and operate its line of railroad upon, over, and across the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas, as follows: Commencing on the east line of the south half of section 33, in township 2 south of the baseline, in range 19 west of the fifth principal meridian, in the county of Garland and State of Arkansas, at a point about six hundred feet from the southeast corner of said section; thence running up a ravine parallel to and south of the Benton wagon-road, westwardly through said section to a point at or near the Hot Springs Creek on said reservation. The right of way granted is to consist of a strip of land fifty feet wide on each side of the railroad, measured from the center line thereof, from the point on the east line of the section of land where the railroad enters the same to within twelve hundred feet of the terminus of the track of the road, and of the width of two hundred feet on each side of the railroad, measured from the center line thereof, for the last twelve hundred feet of the railroad, to be used by the company solely and exclusively for the construction of its track, side-tracks, switches, depots, machine-shops, engine-houses, turn-tables, &c.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

C. M. PURVIANCE AND F. WYETH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 192) for the relief of Caroline M. Purviance and Francis Wyeth.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Caroline M. Purviance and Francis Wyeth, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,500, the same to be in full satisfaction to them, and all persons claiming under them, for the use and occupation of and destruction to their property by the military authorities of the United States in Saint Joseph, State of Missouri, in the years 1861, 1862, and 1863.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

HEIRS OF JOHN W. GALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 262) for the relief of the legal representatives of John W. Gall, deceased, late of Company A, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of War and the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to recognize the military services of John W. Gall, deceased, late of the One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, as an officer of that regiment; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the legal representatives of Gall the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry from March 9, 1863, to November 1, 1863, and the pay and allowances of a first lieutenant of infantry from February 20, 1864, to January 25, 1865, deducting therefrom the amount of pay received by him as a private soldier or non-commissioned officer of the regiment for the period above named.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOSEPH ANDERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2693) for the relief of Joseph Anderson, of Nashville, Tennessee.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Joseph Anderson, of Nashville, Tennessee, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 in full compensation for certain lumber furnished the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army at Nashville, in February, 1862, for the construction of bridges, pontons, fortifications, and quarters for workmen; which sum shall be received by Anderson in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

W. W. VAN ANTWERP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of W. W. Van Antwerp, late major of the Fourth Michigan Cavalry.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to W. W. Van Antwerp, a citizen of Jackson, Michigan, the sum of $160, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, it being the value of a private horse lost in action while Van Antwerp was in the strict line of his duty as a soldier.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BRIGHT moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HOSKINS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DURAND reported sundry bills, with the respective recommendations of the Committee of the Whole thereon.

WAR CLAIMS.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The first bill (reported with a recommendation that it be passed with an amendment) was the bill (H. R. No. 1218) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported to Congress under section 2 of the act approved June 16, 1874, by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill has been reported back from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar with an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 10 add the following:

And embrace in the schedule the claims reported by the Secretary of the Treasury at the commencement of the second session of the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. NEAL rose.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be upon the amendment of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was understood that the gentleman from Ohio should have such time as he might deem proper when this bill came into the House.

Mr. NEAL. None of the claims for which this bill appropriates money were examined by the committee from which it was reported.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be reported in full, so the House may be informed about it.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, none of the claims for which this bill appropriates money were examined by the committee from which it is reported, with the view to ascertaining whether or not they were such as ought to be paid by the Government, the members of that committee having been of the opinion that their duty in the premises was purely formal, and did not require them to make any such examination. I trust therefore that the bill will not be passed at this time. I do not know what the practice of this House has been in regard to bills of this kind. But if it has been customary to pass such bills upon the simple examination and allowance of the claims contained in them, by the accounting officers of the Treasury, without a thorough and complete investigation of each and every one of them by some proper committee, I think that the sooner such a custom is abandoned the better it will be for the Government. The system of reform which has been determined upon and so happily inaugurated by us cannot, in my judgment, be extended in any direction with more successful results than will be realized by a departure from such a usage.

I am aware that to adopt the course I suggest will impose a large amount of labor upon those to whom such bills shall be committed; but at the same time I can see no other way in which fraudulent and dishonest claims can be discovered and rejected and the interests of the Government fully protected. There are in this very bill between two and three hundred claims, amounting in the aggregate to $112,000. In another bill upon this Calendar, just a little below it, there are three hundred and forty-seven claims, amounting to $158,548.10, making the total sum $270,548.10; and I can but feel that to appropriate this amount in payment of them, without any further inquiry into their validity and justice than has been made by us, will be scarcely less than criminal negligence upon our part. We shall at least lay ourselves liable to the charge of gross negligence if we make such an appropriation without other and further knowledge in the premises than we now have. Some, possibly a majority, of these claims are doubtless meritorious. But then we can with almost equal certainty assume that others, a large number, too, will prove upon examination to be dishonest and fraudulent. So that the only safe course for us to pursue will be, it seems to me, to recommit the bill, in order that the finding of the Treasury officials in every case may be reviewed and we may be fully advised by one of our own committees as to whether all or any of them are of such a character as to justify us in providing for their payment.

Sir, nothing can be clearer to my mind than that we ought to review the action of the Department officers in the allowance of these claims. That it is our imperative duty to do so appears most fully, not only from the reasons I have stated, but from any fair or reasonable construction of the law under and by virtue of which they have been presented to us. The act of June 16, 1874, by the last section of which the Quartermaster-General, the Commissary-General, and the Third Auditor of the Treasury were authorized "to continue to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of such claims," provides in express terms that "the Secretary of the Treasury shall make report of each claim allowed by them, at the commencement of each session of Congress, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall lay the same before Congress for consideration."

I give the exact language of the statute, and I submit that it will be a most miserable evasion of both its letter and spirit to so construe it as to hold that it means the same thing that it would mean if the word "appropriation" were used instead of the word "consideration." No one, I apprehend, will dare contend that it can be so construed. Yet this is just what must be done, if, as is now in effect proposed, we declare the finding of the Quartermaster-General and Third Auditor of the Treasury in these cases to be final and conclusive, and the simple appropriation by us of the amount of money ascertained by them to be due, and reported to us by the Secretary of the Treasury, to be a full compliance with the requirements of this section.

Mr. EDEN. If I can have the attention of the House I think I can answer the indictment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL.]

The bill under consideration is a bill that was passed substantially just as it is now in the last House. These claims were reported by the Secretary of the Treasury at the beginning of the last session of Congress. The letter of the Secretary was referred to the Committee on War Claims, of which the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] was chairman and my economical friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was a member; and after they had given it that careful consideration which it was likely to receive at their hands and at the hands of the committee, it was reported to this House and passed unanimously without reading. It never went to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims at all; and so far as I know there is no other person within the limits of this country who has any sort of suspicion against these claims than my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL.]

Now, what are these claims, and why are they here? Prior to the act of July 4, 1864, the Court of Claims seems to have had jurisdiction of matters of this kind. At that time a law was passed changing the jurisdiction. I will read a section of that law, section 2, which is as follows:

That all claims of loyal citizens in States not in rebellion for quartermaster's stores actually furnished to the Army of the United States and receipted for by the proper officer receiving the same, or which may have been taken by such officers without giving such receipt, may be submitted to the Quartermaster-General of the United States, accompanied with such proofs as each claimant can present of the facts in his case; and it shall be the duty of the Quartermaster-General to cause such claim to be examined, and if convinced that it is just, and of the loyalty of the claimant, and that the stores have been actually received or taken for the use of, and used by, said Army, then to report each case to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, with a recommendation for settlement.

There are one or two other enactments extending the jurisdiction of the accounting officers; one extending it to the State of Tennessee and another to a part of the State of West Virginia. The act does not and never did embrace any part of the insurrectionary States, but is confined solely and exclusively to the loyal States. The proof of loyalty is one of the conditions upon which the accounting officers have jurisdiction to determine and pass upon the merits of the claim. Now, under this law of July 4, 1864, until the 16th day of June, 1874, every single claim was passed upon by the Quartermaster-General and referred to the proper auditing office, and there passed upon by the Auditor of the Treasury without any further act of Congress. On the 16th day of June, 1874, in an appropriation bill, an amendment to this law was passed requiring those claims to be certified to Congress for an appropriation, or, as my friend from Ohio has it, for consideration.

Now, I have looked somewhat into these claims, and I have ascertained the mode by which the accounting officer proceeded to determine as to their justice. In the first instance, they go to the Quartermaster's Department.

The claim is first proven by affidavits of two persons, their credibility and the loyalty of the claimant being certified by a United States officer. The claim is then sent out for examination and report of a Government agent, who goes on the ground, summons witnesses to impeach the claim or claimant's loyalty. He makes his report. The case is then reviewed by the depot quartermaster. He reports to the Quartermaster-General. The case receives a thorough examination by his office. When approved by him it is sent to the Third Auditor, who reviews it, and if allowed by him, it goes to the Second Comptroller for his action. He examines and reviews it, and if he allows it, it is then reported to Congress for appropriation.

Now, that is the process by which these claims are examined. First by the Quartermaster's Department upon the application with two witnesses proving the justice and merit of the claim, and the character of these witnesses certified to by a United States officer; and then a special agent is sent out for the purpose of examining witnesses, if there be any, to impeach the claim; and then the evidence is reported to the Quartermaster's Department for examination there. And after going through all the red tape there is in the Quartermaster's Department it goes to the accounting officers of the Treasury, and is by them thoroughly examined according to the rules to which I have called the attention of the House. Then it comes to Congress.

Now, if my friend from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] will take the pains to examine the evidence in these cases, as I have done—I do not mean to say that I have gone over all the evidence in all the cases and examined it as a lawyer would do, because I could not do that in a single session of Congress—but if he will take up these papers and examine them, I venture to say he will not find an instance in which there is not a good case made out on paper. It may be possible that there are some claims fabricated, that there is some testimony fabricated, but I do make the assertion that, according to my best judgment from the examination I have made, every single one of those claims shows a good case on paper.

Now, what has this House got to do? The Government of the United States has established the Quartermaster's Department and the accounting officers of the Treasury as the proper tribunal for the persons having this class of claims to go to and have them adjudicated. Stringent rules and regulations have been adopted in order that there may be no fraud practiced. I do not say that it is impossible that frauds may be practiced, but stringent rules are adopted to prevent anything of the kind. The evidence is all carefully scanned and examined after the special agent has gone out to hunt up testimony to impeach both the justice of the claim and the loyalty of the claimant, and then these claims are reported to Congress, with the accompanying evidence. And I will state that, so far as the Committee on War Claims is concerned, when they take up these papers they find there is a good case there on paper in every instance. I suppose the gentleman from Ohio wants the committee to send out and have the witnesses brought up again, and take their testimony.

Mr. NEAL. O, no.

Mr. EDEN. I do not pretend to say that this is the very best mode of adjusting these claims.

I rather incline to think that it would be better that there should be a judicial tribunal to adjust these accounts, where there would be proper counsel on the part of the Government to cross-examine all the witnesses, and whose duty it would be to see that no fraud was perpetrated on the Government. But that is not the tribunal that has been established by law. The accounting officers of the Treasury and the Quartermaster's Department constitute the tribunal that we have invited these claimants to come to with their witnesses, and they have been at the expense of doing that; they have complied with the law which we have made for them, and now the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL,] because he is suspicious that among these four hundred claims included in this bill there may possibly be one or two which are fraudulent, proposes that these people should not have their money, when they have been at the expense of going to the only tribunal to which they can go in order to have their accounts adjudicated. Sir, I say that it would be infamous for us to adopt such a rule as that. If Congress is not satisfied with this tribunal let it establish another, but when it has established a tribunal, and these men have gone in good faith before it and presented their claims and proven them to the satisfaction of the accounting officers of the Treasury, and no suspicion has been cast upon them, I ask if it is not the duty of the House to make an appropriation to pay the claims?

Sir, these are not rich claimants who come here clothed in the panoply of power to demand their rights. They are poor persons, and their claims range from $5 up to $500; and unless this Congress shall make an appropriation upon the evidence that has been presented before the tribunal that we have fixed upon to adjudicate the cases the result will be that these poor people will not get their pay; and I say that that is not right.

I repeat, sir, that you may go and examine these claims and among them there may be fabricated claims. I do not say that it is not possible that there may be such. I do not in saying that, however, mean that there is the slightest suspicion of that sort, and I do not mean by any means to be understood as saying that any officer of the Government whose duty it has been to adjudicate these claims would be guilty of anything of that sort. But, sir, in spite of the utmost carefulness on the part of the accounting officers and of the committee and on the part of the House, there will now and then an unjust claim creep in and get passed, and men will get money out of the Treasury to which they are not entitled; and therefore, because that is a fact, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] thinks those who have just claims against the Government ought not to be paid.

In case you refer this bill back to the committee, I tell you that the committee cannot examine the papers as a lawyer would do, and unless you go over them and examine them in that way, you might just as well not examine them at all. I say further to the gentleman from Ohio that there are before the Committee on War Claims, including the cases in this bill and those reported from the southern claims commission, two thousand or three thousand cases, and in some instances the testimony amounts to two hundred pages, and, unless the House is going to give some credit to the tribunal established by law to adjudicate these claims, you might as well turn the claimants out and let them go unpaid. It would be an act of injustice, an infamy to do so, and for one I do not intend to do so. If the gentleman from Ohio can make any reputation for extreme reform views by depriving these poor claimants of their just claims, which have been adjudicated by the tribunal fixed by law, I am willing that he shall make it. I shall do my duty here. None of my constituents are concerned in any of these claims, and I have no concern in them except to do my duty as a Representative here.

Mr. NEAL. Before the gentleman sits down, will he allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. EDEN. Certainly.

Mr. NEAL. Under the act of July, 1864, as was correctly stated by the gentleman, the Quartermaster and the Third Auditor of the Treasury were authorized to examine, adjust, and pay these claims.

Mr. EDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEAL. Under the act of June 16, 1874, the Congress of the United States took away from the Quartermaster-General and the Third Auditor of the Treasury the power to pay these claims.

Mr. EDEN. Certainly; but they did not take away the power to adjudicate them.

Mr. NEAL. By that law these claims, instead of being paid by the proper officers of the Treasury Department without submission to the Congress of the United States, are required to be brought here and submitted to us for our consideration.

Mr. EDEN. Certainly; and that is just what we are doing now.

Mr. NEAL. Let the gentleman tell this House what was sought to be accomplished by that change in the law. If it was not contemplated by that act that this House should review the action of the Quartermaster-General and the Third Auditor of the Treasury, what was the necessity of bringing these claims here to trouble and annoy this House with the passage of a bill appropriating money to pay them instead of letting the officers of the Treasury pay them, as they had done prior to that act, without the intervention of Congress?

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] allow me to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] a question?

Mr. EDEN. Certainly.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio this question: if his position is correct, that it was the intention of Congress, in passing the act which provided for the submission of these claims to Congress for their consideration, that we should enter upon an examination of all these claims in detail, why did not that act of Congress provide that with these claims all the proof that had been taken should also be submitted to Congress for their consideration? That which is certified to us here is simply the claim as ascertained by the accounting officers, and the act of Congress does not contemplate the sending here of the proof, which Congress doubtless would have required if it had intended that we should enter into a re-investigation of all the facts in the cases in detail.

Mr. NEAL. In reply to the gentleman, I would state that the officers of the Department differ from him in regard to what the intention of Congress was in the passage of that act. The Secretary of the Treasury not only reports to us the claims and the amounts found to be due by the Quartermaster-General and the Third Auditor, but also all the evidence on which they made their allowance of the amount. Why do they send that evidence here, if it was not understood by the officers of the Department that their action was to be reviewed by this House?

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Simply for information; so that any gentleman who was captious could go to the committee-room and inform himself.

Mr. EDEN. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.]

Mr. WHEELER. I was the author of the statute referring these claims to Congress. The intention was that Congress should give the same revision to these claims that had been provided for the claims that come here from the southern claims commission, and that only. Of course Congress has the power to review the decisions of the Department in these cases; but the presumption is in favor of the faithful performance of duty by the officers of the Department. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] will suggest that there is any fraud in any one of these claims, then Congress has the power to stop the payment.

Mr. EDEN. That was the object of the law.

Mr. WHEELER. That was the object of the law, to act simply as a check, and not to require Congress to go through all these claims in detail. Congress has the power to review any of these cases; and upon the suggestion by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL,] or any other member, of fraud in any one of these cases, the claim would be stopped and re-examined. That was the only object I had in view in drawing the bill, and that Congress had in view in enacting it into a law.

Mr. EDEN. I will yield now to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This particular bill was before the last Congress. The Committee on War Claims, of which I was then a member, satisfied itself that the Department had confined itself to the law in making these reports. We gave this bill a review, comprehensive enough to satisfy ourselves on that point. The bill passed the House but failed to pass the Senate. This winter the bill has again come before the Committee on War Claims. We had enough to do in giving any attention at all to the seventeen hundred other claims which the House has referred to us, besides carefully examining the testimony and findings of the southern claims commission, in each case referred to us from that commission, without going over this bill again in detail.

I think gentlemen will find that everything that comes from the Committee on War Claims has had some considerable attention and consideration by that committee. I hear ten complaints from members of this House and from claimants that we are altogether too severe in our examination where I hear one that we are not careful enough. I am glad, however, to see my young friend from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] take advantage of any opportunity to air his vocabulary that presents itself. He speaks well, and he looks for an opportunity to pick at big fellows like the chairman of our committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDEN. I yield a few minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. I have but one or two words to say upon this subject. The claims of this class, like all other claims submitted to the House, are submitted with the testimony. The Secretary of the Treasury sends with the list of claims the testimony in each case on which the Quartermaster and the several Bureau officers have acted, and from which they drew their conclusions. This House sends to the Committee on War Claims the memorials and evidence that is submitted to this House; whatever testimony is presented here by claimants.

The Committee on War Claims take up each of these cases as they find them. If the proof is insufficient, and those pressing the claims bring in other evidence, the committee hear it. In these as in all other cases where a member of the committee has given personal examination to any one of these claims, has looked over the file of papers and made his report to the committee, the committee would rely upon that report, although it may have been made in a former year and to another committee, with the same certainty that they would if it was made by any member of the committee now. Every case has the voucher of the written recommendation of a member of the committee, made this year or in some former year, that it has received the assent of that member or of the committee in its final determination.

I am pleased to bear testimony before this House to the strictness, accuracy, and care with which every claim is examined by the Committee on War Claims, so as to bring it within the rules which I and other gentlemen of that committee require, those rules which should apply to the whole class of war claims either in the loyal States or in the Southern States.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And the rules prescribed by law.

Mr. CONGER. And the rules prescribed by law. I take pleasure in saying here, for the committee with which I have the honor to act, that so far as I have seen there has been on the part of every member of that committee unusual care and strictness in the examination of every one of these claims. Not only have members of the committee insisted upon the observance of those rules of law which we are all bound to regard, but they have conformed to the strictest rules which I, claiming to be an extreme man in reference to the allowance of southern claims, would regard as proper.

I think it due to myself as a member on this side of the House to say, in answer to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL,] that I am satisfied the Committee on War Claims do not intend to permit any of the thousands—I do not know but I might almost say millions—of claims which have been and will be presented before that committee in this and succeeding Congresses to be reported to this House until they are brought strictly within the requirements of law. I feel satisfied that the most rigid rule must be complied with before they can be reported here.

Mr. EDEN. I now ask for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; under the operation of which the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. Being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIZABETH B. THOMAS.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. No. 2163) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Thomas.

Mr. BAGBY. A bill substantially the same as this has already passed the Senate; and in order to simplify the action between the two Houses on this question, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 431) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Thomas, widow of General Lorenzo Thomas, late of the United States Army, be substituted for this bill.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly; and the bill (S. No. 431) was taken up, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I suppose that the House bill on this subject will be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That order will be made.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar with favorable recommendation, were severally taken up, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 2287) for the relief of Peters & Reed, naval contractors at the Norfolk navy-yard in the year 1860;

A bill (H. R. No. 590) for the relief of Mrs. Susan E. Rhea, widow of Dr. J. Burrows Gardiner;

A bill (H. R. No. 2300) granting a pension to Margaret C. Bell;

A bill (H. R. No. 2456) to release any title of the United States to a certain tract of land in Braxton County, West Virginia, to Sarah Wilson; and

A bill (S. No. 309) for the relief of William L. Nance.

JAMES G. WILLIAMS.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2457) for the relief of James G. Williams; which was reported with a recommendation that it be recommitted.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I desire to state, and have it go upon record, that I wish to withdraw the report heretofore made upon this case and have the bill recommitted to the Committee on War Claims, that an adverse report may be presented. I make the motion that the bill be recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar with favorable recommendation, were severally taken up, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 2458) for the relief of the Bartholomew County (Indiana) Agricultural Society;

A bill (H. R. No. 1071) for the relief of Lieutenant James B. Sinclair, of the United States Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 2459) for the relief of Theodore F. Miller, late private Company G, Third Regiment Iowa Cavalry Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 2460) for the relief of Charles C. Hill, of Urbana, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 2461) for the relief of certain officers of the Third United States Artillery who suffered loss by fire at Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, on the 3d of March, 1875; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1402) for the relief of Henry E. Wilkinson, late first lieutenant of Company I, Ninety-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

REDICK M'KEE.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with a favorable recommendation, was the bill (H. R. No. 620) for the relief of Redick McKee.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This bill, according to my recollection, was reported adversely during the last Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. And reported adversely in the Senate before. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE,] who reported this bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs, will consent that it be recommitted.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let it be examined; that is all we ask.

Mr. SEELYE. This bill has already been before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and has been carefully considered by them. In their opinion there is certainly an honest claim on the part of McKee against the Government, but a claim extending back some twenty-five years, during which time he has been urging its settlement, which, however, he has failed to secure.

It is a claim of a very intricate nature, which can only be adjusted by careful examination of accounts in the Department of the Interior. This careful examination the Committee on Indian Affairs have not been able to secure, the Department of the Interior not feeling willing to give the attention to it requested for the information of the committee. The committee have reported this bill which passed the Forty-Second Congress and failed for want of time for action in the Senate. The only way in which it seems the case can be adjudicated is by the Secretary of the Interior depending upon the examination of the books of the Department. The bill merely proposes it shall be referred to the Secretary.

If I may be allowed to say, there is certainly no reason for any other reference of it to the Indian Committee.

Mr. LANE. If there ever has been an adverse report on this case the Committee on Indian Affairs have been unable to find it. On the contrary, sir, this claim has been examined in this House and in the Senate, and in each House has received, as I understand, favorable consideration and report. The character of the claim is such that the Committee on Indian Affairs deem it should be submitted to the Secretary of the Interior for adjudication and adjustment. I have no hesitation in saying that in my judgment a more just claim has never been presented to this House than that of Redick McKee.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I think, Mr. Speaker, there must be some misunderstanding in relation to the report made to Congress last year in reference to this claim. As I recollect, this was referred to Mr. Burrows, of Michigan, and I urged him again and again to make a report upon it. My recollection now is that he failed to make any report.

I wish to say, in addition, that I have known this old gentleman, Redick McKee, for many years. He resided in my neighborhood and occupied an adjoining farm. I know that he was a good and faithful agent of the Government; that he served the country honestly and truly, and that in so doing he paid out of his own pocket money in behalf of the Government, which it is only just should be returned to him. He made a treaty with the Indians, and to this day the Government has never fulfilled the terms of that treaty. He discharged his duties in good faith. If there ever was a good claim presented to this House, this is one; and I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I know this gentleman very well. He is as worthy, upright, and excellent a soul as ever lived. I do not believe he would consent to take ten cents from the Government which was not his legal due.

He was employed, early after California was admitted, by one of the Departments of the Government to deal with some Indians. A draft, which was to have been sent by the Government, either was not sent or did not arrive, and he paid a considerable sum out of his own pocket, out of which he has lain all these years.

Mr. SEELYE. May I add, the bill which is now proposed is an exact copy of a bill which passed the Forty-second Congress, and only failed in the Senate for the want of time?

Mr. MILLIKIN. What is the amount of this claim?

Mr. SEELYE. That could not be stated, for it depends on a long series of accounts running for some twenty-five years.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The bill was reported adversely in the Senate by Mr. Pratt; and I am informed, by a gentleman who undoubtedly knows, that it was reported adversely in the last Congress.

Mr. LANE. It was reported favorably by Senator MAXEY, of Texas.

Mr. DUNNELL. I was on the Committee of Claims in the last Congress, and remember distinctly there was a favorable report made in these cases.

Mr. SEELYE. The Committee on Indian Affairs were unable to discover any adverse action, either from the committee of the Senate or of the House. As I have already stated, the bill passed this House in the last Congress, and only failed in the Senate for want of time.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is a claim twenty-five years old.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like the gentleman from Massachusetts to state to the House something near the amount of the bill.

Mr. SEELYE. It is some few thousand dollars.

Mr. LAWRENCE's motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs was rejected.

Mr. SPRINGER. I should like to know how much this is to take out of the Treasury?

Mr. LANE. This bill provides only for a settlement by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SPRINGER. There may be a million dollars in this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrosssed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LANE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar with favorable recommendation were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 2462) for the relief of the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, for property destroyed during the late war;

A bill (H. R. No. 1944) granting a pension to Niram W. Pratt;

A bill (H. R. No. 1235) granting a pension to Rose Miller, widow of Reason F. Miller, deceased, late a private in Company E, One hundred and twenty-third Illinois Infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 2463) granting a pension to Adam Smouse;

A bill (H. R. No. 2464) granting a pension to Diana Breysacker;

A bill (H. R. No. 2465) granting a pension to Emily Schwartz;

A bill (H. R. No. 2466) granting a pension to Butler Fitch, late captain Eighth Independent Battery, New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 1176) granting a pension to Francis Curran, Thirteenth Indiana Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1178) granting a pension to John Gropper;

A bill (H. R. No. 2467) granting a pension to Sarah J. King;

A bill (H. R. No. 1204) granting a pension to Henry H. Wharff, of Company C, Eighteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers; and

A bill (H. R. No. 197) granting a pension to Julia A. Schutt, widow of Martin Schutt, a deceased soldier.

SESSION ON SATURDAY FOR DEBATE.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the session of to-morrow be set aside for debate only.

Mr. HOAR. I object.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question being taken on Mr. ATKINS's motion, there were—ayes 116, noes 35.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. The motion to adjourn over having been agreed to, will the Chair permit me to state that there are certain gentlemen who desire to have their speeches published in the RECORD? If gentlemen will not allow them to deliver their speeches to-morrow, I ask that they may have leave to print them in the RECORD. But before making that request I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to withdraw his objection to a session to-morrow for debate only.

Mr. HOAR. We know very well that every Saturday that we adjourn over causes us to remain here a day longer in midsummer.

Mr. ATKINS. The House has agreed to the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. HOAR. I am aware of that, but without my consent. I for one will not agree to such waste of the public time. There has not been a Congress for ten years in which public business has been so backward at this stage of the session. Not a single important election case has been settled. Not a single important appropriation bill has been got through.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] asks that gentlemen who have prepared speeches to deliver may have them printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. KASSON. The privilege of printing speeches in the RECORD has been abused in some instances by introducing personal reflections upon members, and for that reason I object to granting this leave to everybody to print speeches in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proposition has been objected to, and is not before the House.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair permit me to say that I do not wish to put my individual objection against what is so largely the desire of the House. Having made my protest on the subject of the way in which the business of the House is being conducted, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To what proposition does the gentleman from Massachusetts withdraw his objection?

Mr. HOAR. I made but one objection, and that was to a proposition for a session to-morrow for debate only. If that is the unanimous desire of the House excepting myself, I do not insist on my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question of a session to-morrow for debate can only be reached by a motion to reconsider the vote to adjourn over till Monday.

Mr. HOAR. It can be reached by unanimous consent. It has been usual to determine the question in that way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If it is proposed that there shall be a session to-morrow for debate only, the Chair will only entertain one motion, and that is, to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to adjourn over till Monday.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the motion to reconsider that vote. I make it for the purpose of allowing a session to be held to-morrow for debate only.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a privileged question. I would ask the Chair if we cannot by unanimous consent set aside to-morrow for discussion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has ruled that a motion to reconsider is the only correct way of reaching that.

Mr. ATKINS. I understand that unanimous consent can suspend all rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the gentleman's point of order. The question is, Will the House reconsider the vote by which it agreed to adjourn over till Monday?

Mr. BEEBE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Will the Chair state what effect agreeing to the motion to reconsider will have on the proposition for a session to-morrow for debate only?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the motion to reconsider prevails, then the motion to have a session to-morrow will be in order.

The question being taken on the motion to reconsider, there were ayes 36.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. DUNNELL said: I think the question is not understood.

Mr. SAYLER. I believe it is entirely understood. The gentleman is mistaken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the question once more, and for the last time. The question is, Will the House reconsider its action by which it ordered that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next, which cuts off the session to-morrow? Should the House reconsider that vote, then it would be competent and in order for any gentleman to move that there be a session to-morrow for debate only. But the House having determined to adjourn over till Monday, a subsequent motion for a session to-morrow would be in direct violation of that vote, and is not in order till the vote to adjourn over is reconsidered.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair allow me to submit a suggestion on the question of order? I understand, with great respect to the decision of the Chair, that the other way has been the uniform practice of the House for many years: first to pass the vote to adjourn over till Monday, and then, without reconsidering that, to obtain unanimous consent for a session on Saturday for debate only. The reason is this: To reconsider the vote adjourning over till Monday would leave it open to have a business session to-morrow, which the majority of the House do not want. Now, the House may be unanimous in assenting to a session for debate only and at the same time may not desire to incur the risk of having a business session by reconsidering the vote to adjourn over. I respectfully submit to the Chair that the better way is to follow the uniform precedent of the last ten years; that is, that after the House votes to adjourn over a request for unanimous consent for a session for debate only be entertained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, with all due respect to the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, desires to say that he is not familiar with the precedents on this point; but, as a parliamentary question, he has no doubt his ruling is correct; and for this reason, if for no other: The object sought to be obtained by the gentleman from Massachusetts is entirely within the control of the House. Should the vote to adjourn over be reconsidered, it is entirely competent for the House to say that it shall have a session to-morrow for debate, no other business to be transacted. The House is not deprived of any privilege, and the Chair sustains its ruling.

Mr. BANKS. If the Chair will allow me, I would like to suggest that what has been stated by my colleague [Mr. HOAR] as the uniform practice in regard to ordering sessions for debate only is the only way in which we can get a session for that purpose; because when the proposition is to have a session for debate only unanimous consent is required; and we can never get that unanimous consent until the question is decided whether we are to have a sitting for legitimate legislative business, or whether we are to adjourn over; and then any member is perfectly justified in giving his consent to a session for debate only without any legislation, when perhaps he would not be justified in giving that consent to a session for legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will only say in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] that it requires unanimous consent even although the same course should be pursued that he proposes; unanimous consent is required in the one case as in the other.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Will the Chair allow me to suggest that this proposition is simply to allow the order already made to be modified or set aside so far as to provide for a special session for debate to-morrow? I believe that that has been the usual practice since I have been here. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question was taken on Mr. SPRINGER'S motion to reconsider the vote whereby the House agreed to adjourn until Monday next; and on a division there were—ayes 75, noes 70; no quorum voting.

Mr. SAYLER. I call for tellers.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw that call, and let us have a session for debate to-morrow.

Mr. SAYLER. I do not withdraw it.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SAYLER and Mr. HENDEE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 84.

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I now renew the request that, by unanimous consent of the House, a session shall be held to-morrow for debate only; no other business to be transacted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who have prepared speeches be allowed to print them in the RECORD.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. KASSON. That proposition has already been once objected to for reasons which I stated.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HARDENBERGH, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of papers in the case of Paymaster Meade, there having been no adverse report in the case.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

DAVID M'COMB.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. No. 2468) granting a pension to David McComb, late employé in the naval service of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David McComb, late employé in the naval service of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill is so unusual in its terms that I shall have to ask that the report be read, and I desire that the attention of the House may be attracted to it, for it is the first instance of the kind that I have known. It is a bill proposing to grant a pension to an employé. Unless there is something to indicate that he was in the naval service, the bill ought not to pass.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The petitioner, David McComb, entered the naval service of the United States in the year 1825, and was assigned to the duty of purser's clerk, and continued as such for a number of years, part of the time acting as purser, but not receiving the pay as such. From this service he was transferred in 1837, and became clerk to the commandant at the navy-yard, Washington, District of Columbia. He served in this capacity until the middle of the year 1868, when he was dismissed the service on account of physical disability which incapacitated him for the efficient discharge of duty. His physical disability is attributable to two causes, both of which it can be said occurred in the line of duty: first, to a fall which he sustained on board of the frigate Brandywine, and, second, to the severe mental strain to which he was subjected during the pressing times of the late war, he being compelled frequently to remain at his desk beyond the hour of midnight.

He is now suffering from the effects of scrotal hernia and partial paralysis, doubtless superinduced from the causes above mentioned. At present he is seventy years of age, forty-three of which he has devoted to the service of his country. He is confined to his bed continually, consequently unable in any way to assist himself. He is much reduced in circumstances, and has not the means to live without assistance, nor for medical attention, which he sadly needs. The committee, therefore, for the reasons above assigned, recommend that the prayer of the petitioner be granted by the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that this bill proposes to grant a pension to a person in the civil service of the Government, and not in the naval service proper. If I am mistaken in that respect—the gentleman who reported this bill can perhaps inform the House whether I am or not—if am mistaken, and this man was in the naval service and is entitled to a pension, it is quite certain that the term "employé" should not be used, but that a term which would indicate his rank and standing, whether as a private or an officer or a non-commissioned officer in the Navy, should be made use of. The only employment of this person seems to have been that of a clerk in a navy-yard, as I understand it, at one time acting as purser and at a more recent period, at the time when he left the service, as a clerk in a navy-yard.

Now, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, or the gentleman who reported this bill, if it is true, as I have stated and as I infer from the reading of the report, that this man was a clerk of a commandant of the Navy? If so, that fact should be stated, and it should appear upon the face of the bill to whom the pension is granted and for what character of service.

I submit that it is a very perilous precedent, and, unless the gentleman who reported this bill is present, I would move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, that the question may be considered whether we are prepared to make a civil pension list or not; whether we are prepared to enter on that business of a civil pension list, granting pensions not to persons who have served in the Army or Navy, but to persons employed in civil positions, such as clerks in the navy-yards.

Mr. RUSK. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RAINEY,] who reported this bill, is absent from the city. I do not myself recollect any of the particulars of this case, but from the reading of the bill and report it would appear that this man belonged to the civil service and should not be pensioned.

I would suggest that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, so that Mr. RAINEY, who has had charge of the bill and has had all the facts and evidence before him, may make his own statement in regard to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. RUSK. I move then that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 40) to re-imburse B. F. West & Co., of Martin's Ferry, Ohio, for internal-revenue stamps stolen from Cambridge (Ohio,) post-office;

A bill (H. R. No. 262) for the relief of the legal representatives of John W. Gall, deceased, late of Company A, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 915) for the relief of F. M. Blount, of Chicago, Illinois;

A bill (H. R. No. 648) for the relief of Andrew J. Barrett;

A bill (H. R. No. 2585) granting a pension to John Haley, late private in Company C, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 2198) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha Robinson, of Portsmouth, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 1939) granting a pension to Sarah Emmons;

A bill (H. R. No. 2079) granting a pension to Henry H. Kaiser, late private in Company H, Eighth Regiment United States Veteran Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 2271) to increase the pension of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner;

A bill (H. R. No. 2586) granting a pension to John L. Bartley;

A bill (H. R. No. 2587) granting a pension to Melvina Ingle;

A bill (H. R. No. 2382) granting the right of way to the Hot Springs Railroad Company over the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 2693) for the relief of Joseph Anderson, of Nashville, Tennessee; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of W. W. Van Antwerp, late major in the Fourth Michigan Cavalry.

The following bills were ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. No. 192) for the relief of Caroline M. Purviance and Francis Wyeth; and

A bill (S. No. 326) for the relief of the widow of L. H. Rousseau, deceased, late brigadier-general and brevet major-general of the United States.

L. H. ROUSSEAU.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The bill just passed for the relief of the widow of L. H. Rousseau is a Senate bill. There is a House bill for the same purpose, which I move may be laid on the table.

Mr. RICE. The Senate bill was before the Committee on Invalid Pensions at the same time the House bill was before the committee, and the Senate bill was reported in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, an order will be entered to lay the House bill on the table.

No objection was made.

STRAW BIDS.

Mr. STONE asked and obtained unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of the debates of this House, some remarks he had prepared on the subject of straw bids for carrying the mails. [See Appendix.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to reconsider the various votes by which the House has this day passed bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to that. I want to have an opportunity to examine these bills in case it should be necessary to reconsider any of them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion pending is the motion to adjourn.

G. W. VARNUM.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3043) for the relief of G. W. Varnum; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

HORACE JARBOE.

Mr. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3044) for the relief of Horace Jarboe; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FRANCES J. WHEELER.

Mr. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3045) for the relief of Frances J. Wheeler; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. DURHAM asked and obtained consent for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Sarah Buchanan, no adverse report having been made.

Mr. CANDLER asked and obtained consent for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of James Atkins, no adverse report having been made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WOOD, of Pennsylvania, was granted leave of absence for two weeks from to-day on account of important business.

Mr. WALLACE, of Pennsylvania, was granted leave of absence for one week on account of business.

Mr. SPARKS was granted leave of absence for one week on account of important business.

Mr. SMALLS was granted leave of absence for ten days from Monday next.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, was granted leave of absence for one day on account of important business.

Mr. ELY was granted leave of absence for one week.

SAN FRANCISCO MINT.

Mr. PAGE. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some communications from the superintendent and acting superintendent of the San Francisco mint, addressed to Dr. H. R. Linderman, Director of the Mint. They contain information which will be very useful to members when we come to debate the subject of the mints of the United States.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

The communications are as follows:

MINT OF THE UNITED STATES AT SAN FRANCISCO,
Superintendent's Office, February 16, 1876.

SIR: In reply to yours of the 17th ultimo, in relation to wages paid employés of this mint, and also inclosing comparative statement of prices paid at the various mints and assay offices, I have to say that since the receipt of the communication in question I have made careful inquiry with the view to ascertain whether such changes had been made in the rates of compensation in outside employments as would tend to abrogate the rule declaring that the wages paid in the mint shall not be in excess of those paid for similar services by outside employers, and from my investigations I find that in scarcely an instance are the mint wages in excess of those paid by private establishments for similar or corresponding services, but in nearly every instance are below the outside rates. Clerical services in this mint are compensated at the minimum rates. Book-keepers in banking and mercantile establishments, requiring no greater and in many cases a lesser knowledge of accounts than is required in this mint, and with assured guarantees of accuracy and reliability, receive from $250 to $500 per month in gold coin, while other responsible clerical positions, comparing with those held by the clerical force of this mint, command from $125 to $250 per month in coin. The pay of conductors and watchmen is barely equivalent to that given to common laborers, where no responsibility or sense of it is required, and the pay of workmen is equivalent to mechanics' wages of the second class.

Assayers receive in private establishments $7, $8, and $9 per day in gold coin. In the Pacific Refinery and other private establishments melters receive $3 per day in gold, while skilled assistants receive $6 and $7, and helpers $100 per month in gold.

In all of the founderies and machine-shops $5 per day in gold is the ruling rate of wages for first-class machinists, while blacksmiths' wages range from $5 to $5.50 in coin. For the cutters, annealers, and rollers we have no exact means of comparison, but their duties require a knowledge of machinery, with the additional special training and experience for their work.

The pay of adjusters is smaller than the compensation awarded women in outside pursuits. In the school department the salaries of lady teachers range from $70 to $125 per month in gold. In the county clerk's office, where women are employed in copying by the folio, they earn about $80 per month in gold. In the post-office they receive $75 per month, gold. In none of these occupations is the work as laborious or confining as in the adjusting rooms of this mint, nor do they work as many hours in the day.

In regard to engineers, the position of chief engineer of this mint corresponds very nearly with that of superintending engineer in the steamship companies. Mr. Waddell, with the Oriental and Occidental Steamship Company, receives $3,600 per year, and Mr. Birmingham, with the Colorado Steam Navigation Company, receives $4,000 per year; Fowler, of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, receives $3,600 a year—all in coin. In the California Sugar-Refinery the engineer receives a salary of $175 gold per month, with a house to live in and other perquisites. The engineer of the Pacific Refinery receives $150 per month; that of the Golden Gate Flour-mills, $6 per day, and of the National Flour-mills, $150 per month—all in gold. The engineers of the steamship companies receive $100 to $150 per month in coin, live on board ship at no expense, and are allowed rations while on shore.

The pay of firemen is about $3 per day, in gold, but those employed in the mint are competent men, able to run the engines in case of necessity, tend the pumps, &c., and should rank as third-class engineers, by reason of their capabilities and the double and sometimes treble duties imposed upon them. This explanation, I apprehend, takes in the entire force of the mint, and it will be seen that the wages paid here are, as a rule, lower than those paid for similar services with equal responsibilities and the requirement of equal capacities in outside employments.

In your communication you state: "I am aware that the cost of living is greater on the Pacific coast than in the Eastern States, but not to the extent of the difference in the rates of compensation." You will, I trust, pardon my suggestion that your ideas of the relative cost of living on the eastern and western slopes may have been derived from your experience as a temporary sojourner and traveler. A comparison of hotel rates and charges is well calculated to deceive one in this regard; but while hotel living is as cheap if not cheaper here than in the East, the cost of maintaining a household here is probably double, and more particularly among those who are compelled to toil for a livelihood. Rents are exceedingly high, as are all the necessaries of housekeeping when purchased in small quantities, owing in a great measure to the absence of a small currency to accommodate the requirements of those in poor or moderate circumstances.

For these and other reasons it is generally conceded that the cost of living in California is at least 50 per cent. more than in the Eastern States.

Very respectfully,

FRANK W. GROSS,
Acting Superintendent.

Hon. H. R. LINDERMAN,
Director of the Mint, Washington, D. C.

MINT OF THE UNITED STATES AT SAN FRANCISCO,
Superintendent's Office, March 24, 1876.

SIR: In reply to yours of the 10th instant, accompanying copy of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, calling my attention to the provisions of the same relating to this mint and requesting my views as to what amendments may be required to enable this mint "to transact its business properly, comply with the regulations, and meet the work required of it," I have to say:

In order to comply with your request it is necessary to dissect the bill, so far as it relates to this mint, and examine its various provisions in their order.

As to salaries, the reduction of my own is in conformity with my wishes, expresssed long since, and which I endeavored of my own motion to carry into effect, as will be shown by the records of your office.

The reduction in the pay of the operative officers, whose qualifications are necessarily of a high professional and scientific order, requiring special skill and training, large experience, and unblemished reputations for integrity, does not appear to me to be called for upon any considerations of public policy. To reduce the pay of such officials to a minimum of compensation would have the effect of depriving the Mint of the services of the most competent men and supplying their places with others of mediocre abilities who lack the qualifications to earn a livelihood in outside pursuits. The proposition to consolidate the offices of chief clerk and cashier is absurd on its face, as is also the idea of reducing their salaries to $1,250 each per annum.

It would be an absolute impossibility for one man to perform the duties of both positions, as you very well know, and neither could be dispensed with except to the great injury and demoralization of the service. The chief clerk is the executive officer of the superintendent, and under the law is the acting superintendent during the superintendent's absence. It is necessary that he should be familiar with the operations of every department of the mint, and his time is constantly occupied between the different departments and in the management of the general business of the institution. The cashier's duties confine him constantly behind his counter in the receiving and disbursing of funds, and do not permit of his leaving his post to attend to other business. The cashier of this mint receives and disburses from $26,000,000 to $30,000,000 per annum in coin, besides the appropriations made by Congress, keeps his books and accounts, and for the services performed and the responsibilities incurred is inadequately paid at this time.

So far as the salaries of clerks and wages of workmen are concerned, I beg leave to call your attention to the letter of February 15, ultimo, from the acting superintendent at that date. Reiterating the facts enumerated in that letter and the deductions made, I have to add that the compensation of mint employés is reduced still lower than that paid in outside pursuits in the fact that the great majority of them are suspended from fifteen to thirty days without pay on the occasion of every annual settlement. Under the provisions of the bill which you forward the chief melters cannot receive pay to exceed $6 per day. The effect of the enactment of such a law would be to immediately force these men to accept positions in private establishments, where similar services now command compensations 15 to 25 per cent. in advance of those now paid in this mint. Such a result would inevitably prove most disastrous to the service. The chief melters in this mint have had many years of experience in their business, and through their thorough understanding of its needs and the intelligent care they are enabled to exercise, they save what would be lost by inexperienced men, and which amounts to more to the Government than the entire aggregate of their wages. To place inexperienced men in their places would be equivalent to taking from the Government an amount of bullion, through the wastage, of more than twenty times the sum that would be saved in the difference of wages.

The requirements in lines 901, 902, and 903, limiting the compensation of all employés of a certain grade to $3 per day in currency, would, if enforced, have the effect of substituting in place of intelligent, competent, and trustworthy men the very lowest order of manual labor. The compensation is about the same that is paid to those laborers who drive paving-blocks, shovel sand, and dig ditches, and would command a similar order of talent and a corresponding degree of responsibility.

The addenda to line 904, providing that employés shall be paid "only for actual service," is a gratuitous insult to this mint, having its origin in malice or misrepresentation. There is not a man or woman in the pay of this mint, nor has there ever been, who did not perform his or her full quota of service for the compensation rendered. I challenge here, in this and in every other respect affecting the management of this mint, comparison with the workings of any other mint or assay office in the United States as to the amount of work performed in proportion to the number employed to perform it, the ratio of cost of coinage per dollar or piece, and the ratio of expense to the coinage executed. In the light of the record of this mint, with which you are familiar, and in which I believe I have a pardonable pride, I cannot repress my indignation at the imputations cast upon it, and that it should be singled out for unjust and gratuitous attack. If the faithful performance of a public service is to furnish provocation or opportunity for censure by the legislative branch of the Government, then I must confess to a life-long misapprehension of the scope and intent of republican institutions.

The appropriation of $75,000 for "material and repairs, fuel, lights, chemicals, and other necessaries" is totally inadequate to the necessities of this mint, and which is in no degree benefited by the provision of the bill which permits the employment of the refining and parting charges to defray the cost of conducting the refinery. The charges thus collected would barely pay the cost of conducting the refinery alone. Under the terms of the bill, therefore, the only appropriation for the ordinary and contingent expenses for the ensuing year would be the sum of $75,000, the inadequacy of which amount has been shown in previous years in the performance of far less work than is now required to be executed. The appropriation of the last fiscal year was $75,000, with a deficiency which was provided for by Congress of $19,000, making a total of $94,000. The estimates were based on the proposed coinage of gold and trade-dollars alone, and the entire amount sufficed for a gold coinage of $26,000,000 and a silver coinage of $1,330,000, the great bulk of the latter being in trade-dollars.

During the coming fiscal year the coinage of this mint promises to be far in excess of any previous year's, and the demand for gold coin will undoubtedly exceed that of any previous year by at least 33 per cent. This will be occasioned mainly by the great amount of gold parted from the Doré bullion produced by the Comstock mines, while the gold products of the Pacific States and Territories will be unusually large by reason of the extraordinary fall of rain and snow during this winter, furnishing an abundance of water for placer mining. It is further estimated that the trade-dollar coinage of this mint will average $500,000 per month during the remainder of the calendar year.

Were the operations of this mint confined to the coinage of gold and trade-dollars only, I would endeavor to make an amount equal to last year's appropriation suffice; but, in addition to the foregoing, the mint will be required to coin some $500,000 a month in subsidiary silver coin, the cost of manufacturing which is 2 per cent. on the issue. It would therefore be impossible, with the proposed appropriation, to continue the coinage of subsidiary coins in addition to the gold and trade-dollar coinage. An enforcement of the rules of the Department would require a division of the appropriation into twelve equal parts, and that in no one month should the expenses exceed the quota set apart for that period. As the case now stands, I am compelled to accept for coinage any amount of bullion that may be deposited. It would therefore be manifestly absurd to expect this mint to perform an indefinite or extraordinary amount of work, the cost of doing which is clearly defined, upon an allowance that would be totally inadequate to meet the cost of such a performance. In the event of a minimum appropriation for the execution of its work, it would be necessary to empower me with the option of rejecting all tenders of bullion for deposit for coinage at any period of the month when the amount previously deposited necessitated in its manipulation an expenditure exceeding the quota of the appropriation set apart to defray the expenses of that month.

I have to ask, therefore, that the sum of $94,000 be appropriated for the coinage of gold and trade-dollars, and that the sum of $120,000 be appropriated to defray the actual cost of manufacturing subsidiary silver coins, of which last-named sum $50,000 should be added to the appropriation for wages of workmen, and $70,000 to the appropriation for contingent expenses, making the total appropriation for wages of workmen $275,000, and for contingent expenses $164,000.

In the expenditure of the moneys allowed for contingent expenses the greatest economy and care will be observed in the purchase of supplies; not a dollar will be wasted, and should any surplus remain at the close of the fiscal year, it will be covered into the Treasury.

Very respectfully,

O. H. LA GRANGE,
Superintendent.

Hon. H. R. LINDERMAN,
Director of the Mint, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist upon my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BEEBE: The petition of citizens of Middletown, New York, for a protective tariff, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. CRAPO: The petition of H. B. Cattell and others, for a post-route from Gaithersburgh to Goshen, Maryland, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. DANFORD: The petition of P. B. Conn and other printers and publishers of Steubenville, Ohio, against the manufacturing, selling, and printing of envelopes and postal cards by the Government below their cost, and delivering them free of cost through the mails at a loss to the Government, to the same committee.

By Mr. HEWITT, of New York: The petition of John F. Henry, Curren & Co., and other merchants of New York, for further legislation to protect trade-marks, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. HOPKINS: Seven petitions from 359 business men of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for a law regulating commerce and to prevent discriminations by common carriers, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of the heirs of James Barnett, deceased, for compensation for services rendered by him as a lieutenant in the Second Virginia Regiment in continental establishment during the revolutionary war, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. JENKS: The petition of soldiers of the war of 1861, for bounty and bounty land, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of United States pensioners for the repeal of section 1, act of 18th June, 1874, relating to a commutation for artificial limbs, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of 23 business men of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, against making any change in existing tariff laws at the present time, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of 504 business men of Trenton, New Jersey, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana: The petition of 400 soldiers and sailors of Indiana, for the equalization of bounties, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, papers relating to the application for relief of Lieutenant John C. White, First United States Artillery, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JOHN REILLY: The petition of Martin Lewis, M. B. Hunter, and others, soldiers in the late war, that the Treasury Department be authorized to loan colonies of soldiers with their families (when they number one hundred families in each colony) $500 each, or $50,000 to each colony, the money to be used only for settlement and cultivation of lands granted them by act of Congress, the money to be loaned for six years at not more than 3½ per cent., to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. RIDDLE: A paper relating to the petition of Mrs. Laura M. Lessessne, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SINNICKSON: The petition of David Griner and other citizens of Cumberland County, New Jersey, that the tariff laws remain undisturbed, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania: Memorial of tobacco manufacturers of Cincinnati, Ohio, and Covington, Kentucky, for the reduction of the tax on tobacco to sixteen cents, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of envelope manufacturers, printers, stationers, and lithographers of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, for a change of the law by which the Government secures a monopoly of printing stamped envelopes and cards, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. THOMPSON: The petition of Goodrich & Porter and others, of Haverhill, Massachusetts, that duty on English lastings and serges be changed to an ad valorem duty, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of L. Johnson & Co. and others, of Haverhill, Massachusetts, for an amendment of section 3020 of the Revised Statutes, by inserting the words "boots and shoes" after the words "United States," to the same committee.

By Mr. WHEELER: The petition of Mrs. Peter Stryker, chairman of the executive committee of Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New York, and of 6,000 temperance and Christian men and women of that State, that Congress appoint a commission of inquiry to investigate and report upon the effects of the alcoholic liquor traffic on pauperism, crime, revenue, taxation, and the general welfare of the country, and that the liquor traffic may be prohibited in the District of Columbia and the Territories, to the same committee.

By Mr. WOODWORTH: The petition of Ed. McGinnis and 576 other citizens of Youngstown, Ohio, for the repeal of the resumption act of January 14, 1874, that national-bank notes be retired, and that a bond bearing a rate of interest at 3.65 per cent. per annum, payable in national legal-tender notes, and interchangeable at the option of the holder for national legal-tender notes, be issued, the proceeds to be applied to the payment of outstanding gold-bearing bonds, to the same committee.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 8, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House made yesterday the session of to-day is to be devoted to debate only, without the transaction of any business. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] will resume the chair.

QUIETING LAND TITLES.

Mr. LAWRENCE. On the 12th of January I introduced a bill (H. R. No. 844) relating to land patents, which was referred to the Judiciary Committee, by whom it has been fully considered and directed to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be passed by this branch of Congress. The bill is in these words:

That all patents for land which have been or may be issued shall in all actions hereafter commenced to recover the title or possession of said land for all purposes of any statute or law limiting the time for commencing actions have effect as if issued to the party entitled thereto at the time such party was or may be authorized to make any proof of a right to such patent.

I will state in brief the ground upon which the authority to pass this bill rests and the object of and necessity for it.

There can be no doubt of the right of Congress to pass it. In Bagnell vs. Broderick, 13 Peters, the Supreme Court said:

That Congress had the sole power to declare the dignity and effect of a patent issuing from the United States; that a patent carries the fee, and is the best title known to a court of law.

This doctrine is well supported. (Martin vs. Waddell, 16 Peters, 367; Hooper vs. Scheimer, 23 Howard, 249; Morton vs. Green, 2 Nebraska, 441; same case in Supreme Court of United States, October term, 1874; Fenn vs. Holms, 21 Howard, 481; Bennett vs. Butterworth, 11 Howard, 669.) In the case of Wilcox vs. Jackson, 13 Peters, page 516, the Supreme Court said:

It has been said that the State of Illinois has a right to declare by law that a title derived from the United States, which by their laws is only inchoate and imperfect, shall be deemed as perfect a title as if a patent had been issued from the United States; and the construction of her own courts seems to give that effect to her statute. That State has an undoubted right to legislate as she may please in regard to the remedies to be prosecuted in her courts, and to regulate the disposition of the property of her citizens by descent, devise, and alienation. But the property in question was a part of the public domain of the United States. Congress is invested by the Constitution with the power of disposing of and making needful rules and regulations respecting it. Congress has declared, as we have said, by its legislation, that in such cases as this a patent is necessary to complete the title. But in this case no patent has issued; and therefore by the laws of the United States the legal title has not passed, but remains in the United States. Now, if it were competent for a State Legislature to say that, notwithstanding this, the title shall be deemed to have passed, the effect of this would be, not that Congress had the power of disposing of the public lands and prescribing the rules and regulations concerning that disposition, but that Illinois possessed it. That would be to make the laws of Illinois paramount to those of Congress in relation to a subject confided by the Constitution to Congress only. And the practical result in this very case would be, by force of State legislation, to take from the United States their own land, against their own will, and against their own laws. We hold the true principle to be this: that whenever the question in any court, State or Federal, is whether a title to land which had once been property of the United States has passed, that question must be resolved by the laws of the United States; but that whenever, according to those laws, the title shall have passed, then that property, like all other property in that State, is subject to State legislation, so far as that legislation is consistent with the admission that the title passed and vested according to the laws of the United States.

It is competent then for Congress to pass this bill, at least in its prospective character. There is a necessity for this bill. Every lawyer understands that in the ordinary modes of acquiring title to land from the Government, the legal title or fee-simple does not pass until the patent issues; certificates of entry under the pre-emption and homestead laws, and under the laws authorizing sales, only convey an equity or equitable title. (Carroll vs. Safford, 3 Howard, 441; Frisbie vs. Whitney, 9 Wallace, 187; Bagnell vs. Broderick, 13 Peters, 450.)

It is equally well settled that while the legal title remains in the Government the statute of limitations does not run in favor of a party in possession of land. This results from a well-known principle, "Nullum tempus occurrit regi." The result of this is sometimes productive of great evils, great wrong, great hardship. Let me illustrate: A party makes an entry of land and procures a certificate of entry from the proper land office. By this he is the owner of an equitable title to the land. He neglects to procure a patent, and the legal title remains in the Government. He sells the land, receives full payment, and makes a conveyance to the purchaser. The purchaser goes into possession, occupies, improves, and sells to others, who do likewise. When the land has been occupied for half a century the heirs of the party who originally entered it procure a patent and bring ejectment, and at law they may recover, so far as any protection can arise under the statute of limitations. The statute of limitations gives no protection. I know a court of equity might, in such case, afford relief to the occupant. But suppose the first purchaser from the party who originally entered the land has lost the evidence of his purchase, or never, in fact, procured a deed of conveyance. In such case a court of equity would afford no relief to the party in possession, unless it be upon the doctrine of a "presumed grant." If in such case the patent had issued at the proper time, the legal title would have passed from the Government, and the party in possession could protect himself against an ejectment suit by pleading the statute of limitations. His defense would be at law. He would not be required to go into a court of equity for relief.

In the Virginia military district in Kentucky and in Ohio it is no unusual thing for entries and surveys to be made and the issuing of the patent to be delayed many years. I know of cases where entries and surveys have been made eighty years and yet no patent is issued. I have heard it said that in the Virginia military district in Ohio, only a few counties of the State, there are more than 40,000 acres covered by ancient entries and surveys occupied by parties whose possession and ownership date back from twenty to seventy-five years, and yet they are unconscious of the fact that a patent may suddenly issue to some adverse claimant who will or may harrass them with a lawsuit, or extort money to secure a "compromise."

In all such cases I believe that either a court of law or equity should and would afford relief to the occupants by "presuming a grant" from the original owner of the entry and survey after a possession which the statute of limitations would protect, if the patent had been issued at the date of the survey which perfected a right to a patent. The reasons for this and the authorities which support it have been stated somewhat fully in an article which will be found in the Philadelphia American Law Register for February, 1874, pages 69 to 76 inclusive. I will not repeat now what is there said.

But there are some other reasons why this bill should pass. It will quiet land titles without the aid of the courts, at least to such an extent that those who seek to speculate against occupants by "compromises" will find "their occupation gone." It will settle the question, so that it will be no longer subject to controversy, that the courts can and shall afford proper relief. It will be eminently just. It will prevent parties from profiting by the mere delay in procuring patents. It will give repose and security to many land titles. This is essential to the security and proper improvement of homes and to the prosperity of their occupants. It will encourage industry. It is right. It will put an end to fraudulent and rascally claims. It has the sanction of the Judiciary Committee. By direction of that committee this bill is to be submitted to the House, and I hope it will pass.

In further explanation of the necessity of this bill I present extracts from two letters from the General Land Office, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1876.

SIR: In compliance with your application of the 10th instant, received through Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE, of the House of Representatives, I transmit herewith a certified copy of page 69, volume 10, of the Record of Virginia Military Patents.

As you will perceive, this transcript is very defective, but is an exact counterpart of the original page, &c., as the same now appears.

There is no doubt the original patent was correctly issued March 21, 1823; but the record thereof was neglected to be properly made, and is in the exact condition, with many others of a like character in the Virginia military district, Ohio, as set forth in the inclosed exemplification.

This Office has repeatedly in its annual reports called attention to these imperfect records of patents. Thus, in the report of 1856: "Authority from Congress is desired to perfect a number of the Virginia military records filed in this Office, in which the surveys of the land patented are merely posted (pasted) in the records, and in some instances not inserted at all; consequently showing an imperfect recital of title. As the lands so granted are valuable, and this Office is the source from which parties interested can alone obtain official evidence of their title, it is important the records should be perfected." The same recommendation was made in the report of 1857. But nothing has resulted therefrom, and all that can be done in such matters is to give an exact transcript of the volume and page, with the contents thereof, where the patent purports to have been recorded.

As these errors and omissions occurred in and about the year 1823, the present administration of the Office can in no wise be held responsible therefor, especially when repeated efforts have been made to remedy the defects in question.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. K. LIPPINCOTT,
Acting Commissioner.

E. J. HOWENSTINE, Esq.,
Bellefontaine, Ohio.

In another letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office there is this statement:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 14, 1876.

SIR: * * * The patent in question purports to have been issued in 1823, and I find from examination that several hundred others are in like condition as to the record thereof.

As stated in my letter to Mr. Howenstine, attention has repeatedly been called to these defects and authority asked to remedy the same, but without result.

In the case of the records of patents for services in the war of 1812, under the act of Congress of May 6, 1812, many thousands were only signed with the initial letters of the President's and Commissioner's names. But these defects, in cases of the exemplifications thereof, were cured by the act of Congress of March 3, 1843. (See United States Revised Statutes, § 891.) Nothing, however, has been done to cure the omissions, &c., in the case of the defective records of patents for lands in the said Virginia military district.

The letter of Mr. Howenstine is herewith returned. The fees, $2, were received.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. K. LIPPINCOTT,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, I submit these remarks now in order to save the time of the House when the bill is finally reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, which it will be when the committee is again called.

SPECIE PAYMENTS, REPUBLICAN POLICY, ETC.

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Speaker, on the 29th of last month the republicans of Vermont met in State convention at Burlington and, true to their history and principles, unanimously resolved—

That the best interests of all citizens, of every condition and pursuit, imperatively demand the speediest return to a specie basis of values and currency, and we hail with gratification the act of a republican Congress definitely providing for that end, and we are firmly opposed to the repeal thereof or to any step backward in the matter.

This clear, bold, and manly declaration by the republicans of that noble State I proudly adopt as the key-note to my remarks to-day.

The present depressed and languishing condition of business in every department, the utter stagnation of trade in all its different branches throughout the entire country, and our waning commerce with foreign nations, reaching back nearly three years and continuing without abatement to the present time, have given distinguished prominence to the subject of the national currency, and the importance now assigned to it in the popular mind is well measured and attested by the fact that it is the only real question now occupying any considerable share of the attention of the people and can hardly fail to be the one on which the next presidential contest must be fought out.

The subject of the national finances, as presented to us to-day, is in no sense a party question, and no true patriot and statesman would for a moment seek to drag it down in discussion from its conceded lofty plane to the degrading level of partisan politics.

The great problem now submitted to us for solution is not, what man or what party is most to blame or is to be held responsible for the condition of the country and the crushing evils under which we are now suffering? because the absolute demonstration of that issue would not relieve the people or mitigate their calamities; but the great work to which this Congress should apply itself is to inaugurate and adopt such measures as will lift the burdens from the people and build up a highway of industrial enterprise upon which the people, redeemed from the curse and thraldom of a depreciated currency and all its attendant evils, may once more walk in peace and security.

It is to us the people are now looking for redemption, and we shall criminally fail of our duty if we refuse or neglect at this session to mature such legislation as will, in connection with the act of 1875, appreciate our currency and enable us to redeem our pledges and resume the use of good money on the 1st of January, 1879.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should not have referred in this discussion to parties or politics, or said one word upon that subject, had it not been for the very remarkable speech made the other day by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS,] in which the republican party is not only held responsible for the present financial condition of the country, but is saddled with all the frauds and sins committed against the Government and the people by everybody for the last fifteen years.

Sir, I have been a republican since 1854; I helped in my feeble way to organize the party in my State in that year; and I have labored for the welfare and prosperity of it from that time down to the present. I know and am frank to confess its errors, while I mourn over its blunders; I know its history and exult in its achievements; I am proud of its record and glorious triumphs in the cause of honest government, of civil liberty, and equal rights. And, sir, while I hold a seat upon this floor I will not allow any man, however high and exalted he may be, with impunity to vilify and defame that party, which is composed of the noblest men, inspired by the purest principles and having the most illustrious history, of any party that ever existed on earth.

What spirit or feeling actuated or moved the honorable gentleman to make such a speech it is not for me to say, whether it was a desire to become notorious or to show his new democratic friends how zealous and enthusiastic young converts always are.

Whatever may have been the cause, it is perhaps enough for us to know now that the republican party has lost this "blazing star" from its constellation, and that it now sparkles and glows in the coronet which adorns the darkened brow of modern democracy.

Every statement made by the gentleman with reference to the republican party as connected in any manner with the question of the currency is overwhelmingly contradicted by the facts of history. Sir, there is no sane man North or South who dares for a moment deny that the present unfortunate condition of the country is the direct result of our legal-tender irredeemable greenbacks, and that the depreciation of our currency is the bitter fruit of treason, the loss of more than 250,000 men, a public debt of two billions and a half of dollars, the loss of the productive labor of two millions and a half of men for four years, 213,000 pensioners, with woes unnumbered, and that these calamities are all due to rebellion and our civil war, and that the war was precipitated upon us by the democratic party, of which the distinguished member from New York is now a bright and shining light.

Seemingly filled with malignant hate toward the party he has left, ashamed no doubt of his new allies, knowing that the people see and understand their factious schemes and hollow-hearted hypocrisy, and goaded to madness by their signal defeats and blunders during the present session, the gentleman pours out his denunciations forgetful of the truth of history or the honor of his country, and, like Samson of old, attempts in his desperate struggles to pull down the majestic temple of liberty in order that he may be buried in its ruins. In his wild frenzy and audacious impudence, he declares that the republican party in this House "have opposed retrenchment at every step" and that "they have attempted to defeat every economic endeavor."

Now, sir, what are the facts? I undertake to say directly the reverse of what the gentleman has stated, and the records and journals of the House will show it. Why, sir, how does such language as this sound coming from the lips of a man whose days have been spent and whose political education has been acquired in a city which can boast of such men as McCunn and Barnard and William M. Tweed?

While the republicans in this House are fully aware, as the country is, that there is no honest purpose on the part of the democratic party in making these reductions and pretended reforms, but that this "economical spasm," contrary to every other act of their whole lives, is all for political effect and to create capital for the coming presidential campaign, yet in all cases where it has appeared that reductions could be fairly made without robbing honest labor of its hard-earned wages, as in the case of many of the clerks and employés in the different Departments of the Government, impairing the efficiency and working power of its different branches, or tending to the manifest injury of the people, these bogus reformers and retrenchers have received the hearty co-operation of every man on this side of the House through his voice and vote, and no man has more perfect knowledge of that fact than the honorable gentleman from New York.

Mr. AINSWORTH. If the gentleman will permit me, I desire to inquire of him what reduction the republicans have favored?

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman pays strict attention he will find out before I get through.

Mr. AINSWORTH. I understood him to say that every reduction proposed here has been favored by the republicans. I deny it; and I ask him what single reduction they have favored in any case?

Mr. JOYCE. I have only to repeat that if the gentleman will pay strict attention he will find it all out before I get through.

Mr. AINSWORTH. Can the gentleman give me any instance in which the republicans have supported a reduction?

Mr. JOYCE. I do not desire to be interrupted any further. The gentleman can get all the information he desires if he will only wait and keep as quiet as possible.

Mr. AINSWORTH. Certainly; if the gentleman does not want to yield, that is all right.

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Speaker, upon these questions of "retrenchment" and "economical endeavor," as demonstrated by the democratic party upon this floor during the present session, the republicans are willing to stand upon the record; and if the gentleman from New York and his party can satisfy the people of this country that they are honest reformers, and that they have spent the four months of this session already gone in making honest and successful "economic endeavors" for "retrenchment" instead of in bitter wranglings among themselves over the spoils of office, demonstrating in the history of their caucus bill their total inability to grapple with the question of the currency, and deciding who should be honored by their brief smiles, then I shall believe that their powers of persuasion and legerdemain are equal to their inconsiderate assertions and their brazen and insolent mendacity.

Sir, I have not the time nor desire to follow the learned gentleman through all his devious wanderings or to answer all his reckless and fallacious assumptions regarding the policy of the republican party upon the question of the national finances, and shall therefore content myself with the comforting assurance that the temple which the gentleman labored so hard to destroy is yet standing firm and erect, and that "the flag is still there;" while the honorable gentleman himself and his democratic allies, "sickened with their defeats, mourning" their "falsity to true democratic principles," having "belied the trust of the people" and blasphemed "the memory of Jefferson and Jackson and Wright," now lie buried beyond the hope of any political resurrection beneath the righteous indignation of all honest and candid men.

Why, sir, if I had the time I would like to call the attention of this House to some few of the multitude of good things that the republican party has done within the past ten years. I would like to call its attention to the fact that within that time it has reduced the public expenditures over one billion twenty-two millions; that it has paid more than five hundred and forty millions of the public debt; that it has reduced the interest on that debt nearly forty-one millions; that it has saved to the Government annually five millions in interest by funding a portion of the debt; that it has reduced the internal-revenue taxes nearly two hundred millions, the customs taxes sixty millions, and other taxes, by special acts of Congress, three hundred and four millions.

Now, sir, above and beyond all this, the republican party has always shown, and shows to-day, an honest zeal in exposing and bringing to trial and punishment every man within the pale of the party who has in any manner betrayed its confidence or violated the laws of the Republic. I challenge comparison of its course during its whole history with the conduct of the democratic party down to the present moment, and then let the people say into which scale they will cast their influence and their votes.

Sir, I firmly believe that the republican party, with its brilliant record of grand achievements, marred, as I am compelled to confess it is, here and there with blunders and errors, stands refined and purified before the country to-day stronger than ever before in its great and noble principles and as the only party in whom the people have confidence or in whose hands they dare to trust the control of this Government, and to which they confidently and proudly look as the hope and salvation of the rights and liberties of the people.

Having said thus much in answer to what I conceived to be an uncalled-for, unwarranted, unprovoked, and malicious attack upon the republican party, a party which saved the Republic and made it possible for us to be here, I now invite the careful attention and candid consideration of the House to the history of our legal-tender legislation, the present financial condition of the country, the evil and ruinous results of a depreciated currency, and the remedy by which we can obtain relief.

The financial condition of our country at the present time is unlike that of any other solvent nation on the face of the globe, and invokes the sound and honest experience and statesmanship and the united efforts of the best men of all political parties upon this floor and elsewhere to devise and adopt the best means to appreciate our currency and breathe life into our prostrate and exhausted industries.

We present to the world the wonderful phenomenon of a country containing over forty millions of enterprising, inventive, and educated people, rich and unlimited in resources, with no war, pestilence, or famine to retard our growth or mar our prosperity, with nearly eight hundred millions of currency in circulation, the best and safest banking system in the world, and yet our commerce is sadly deranged, our factories and workshops shut up, our ship-yards deserted, every business interest and industry of the country almost entirely crippled and paralyzed, confidence swept away, and bankruptcy spreading its dark pall over all classes of our people. The cause of this universal business depression and commercial gloom is perfectly apparent, and is written so plainly upon the dark background of our experience for the last three years that he who runs, though a fool, may read.

By the universal consent of mankind, in all ages and in all countries, gold has always been the recognized standard of value the world over; "it is possessed of all the requisite elements and characteristics to enable it to perform all the functions of such a universal measure; it always has a certain and stable value; unlike all other things, it is capable of almost unlimited division and is indestructible; while the great laws of supply and demand reach every other article of trade and commerce, gold is always exempt from their operation and enjoys an eternity of peace, certainty, and infinite demand." All else changes, varies, and fluctuates; but gold remains unchanged and unchangeable, yesterday, to-day, and forever.

Mr. Speaker, among all the evils with which mankind have been cursed and nations have been afflicted there are none which have fallen with more crushing and grievous weight upon all classes, and especially upon the producer and laborer, than a disordered and depreciated currency. These two classes stand under and support those of all other callings, professions, and avocations; consequently they are the first and last to feel the overpowering burden of this destructive scourge. I speak then to-day, sir, for the millions of producing and laboring men throughout this great country, who are demanding a strict performance of every national obligation and a speedy return to a gold standard and honest money.

The plain, unvarnished statement of the case is that we are attempting to run this Government without any recognized standard of values, with a vast volume of depreciated, fluctuating paper currency, much more than is required by the wants and demands of trade, every dollar of which is irredeemable; and the question now presented is whether we shall lie still and float with the current, plunge into unlimited inflation, or by a wise and gradual contraction appreciate our greenback currency, and thus in the only way possible bring it to par with gold.

The condition of the country which led to the legal-tender legislation of 1862 and 1863 and the overpowering necessity which justified it are very fully and clearly set forth by Mr. Justice Strong in the opinion of the Supreme Court, delivered by him and reported in 12 Wallace, in which said legal-tender acts were declared by a majority of the court to be constitutional.

After discussing at great length the constitutional question involved and disposing of that, he then proceeds to speak of the circumstances in which the Government was placed when Congress attempted to make Treasury notes a legal tender in the following terse and emphatic language:

> Suffice it to say that a civil war was then raging which seriously threatened the overthrow of the Government and the destruction of the Constitution itself. It demanded the equipment and support of large armies and navies and the employment of money to an extent beyond the capacity of all ordinary sources of supply. Meanwhile the public Treasury was nearly empty and the credit of the Government, if not stretched to its utmost tension, had become nearly exhausted. Money-eyed institutions had advanced largely of their means, and more could not be expected of them. They had been compelled to suspend specie payments.
> Taxation was inadequate to pay even the interest on the debt already incurred, and it was impossible to await the income of additional taxes.
> The necessity was immediate and pressing. The Army was unpaid. There was then due to soldiers in the field nearly a score of millions of dollars. The requisitions from the War and Navy Departments for supplies exceeded fifty millions and the current expenditure was over one million per day. The entire amount of coin in the country, including that in private hands as well as that in banking institutions, was insufficient to supply the need of the Government three months, had it all been poured into the Treasury at once. Of foreign credit we had none. We say nothing of the overhanging paralysis of trade and of business generally, which threatened loss of confidence in the ability of the Government to maintain its continued existence, and therewith the complete destruction of all remaining national credit. It was at such a time and in such circumstances that Congress was called upon to devise means for maintaining the Army and Navy, for securing the large supplies of money needed, and, indeed, for the preservation of the Government created by the Constitution. It was at such a time and in such an emergency that the legal-tender acts were passed.

In the spring of 1861, when actual hostilities commenced between the North and South, the armies of the United States numbered more than a hundred thousand men, to which large re-enforcements were added in the summer and autumn following. The payment of these troops and the other vastly-augmented expenditures of the Government soon drained the country of gold, and in December of that year specie payments were suspended by the Government, and the banks throughout the country immediately followed.

The Secretary of the Treasury undertook to issue Treasury notes with which to meet the payment of the troops and the increasing expenditures, but it was soon found that from their isolation these notes had no standing of value in the market—could not be depended on—and the result was that on the 25th of February, 1862, Congress passed an act authorizing the issue of one hundred and fifty millions of Government notes and, in order to make them equivalent in value to gold and prevent their depreciation, invested them with the majesty and sovereign power of legal tender for all debts and obligations, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt.

The enormous gulf created by the war soon swallowed up the issue of notes under the act of February 25, and on the 11th of July following Congress authorized the issue of one hundred and fifty millions more under the same conditions, and clothed them with the same rights, privileges, and powers as the first.

Under the provisions of the acts authorizing the issuing of the three millions of legal-tenders already referred to, the holder had the right at any time when he had no use for the currency to fund them into bonds bearing 6 per cent. interest and payable in gold. This wise provision for funding the greenbacks had a very marked and salutary effect upon the market value of the notes, by connecting them with a gold bond and making them convertible into an obligation which would bring gold. It held them up nearly to par and prevented their depreciation and fluctuation, which without such a provision would have certainly followed.

Under the funding system as provided in said acts I have no doubt the Government would have been able to have met all the demands of the war and maintained a volume of currency sufficient for the wants of trade at or nearly at par, so that in a very short time after the war closed specie payments might have been resumed without any appreciable derangement of the business of the country or the infliction of any serious injury upon the people.

It has been truthfully said that "a strong impression that something must be done is the origin of many bad measures."

It was no doubt this "impression" which led to what I deem to be the mistaken policy adopted by Congress in the act of March 3, 1863, when, because money did not flow into the Treasury fast enough to meet the demands of the Government, and for the purpose of forcing the people to fund the Government notes at once, it was deemed advisable to issue another batch of legal-tenders, enough to make up four hundred millions in all, and provide in said act that the right to fund all of the outstanding legal-tenders which had been issued under and by virtue of the acts aforesaid should expire on the 1st of July following. The repeal of the provisions of the statute giving the holder of the greenbacks the right to fund them at pleasure resulted, as has been said, in making "financial orphans" of them. It at once severed their connection with and isolated them from all other Government currency and obligations, and their rapid depreciation became at once as sure and certain as their existence.

The abandonment of the funding policy at a time when, as I believe, it ought to have been tenaciously adhered to, led the people in time to look upon the greenbacks as money, and to forget that they were the mere evidence of a debt which the Government had solemnly pledged itself to pay in coin.

In order to check the increasing depreciation of the currency and stay up the credit of the Government Congress, on the 30th of June, 1864, passed an act providing that the total amount of United States notes issued or to be issued should not exceed four hundred millions, which gave the people to understand that the Government was not committed to unlimited inflation, and that the greenbacks would in time be redeemed with gold or its equivalent.

Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] said the other day:

> When the war was over and the Union saved, one of the first duties of the Government was to improve its credit and restore a sound currency to the people.

The administration was deeply impressed with this policy, and the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report for December, 1865, expressed the opinion that the legal-tender acts were war measures, and ought not to remain in force one day longer than should be necessary to enable the people to prepare for a return to the gold standard. And the House of Representatives during the same month passed a resolution, by a vote of 144 yeas to 6 nays, "cordially concurring in the views of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the necessity of the contraction of the currency, with a view to as early a resumption of specie payments as the business interests of the country will permit." And in order to carry into effect this resolution, Congress, by an act approved March 12, 1866, again authorized the funding of the legal-tender notes, and under the operation of that act more than $72,000,000 were retired. But in January, 1868, for some reason unknown to me, the tide turned, and any further reduction of the volume of legal-tender notes was prohibited, the amount then remaining outstanding being $356,000,000.

On the 18th of March, 1869, an act was passed in which the United States Government "solemnly pledged its faith to make provision, at the earliest practicable period, for the redemption of United States notes in coin," and the act of June 20, 1874, limited their amount to $382,000,000.

The act of January 14, 1875, provided for free banking, the redemption of legal tenders to the amount of 80 per cent. of the amount of notes issued to the national banks, and for a full and complete resumption of specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879.

Thus it is conclusively shown by the decision of the Supreme Court, the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the declarations of its authors, that this legal-tender policy was born of an absolute necessity; that it was understood by all, when adopted, as a war measure, demanded by the pressure and exigencies of the times to save the life of the Republic, and with the solemn promise of the Government that, at the earliest practicable moment, the notes should be redeemed in coin.

When Congress passed the first act authorizing their issue, it was done by what then seemed to be absolute compulsion, although wise men now think some other course would have been better, and no one then was so insane as to suppose they would become the permanent currency of the country, or be kept in circulation seventeen or eighteen years before they were redeemed.

But, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding all these hopes and expectations and pledges, we find ourselves to-day with three hundred and eighty-two millions of irredeemable legal tenders in circulation, each one bearing upon its face the evidence of the nation's broken promise, business prostrate, values unsettled, labor unemployed, the arm of industry paralyzed, corruption and crime increasing, and commercial faith and confidence well-nigh destroyed among the people.

Now, sir, it is charged that for all these evils the republican party is responsible and should be held to a strict account. While I would not seek to shield that party from the force of a single obligation which rests upon it, yet I cannot forget that at every step toward resumption republicans have been met by the obstinate and determined opposition of the democratic party, and that to-day it is flaunting in the face of a distressed and suffering people the black flag of inflation and repudiation, while its leaders on this floor are plotting the repeal of the act of January, 1875, because it contains the solemn promise of the Government to redeem these notes, instead of aiding by auxiliary legislation the patriotic purpose contemplated in that law.

In traveling this unbeaten path without the lights of history and experience the republican party has made mistakes, but it has ever shown an honest desire to do right; and although it has not yet quite accomplished the full measure of its ambition in the restoration of national credit and sound money, yet it has done much in staying the mad waves of inflation, confining the greenback currency within the limits of four hundred millions and saving us from the shame and disgrace of national repudiation.

In view of the situation, can there be a reasonable doubt or a serious question as to what is now our high and imperative duty as wise legislators and patriotic citizens?

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the duty of the General Government to furnish to the country a uniform currency, "one that is based upon the world's great standard of values, and which shall at all times be equal in value to that used by other nations; a currency which has a value abroad as well as at home, and by which foreign as well as domestic debts and obligations can be paid and satisfied." The failure of the Government to perform this duty to its citizens, or the slightest departure from this fundamental and vital rule, will always be attended with the most serious and damaging results.

History, the teachings of wise men, and our own experience for the past fifteen years, furnish undoubted authority in support of this wholesome and universal maxim. The great Massachusetts Senator and statesman once said when discussing this important subject in connection with the removal of the Government deposits, that "a sound currency is an essential and indispensable security for the fruits of industry and honest enterprise. Every man of property or industry, every man who desires to preserve what he honestly possesses, or to obtain what he can honestly earn, has a direct interest in maintaining a safe circulating medium—such a medium as shall be a real and substantial representative of property, not liable to vibrate with opinions, not subject to be blown up or down by the breath of speculation, but made stable and secure by its immediate relation to that which the whole world regards as of a permanent value.

"A disordered currency is one of the greatest political evils. It undermines the virtues necessary for the support of the social system and encourages propensities destructive of its happiness. It wars against industry, frugality, and economy, and it fosters the evil spirit of extravagance and speculation. Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind, none has been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money. This is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow. Ordinary tyranny and oppression, excessive taxation, these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community compared with a fraudulent currency and the robberies committed by a depreciated paper. Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough, and more than enough, of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and the intolerable oppression on the virtuous and well-disposed of a degraded paper currency authorized by law or in any way countenanced by Government."

Had Mr. Webster been inspired with the spirit of prophecy he could not have more fully or truthfully foretold the monetary history of our country during the past twelve years than he did in the great speech to which I have referred.

While capitalists and speculators have often escaped, the storm has spent its whole force and violence upon the unprotected heads of the laboring-men. The man who buys and sells under a depreciated currency can by due care and shrewd calculations so manage his business as to make his profits balance his losses, to save as much when he sells as he loses when he buys; but the poor man cannot do this; he buys to consume, and not to sell, and, therefore, has no way in which to balance the ends and make up his losses. While the merchant and trader can daily regulate the price of their goods by the quotations from the stock exchange and the gold board, the laborer cannot adapt the price of his labor to the daily, hourly, and weekly rise in gold. To be sure he receives for his labor the premium on gold, which may be 10, 12, or 15 per cent., but for every article he buys he is compelled to pay 40, 50, and even 70 per cent. more than he would with such a currency as I am now contending for. The palace and the royal exchange may escape, the gamblers of Wall street, the merchant princes of Beacon, and the nabobs of Chestnut street may be saved and go unscathed, but the workshop and the poor man's cottage are crushed and swept away, and their inmates exposed to all the fury of the storm.

During the war high prices and cheap money filled every man's pocket with currency, the result of which was extravagance, dissipation, wild and reckless speculation, contraction of debts, and a total disregard of every rule and principle of prudence and economy. Large manufacturing establishments, the fungus growth of inflation, sprung up all over the North and West, built and carried on with borrowed capital; men rushed into extensive business operations without thought or reflection, and bought whatever they could get trusted for, regardless of the price or the day of payment. Apparently men were prospering, but business was not healthy; everything was vacillating, unsettled, and blown up like a balloon. But as long as the country was flooded with depreciated paper and all had a supply, they rushed on regardless of the end or the consequences. In the mad excitement of the hour men lost their reason and their judgment; gold had become their object, and nature had quickly fallen into revolt. They did not heed the voice of history and the experience of other nations and peoples, that they were deluded, that the business of the country was unsound and morbid, and necessarily must be with a circulating medium which could only be used at home, and there even at a discount. Their seeming prosperity was a cheat and a sham, and, when the bubble finally burst, all the ugly deformities of this disastrous inflation system of finance were exposed to the disgust and indignation of the people.

The evil effects of this depreciated paper currency early became manifest in the hatching out of a swarm of greedy speculators and swindlers, at all our business and money centers, who were always watching and ready to seize upon every opportunity to embarrass the Government and increase their own profligate and ill-gotten gains.

They made corners in gold by which they reaped rich harvests to themselves, while the Government was hindered and impeded in its operations, the business interests of the country prostrated, credit inflated, "a false value fixed upon every man's property, a spirit of lawless and reckless speculation and gambling engendered, the rules of honesty and integrity entirely ignored or dangerously relaxed," and the people in the end driven to the very verge of bankruptcy.

These speculations and gambling transactions at one time embraced a large share of the money capital of the country, completely crazed and bewitched the men engaged in them, diverted the money from the legitimate avenues and channels of trade, and threatened to make our name a by-word and reproach among the nations.

With a depreciated medium of exchange, in all commercial transactions with foreign nations the losses are all on our side and the margins and premiums are all charged in our account, because, no matter what may be the value of our currency at home, all our products and manufactures are there measured by the gold standard.

If we purchase of them in the payment our currency is reduced to gold, and the balance is made up with money from our pockets. If we exchange with them the same results follow, and we are the losers by the bargain. Not only this, but the country is at the same time drained of gold, which increases the premium, depreciates our paper, and opens the way for corners, gambling, and every species of vice and corruption which the cupidity and avarice of mankind can conceive of or invent. We are also the losers if we invest our money in the building of railroads or in any other great public enterprise in our own country where bonds and mortgages may become necessary to complete the work and put it in operation. The bonds must be made payable on time, put into the market, and sold at a discount or below par for currency; but when pay-day comes we shall be com pelled to count out the gold at a loss of from 20 to 40 per cent. to the debtor. A depreciated currency is a double loss to the honest laborer who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow; he very often loses the margin or difference between gold and currency when he receives pay for his labor, and loses it again when he purchases with it the comforts and necessaries of life. It is one of the most skillfully-wrought contrivances to cheat the laboring classes; it is the most effectual of all inventions which tyrannizing capital and avaricious greed have ever invented "to fertilize the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow." To the man who is doing business on borrowed capital the burden is oppressive and crushing, because the interest on his loans is reckoned on a gold basis, when the money he borrows is worth perhaps only two-thirds as much.

If we attempt to compete with foreign nations in the world's great markets in articles of our own manufacture, we find ourselves at once shut out, because our labor costs so much more than theirs, in consequence of the depreciated condition of our currency, that they can afford to undersell us and yet reserve a fair margin for profits to themselves.

In addition to all the burdens and woes I have enumerated which it brings upon the country, it keeps business of all kinds in an unsettled and vascillating condition, destroys all confidence in the Government, breeds crime and immorality, and neutralizes nearly one-half of the productive power and capacity of the country. Thus in every form and direction in which this subject can be approached or investigated, we find that loss and financial ruin are the inevitable results of a base standard of values and a depreciated currency. The history of European nations that have attempted it, and the sad experience of our own country for the past few years, abundantly authorize the statements I have made and confirm their truthfulness.

Never returning to specie payments and bringing our paper money to a par with gold would be the perpetual robbery of honest labor, the demoralization of business, the debauchment of the public conscience, national bankruptcy, repudiation, and disgrace.

One of the most demoralizing and worst features of this system of depreciated paper money is that it destroys all confidence among business men, and they shrink from making an investment or going into business of any kind. The merchant and manufacturer do not know whether to buy light or heavy, or not at all, because they are at the mercy of the speculator and gambler. If gold should chance to go up, they may be all right; but if the reverse, they lose their profits and perhaps in the end their capital. Says a wise man:

With what safety can men embark in enterprises that look to the future for results when they cannot predict with any degree of certainty what will be the value of legal-tender notes one year or two years hence? How can any man venture to engage in any far-reaching business while the currency upon which his transactions are based is constantly changing in value? Especially how can he risk the future when the currency, now greatly depreciated, may be still more depreciated by further issues? It is uncertainty in regard to the future of the currency that is destroying confidence, and without a restoration of confidence there will be no improvement in our financial and industrial condition. What healthy business requires is a stable basis. Let men of capital and enterprise feel that there is to be stability in the legal measure of value; let it be understood that the higher law which makes gold and silver the only true measure is hereafter to be recognized and obeyed, and the existing lethargy will disappear and the country will rapidly recover from its prostration. The remedy is not in the maintenance of the present volume of irredeemable paper, and certainly not in an increase of it.

The money of the country now lies in the vaults of the banks, because there are no borrowers to call it out; there are no borrowers, because it is not safe to engage in any kind of business; and it is not safe, because we are afflicted with a currency "unstable as water," going up to-day and down to-morrow, and can never "excel."

Money alone cannot bring us business, but the revival of business will bring us money. If the forge or the mill stops and men are thrown out of employment, of what avail is a bank full of money to their dependent and starving families? It is not a greater volume of currency they want then, but the fire rekindled in the forge and the gate hoisted again at the mill. That will bring them labor, and the labor will bring them money and all the necessaries and comforts of life.

This result can only be brought about, in my opinion, by a gradual redemption of the greenbacks until they are at par with gold; this would place the business of the country upon a firm and stable foundation, and restore trust and confidence among the people.

This, it seems to me, is the only royal road to success, and is what the people now demand of us; and, depend upon it, the people will see to it that no party advocating or even suspected of entertaining the humiliating and abominable doctrines of a depreciated currency and unlimited inflation shall ever have the control of this Government; and ere the ides of November, 1876, shall have passed, the great public voice of the freemen of this country will have settled it forever, and vindicated before the world the honor of the Republic.

When that voice, the first note of which has been heard from the Granite State, shall have been uttered at the polls, it will, in my humble judgment, be no uncertain sound, but will dispel every doubt; it will sweep as with a political cholera every inflationist and rag-money repudiator from the national deck, tear down the base paper banner of repudiation, and throw to the freshening breeze the American patriot's ensign, brilliant with the great record of past achievements and sparkling in the blazing light of this new victory.

The panic of 1873, which shut up the mills and the factories, threw thousands out of employment and brought all business to a standstill, was the legitimate but bitter fruit of our existing financial system. Inflation had unsettled all values, put an embargo on all legitimate trade, and paralyzed all our industries. Self-protection led consumers everywhere to stop buying on credit; the currency remained undiminished, but capital subject to loan was entirely exhausted.

The people had lived beyond their means; their fancied riches vanished like a shadow; the debtor and creditor were both alike bankrupt, and the poor laborer was turned homeless and penniless upon the world.

The effect of the panic upon the business of this country was overwhelming and terrific. We have not recovered from it yet, and in my opinion we never shall, until the financial policy of the hard-money party is adopted and carried out, and gold becomes the standard of values in this Government. While it spread desolation and ruin through every branch of trade and commerce and shut up a large share of the manufacturing establishments in the country, throwing out of employment thousands of men and exposing to suffering and starvation the families dependent upon them for support, yet I believe it will in the end, in one aspect at least, be seen to have been a blessing in disguise; for nothing short of just such a financial convulsion would ever have stopped the people in their mad career, driven them to repentance, and pointed out to them the way of salvation; and it is one of the encouraging signs of the times, that may serve to cheer and support us while we are suffering the woes of this terrible calamity, that it has indeed had the warning and awakening effect upon the people that I have described. The moment they recovered from the stunning effects of the overwhelming concussion and got upon their feet, they commenced the work of reform and preparation for their final deliverance, which they have pursued ever since with an earnestness and constancy which is comforting and commendable.

Driven by necessity to an overhauling and inspection of their financial affairs, men soon discovered that they had covered too much ground; that their business, like their currency, was dangerously inflated; and that in order to avoid bankruptcy and utter ruin, they must curtail their business, circumscribe their operations, and call in their scattered and weakened resources. They found that they had been living too fast, and far in advance of their salaries and incomes; that a spirit of wild and reckless speculation, engendered by the vast quantity of depreciated currency with which the country had been flooded, had led them into all manner of extravagance and dissipation, had buried them in debt, and driven them unconscious to the brink of financial ruin; and that the only way out was to diminish expenses, adopt a system of rigid economy, pay up old debts and contract no new ones, purchase nothing except what was absolutely required, abandon all wild-cat schemes and foolish speculations, make no investments unless known to be safe, discard all unnecessary and costly luxuries, stay at home and patronize our own institutions and domestic manufactures, and strain every branch of productive industry to its utmost capacity.

In 1874 the people, who attributed their distresses to a lack of currency, and who therefore favored inflation, complained that they had been unfairly dealt with in the distribution of bank capital, and referred their miseries and afflictions largely to this cause, and asked for more. Congress very readily complied with their request, and increased the banking capital of the country some millions, and placed it at the disposal of those who claimed they most needed it. If the theory of inflation and more money had been sound, every dollar of this new issue of banking capital would have been anxiously sought for and eagerly taken by those for whom it was in fact issued. But, instead of this, nearly every share was taken in the Eastern and Middle States, at the great business centers, where most of the previous stock had found a market, and but the smallest possible amount called for or taken in those sections of the country from which these complaints had emanated.

Mr. Speaker, it is a commercial and financial fact that the city of New York is the great trading and money center of this country. From thence the money is called out to move the crops in the autumn and for all other business purposes, and to that point it returns when it has accomplished its mission. Money can no more be confined within city limits or State lines than the sun's great light or the air we breathe. Wherever business demands or securities and rewards invite money flows, regardless of location, distance, or color of borrower. If the people of the West and South have the securities for loans, they can obtain them as well with the banking capital in Boston and New York as they could if it was all in Chicago and New Orleans. If there are no buyers to pay money for what they have to sell, and they have no securities with which to entice investers, they would have no bank-notes though bank stock was unlimited and banks were located in every village in the land. Bank-notes are not given away; they are obtained by loans or by exchanging for them something else of equivalent value; and the man who has neither of these very handy and convenient facilities, whether he lives in the North or the South, the East or the West, will not be likely to be weighed down with money or be troubled with bank bills.

This illustration demonstrates most forcibly and clearly the utter fallacy of inflated currency and this cry about an increase of banking capital.

Instead of there being a lack of currency, there has never been a time when there has been so much money lying in the vaults of the banks waiting for borrowers at a low rate of interest as now.

These practical lessons drawn from experience and the every-day life of our people ought to convince any candid, unbiased man that it is not an increase or inflation of the volume of depreciated paper that is required to relieve us at the present time, but we want legislation in aid of the act of 1875, together with prudence, industry, and economy on the part of the people; then business will revive, hard times will vanish, confidence be restored, and prosperity follow.

But, sir, I have already said enough upon this question, and I shall therefore proceed with my argument upon the assumption that the evils under which we are now suffering and their cause stand fully proved, and that the only duty which remains to us is to discover and apply the remedy.

The lion which to-day stands in the path to resumption is the specious and artful policy of the opposition, who, while they claim, many of them, to be in favor of a return to sound money, yet bend every effort and exert every power to prevent it and force a further inflation of the currency.

To prove this beyond the power of contradiction, it is only necessary to examine the propositions they submit and the measures they advocate.

Those who are most shrewd and cautious propose the drifting process, or the policy of masterly inactivity. This has been tried ten years and has utterly failed. They demand the repeal of the resumption act of 1875, because it was passed by a republican Congress. That means inflation, because while that law remains upon the statute-book there can be no further expansion of the currency.

Those who are bold and reckless would compel the payment of import duties and the interest on the public debt in currency, thus on the one hand violating the solemn obligations of the Government, cheating it out of the difference between gold and currency, reducing the customs revenues to the same rank as our paper, compelling us to buy gold to pay interest on the public debt and for the sinking fund, and, on the other, degrading our Government and debasing our people. Some of them propose the wild scheme of having the Government issue all the bills and carry on all the banking operations of the country, with a currency covered all over with broken pledges and violated promises; while others advocate the policy of repealing the national-banking act and plunging us into the cess-pool of State banks and wild-cat currency.

Our present system of banking has been in operation thirteen years; it works admirably; the bills are well secured and pass current in every State in the Union, and the only objection to them is that they are not redeemable in coin. During these thirteen years about twenty-one hundred and fifty banks have been organized, and only about thirty of them have suspended, and these with no loss to the bill-holders. A comparison of this result with our experience under the State-bank system for the same length of time, during which nearly one-third of them failed and the bill-holders lost $50,000,000, ought to be a conclusive argument against the change they propose to make.

The national banks now organized and in operation have a paid-up capital of $493,751,679 and a circulation of $320,000,000. They pay the Government annually over $7,000,000 in taxes and the States in which they are located nearly $10,000,000. What the result would be of forcing twenty-one hundred banks to wind up their affairs at once, withdraw all their circulation, and collect the $1,000,000,000 due to them, no human power could predict and no patriot would care to contemplate.

When the civil war came on, business very soon began to be depressed, credit was impaired because the Government was not responsible for the redemption of any of our money, and it was not until Congress, in 1864, passed the present banking act that our credit revived and that our paper stood at par in the commercial and money markets of the world. The widows, orphans, and pensioners in this country have, in pensions and deposits in savings-banks, a capitalized investment of $1,700,000,000, and the repeal of the national-banking law or the further inflation of the currency would work "instant and lasting injury" to them, by reducing the value and impairing the purchasing power of every dollar of their little store, which has come to them through pinching economy or valiant service in the field.

Mr. Speaker, no proposition in geometry was ever more clearly demonstrated than the fact that instead of a deficiency of currency we have too much: "too much machinery for the amount of work we have to do with it;" $200,000,000 hoarded or lying idle in the banks and no chance or opportunity to use it, is an argument which no sophistry can refute. It has been truly said upon this floor that the markets of the world are filled with good money, and if our currency was really deficient it would be made good out of those stores as soon as the cable could flash the news.

If we are to have resumption, how can it be brought about except by a contraction of our greenbacks until our currency shall come up to par?

Legislation gave us too much paper and legislation must retire it.

The cause of its depreciation is its redundancy, and this can be overcome only by its reduction.

Sir, I verily believe that it is as impossible to ever arrive at a sound standard of values and honest money without a limited contraction of the currency as it would be for the surgeon to remove the cancer without using the knife. For this reason it was a vital mistake, in my opinion, when Secretary McCulloch's scheme of gradual contraction was abandoned; for if it had then been persevered in the greenbacks would have been appreciated and we should have resumed specie payments long ere this without shock or derangement of the industrial interests of the country.

But that, sir, is no argument in favor of unlimited inflation, or against a re-adoption of the same policy without delay, as doubt and uncertainty will do more damage than some settled policy looking in that direction, even if it does not fully meet all the requirements of the situation; because during every month's delay millions of gold are exported, which the Government ought to retain by exchanging bonds for it at a rate of interest which will command the market.

Having now said all I desire to upon the evils of our present system of currency, and the solemn obligations we are under to return, at the earliest practicable moment, to specie payments and a sound measure of values, I shall now for a few moments examine the different remedies suggested, and indicate what seems to me as the most feasible of all the plans proposed for appreciating our currency, restoring confidence, and reviving the languishing industries and prostrate business of the country. And, sir, allow me to say that while I have my own opinions in reference to this question, I have no pet scheme, but will heartily join hands with any man in any measure which shall give reasonable assurance of success.

The policy of hoarding gold with which to purchase two or three hundred millions of greenbacks is, to my mind, not only objectionable, but absolutely absurd. Even if it was possible for the Government to accumulate such a quantity of gold, it would take years to accomplish it, and during all this time the interest on the coin thus hoarded would be lost, not only to the Government but to the world. If it should ever be deemed expedient to redeem the greenbacks by saving gold, the Government should do as any wise and prudent business man would do, as fast as it gets the gold, instead of hoarding it, use it to take up this unfunded greenback debt, thus saving the interest on the coin and appreciating the notes left outstanding.

The theory of purchasing greenbacks with surplus revenue hardly need be considered as affording any hope, because, although it is entirely unobjectionable and perhaps worthy of consideration, yet we have no surplus at present, and in all human probability shall not have for long years to come. This seems to leave but two modes of appreciating the greenback currency and resuming specie payments, which seem to offer any reasonable grounds of success: first, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to gradually fund it into long bonds at a low rate of interest; and, second, to sell the bonds and with the gold purchase the legal-tender notes for cancellation. In addition to this, any surplus coin in excess of the wants of the Government, if any could be saved, might be used for the same purpose.

The President, whose loyalty to sound values and honest money has never been questioned, in his last annual message suggested—

That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to redeem, say, not to exceed $2,000,000 monthly of legal-tender notes, by issuing in their stead a long bond, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, of denominations ranging from $50 to $1,000 each. This would in time reduce the legal-tender notes to a volume that could be kept afloat without demanding redemption in large sums suddenly

The Secretary of the Treasury, who has given much time and consideration to this subject, and whose opinions have great weight with me, recommends in his last annual report that—

Authority be given for funding legal-tender notes into bonds bearing a low rate of interest. * * * It seems probable that a bond bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. would invite the funding of a sufficient amount of legal-tender notes to lessen materially the sum of gold which, in the absence of such provision, must be accumulated in the Treasury by the 1st of January, 1879, to carry out the imperative requirements of the act of January 14, 1875. If it be apprehended that authority to the Secretary to fund an unlimited amount of notes might lead to too sudden contraction of the currency, Congress could limit the amount to be funded in any given period of time. The process being in no sense compulsory as to the holders of United States notes, and the rate of interest on the bonds being made low, it is not probable that currency which could find profitable employment would be presented for redemption in such bonds. Only the excess of notes above the needs of business would seek such conversion. Authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem and cancel two millions of legal-tender notes per month by this process would greatly facilitate redemption at the time now fixed by law, and besides would have the advantage of publicity as to the exact amount to be withdrawn in any given month. Bonds issued for this purpose should be of the denomination of fifty and one hundred dollars, and any multiple thereof, in order to meet the convenience of all classes of holders of United States notes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would, in addition to the power of funding the greenbacks, authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, bonds of the United States redeemable after forty years, bearing interest at a rate of not exceeding 4 per cent. per annum, and use the proceeds in the purchase or redemption of legal-tenders; the redemption of said notes not to exceed a given amount per month, either fixed by law or left to the discretion of the Secretary, and said notes, when redeemed, to be canceled and withdrawn from circulation forever. This is a part of the plan presented by Senator MORRILL, of my State, and supported by a masterly speech by him in the Senate on the 6th of January last. In the mean time the national banks should be required to accumulate and hold a portion of their reserve and of their coin interest in gold, or coin certificates, in order to do their share and to be in readiness to act in concert with the Government on the 1st of January, 1879, in redeeming their own bills and any greenbacks then outstanding.

The first of these plans, the one I would most urgently press upon the attention of the House, as it would enable us to keep these bonds at home, is recommended by the President and Secretary in their last annual communications to Congress, as I have shown, and both plans are warmly commended by leading bankers and financiers throughout the country, among whom I am pleased to mention Hon. John A. Page, State treasurer of Vermont, and Sidney W. Rowell and Henry F. Field, bank-cashiers of long experience and high standing in that State.

The only serious objection which is made to the propositions I have stated is that it will contract the currency and thus still further depress and paralyze the business of the country and increase the burdens of the people.

The history of this subject from January, 1875, down to the present time, refutes every argument of that kind and proves that the slight contraction I advocate would be so gentle and gradual that it would not even provoke a ripple upon the sea of business and that the people would not know that any contraction was going on only from the published reports of the Secretary.

From January 14, 1875, the date of the passage of the resumption act, down to March 20, 1876, the national-bank circulation increased $13,989,340.

During the same time the legal-tenders retired under that act amounted to $11,056,608, leaving a net inflation of the currency in that period of $2,932,732 by that method of figuring.

But, to get at the facts and the true state of the currency, we must remember that a large amount of national-bank circulation was surrendered and that during that time $36,202,864 in legal-tenders was deposited for the redemption of the national-bank notes so surrendered. Says the New York Tribune in an able article upon this subject:

Thus it appears that while the free banking of 1875 has permitted an increase of circulation amounting to $2,932,732, the "laws of trade" have caused a contraction of the circulation amounting to $36,202,864. The net result is practically a withdrawal of $33,270,132 from that circulation, which the inflationists insist is much too small for the wants of trade.

Now, sir, let Congress meet this question squarely and manfully, with an honest determination to surmount all obstacles and settle it forever.

I would not only invest the Secretary of the Treasury with the powers I have indicated, but I would by law prohibit him from calling in any more of the bonds already issued till such time as the Government shall be prepared to pay all of its matured obligations in gold.

Sir, we must take no step backward. We must not suffer the act of January 14, 1875, to be repealed. We have already taken one step in advance in the passage of the silver bill, and this must be followed up by others, until the end is reached and the victory is achieved.

If Congress will obey the voice of the people and mature the legislation I have urged, it will not be long before the margin between gold and greenbacks will begin to disappear, foreign exchange will turn in our favor, helping us to keep the products of our mines at home, gold will flow in upon us from abroad, and in this way the Government, the banks, and the people will all be prepared for resumption at the same time, each bearing a share of the burden, which will come so gradually and quietly as to provoke no disturbance of the business of the country; confidence will be re-established, commerce revive, prices find a healthy level, values become settled, manufactures will again spring into life, the sweet music of honest industry will again be heard, and peace, plenty, and prosperity will once more smile upon our beloved country.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, I indulge the hope that the act of January 20, 1875, providing for the resumption of coin payments will be repealed by the majority of this House. If there were no other reason for its repeal than that it prescribes a time for resumption without the slightest evidence that permanent resumption can then take place, it would suffice to justify our action. Legislation at any time, fixing a period for resumption so long in advance, is not only useless but positively mischievous. It is as idle for Congress to name a day for resumption as it would be by legislative enactment to prescribe the number of bales of cotton that will be grown or the amount of grain that will be exported in 1878. The resumption of specie payments by the Government and the banks depends so much on the condition of the industries of this country, as well as the prosperity of other countries, between now and the 1st of January, 1879, that any attempt to unduly hasten it by such legislation cannot but be productive of evil. When the country is ready for resumption no legislation will be needed prescribing a period for its inception, and, until that period arrives, any legislation prescribing a time for resumption is not only vain and nugatory, but positively mischievous.

I can recall but one instance where legislative power has thus interfered, and the results of that interference were such as to warn us from imitating an example fraught with such dire calamities. I allude to the act of Parliament of April, 1820, compelling resumption in full by the Bank of England in 1823, to which I will hereafter refer. The Bank of France has been in suspension since the beginning of the Franco-German war, in 1870, and I have not heard that the French Parliament has appointed a time when it shall redeem its notes in coin. In this country, when the banks have suspended cash payments, resumption, like suspension, has been their own voluntary act. No State has ever attempted to determine for the banks when and how they should resume. And if we are to judge of the next three years by the past twelve months, every consideration of private interest and of public policy demands the repeal of this mischievous act. The country had reason to complain of the depression of business, the stagnation of trade, the increase of bankruptcy, and of the universal shrinkage of values for some years before the passage of this act; but how vastly these grounds of complaint have been multiplied since is known and read of all men in all sections of the Union.

This act was passed not in the interest of resumption, but in the interest of party. It was the offspring of supposed party necessities, and it became the law of the land not to restore specie payments, but to advance partisan ends. It was devised to heal the divisions in the republican party—concocted in secret conclave—and enacted under the imposition of the gag, without discussion and without amendment. It has served the purpose of its enactment, and is therefore functus officio. Why should it be retained longer upon the statute-book? If it was designed to bring about resumption in 1879, what are the ways and means by which this result is to be reached? There are none provided adequate to this end. The whole scope and intent of the act is to substitute the obligations of the national banks for those of the Government. Its chief and paramount purpose is to fasten upon the country and to perpetuate the national banks at the expense and by the withdrawal of the cheap and inexpensive issue of the Government. If specie resumption was its real purpose, how does it happen that no provision is made for the national banks redeeming their promises to pay in coin? The act gives the Secretary of the Treasury power to sell bonds with which to accumulate gold to redeem the greenbacks and fractional currency, and for that purpose he is also authorized to use any surplus revenue not otherwise appropriated. He has already sold bonds and purchased and coined silver exceeding $15,000,000, and which is locked up for the redemption of the fractional currency when he shall find it able to take care of itself in the channels of circulation. The national-bank circulation now amounts to three hundred and forty-eight millions, and is destined to be increased to over four hundred millions under the operation of this act. This circulation is now redeemable in legal-tenders, but in 1879 they will have been either funded in bonds, redeemed in gold, or will be made equal with gold. Are the national-bank notes not to be redeemed in gold after January, 1879? Or are we to have resumption by the Government and not by the banks? If by the banks, how, and by what process?

Where is their coin reserve to be kept—in the Treasury at Washington, in the vaults of each national bank, or at one of the redeeming agencies? What percentage of its circulation is each bank required to keep on hand to redeem its notes? There is no provision whatever made for the redemption of the notes of the national banks, in coin or anything else. As to everything touching these institutions, except their absorption of the greenback, this act is as silent as the grave. If it was intended that these banks should pay their notes in specie after January, 1879, the act fails so to declare, and we thus have an act to resume that does not resume, and makes no provision to resume. Instead of an act for resumption of specie payments, it is an act to extend and perpetuate the national banks, and give them the monopoly of issuing an irredeemable currency, and filling the channels of circulation with "rag money." And what is still more worthy of remark is that neither the President in his late message, the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, nor the Comptroller of the Currency in his elaborate defense of the national banks, offers a suggestion or makes a recommendation which looks to compelling the national banks to redeem their notes in anything but lawful money of the United States, that is, greenbacks, of which there will be none in circulation in 1879, or, if in circulation, will be at par with gold coin. But to show conclusively that the object of this legislation is not resumption but rag money, in the shape of national-bank notes, both the President and Secretary Bristow recommend the funding of the legal-tenders, one in a long 3.65 gold bond and the other in a 4 per cent. bond, which shall be a basis for the issue of national banks. This would at once convert 90 per cent. of the outstanding legal-tender circulation into national-bank notes, and thus increase the capital invested in these banks by at least three hundred millions. It is, therefore, a mere pretext that this act of January 20, 1875, means resumption of coin payments. It means no such thing. It means the wiping out of the greenback currency, the increase of the interest-bearing debt of the Government by the sum of $413,000,000, and the increase of its anhual interest by the sum of at least seventeen and a half millions, and last, but not least, the surrender of the entire paper circulation for 40,000,000 of people to a comparatively few capitalists, with no obligation on their part to redeem their promises to pay in gold coin, or any provision of law compelling them to do so.

Nor is this the result of oversight, but of deliberate, well-considered purpose: All the wild, unreasoning clamor for hard-money specie resumption, honest money and against "inflation," rag money, and "repudiation," which, emanating from that large colony of eastern agents domiciled on Manhattan Island, is echoed and re-echoed by the subsidized press of the country, east and west, never was intended to apply to the rag money of the banks. Under the guise and mask of specie payments and hard money the sole object has been and is now to extinguish the legal-tender currency and to fill its place with the irredeemable notes of national banks, while the power and number of these institutions will be so augmented, enlarged, and ramified as to make them omnipotent in the legislation of Congress and in the control of the press and politics of the country. It is most obvious to the slightest reflection that the owners and stockholders of the national banks would not have been indifferent to the passage of the act of January 20, 1875, if they had believed that they were required to begin coin payments within the next three years. It would be a reflection upon their financial sagacity to suppose that they consider it possible that these two thousand banks, scattered all over the Union, could redeem their promises to pay in gold in 1879, either at their own counter or at the Treasury in Washington or elsewhere. While it must be admitted that the security of these banks for the ultimate payment of their circulation is undoubted and beyond question, it is equally clear, as well from reason as experience, that they have less capacity than almost any other kind of banks to redeem their circulation in coin. The bonds which a most generous Government pays these banks to take and deposit for the security of their circulation is their capital; and whatever means the bank has is exhausted by the purchase of the bonds. Unlike the old chartered banks, after their investment in bonds they live and move and have their being in credit and nothing else. If they issue their own circulation it is but borrowing from the people. Their deposits are debts to their customers, and all their capital having been exhausted in buying their bonds, and they being beyond their control, how can they be expected to keep a sufficient coin reserve to redeem their circulation? From foundation to turret the national banks are built upon credit, nothing else.

This fatal defect of the system—I mean their want of cash-paying power—was fully illustrated and tested by what was called the stock banks of 1853 and 1854. The general organization was the same as the present national banks, the bonds of the States being pledged for their circulation instead of United States bonds, and these bonds, as compared with gold, then were as valuable as the bonds of the United States are now. But when the financial storm came, when depositors and bill-holders wanted the cash for their deposits and for the notes of the bank, its vaults were innocent of specie; and great was the fall of that bank! And while this was true of all the stock banks, many of the chartered banks came out of the storm unscathed and unhurt and redeemed all their cash obligations. In truth, the central idea of the national-banking system is credit as contradistinguished from cash, and a convertible currency and a national-bank circulation are wholly incompatible and incongruous.

When, at the close of the great struggle between France and the allied powers of Europe, it was proposed in the English Parliament that the Bank of England should resume specie payments after a suspension of nearly a quarter of a century, the "currency question" was the overshadowing topic of discussion throughout all England. Politicians and philosophers, theorists and "economists," school-men and book-worms, were generally then as now for immediate resumption; but the sagacious directors of the Bank of England protested against it as a measure "fraught with great perils, and which would compromise the universal interests of the empire in all its relations of agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and revenue." They were not satisfied with the theory of Ricardo, one of the most influential of the economists, that specie resumption would not affect the value of all commodities over 3 per cent., but their resistance was to no purpose. And if the directors and officers of the national banks believed that these institutions would be compelled to redeem their circulation within three years from this day, the corridors and lobbies of the Capitol would have swarmed with these gentlemen when this act was under consideration in caucus, and they would be here now imploring this Congress to erase it from the statute-book. They made no opposition to its passage and make no appeals for its repeal because they understand that, so far as it may appear to require specie redemption of their circulating notes, it is a fraud and a sham. They appreciate at its proper value the franchise of a too liberal Government, by which they are paid by the people as well as the Government to furnish circulating notes for the vast and increasing population of America; but until the field of circulation is cleared of all competition, until the greenback is forced out of existence and they become sole monarchs of all they survey, they willingly join in the game of deception and fraud by which the people are to be hoodwinked and cheated into the belief that specie resumption and coin payments by the Government and the banks will be inaugurated in 1879.

Mr. Speaker, I denounce this hard-money clamor as a bold, barefaced, and wicked deception, and instead of desiring resumption of specie payments, the chief end and purpose of the eastern moneyed power is to enlarge and perpetuate the national banks, and to secure the uninterrupted reign of "rag money" and the "rag baby."

Beyond question there are many and grave, if not insurmountable, difficulties in the way of resumption by the Government or the banks. The unprosperous condition of the industrial classes; the immense burden of debt, individual, city, county, corporate, and State; the large amount of capital sunk in unprofitable works of improvement; the heavy drain entailed upon the resources of the country by its contributions to the payment of the public debt and interest since the war, exceeding in amount the total value of all the taxable wealth of the Union in 1820; the decline in the productive wealth of the late slave States; the inefficiency and thriftlessness of their laboring population; and the maladministration, profligacy, and official corruption which have characterized the governments of many of these States for years past, all combine to present a most formidable barrier to a successful and permanent resumption. It may be doubted whether all these causes aggregated offer such serious obstacles to maintaining permanent specie payments as the national debt, amounting on 1st of July last to twenty one hundred and twenty-eight millions and the interest-bearing debt being the sum of seventeen hundred millions.

What proportion of this debt is held abroad cannot be ascertained with any exactness. It is estimated by good authorities that the annual gold interest due by the Government and payable abroad, together with interest due by States and corporations, and which is a yearly drain upon the resources of this country, does not fall short of two hundred millions. If we have no exportable productions with which to pay this interest it must be paid in gold, and in addition to whatever balance of trade that may be against us must be taken into the account in ascertaining our ability to successfully maintain specie payments. It would seem to be the extreme of folly to increase this gold drain and at the same time increase our interest-bearing debt by funding a non-interest-bearing debt, unless overruling necessity demands it. But this is just what the pretended resumption act of last year does or provides for doing. It looks to a conversion of the greenback and fractional currency, aggregating in round numbers $413,000,000, into bonds bearing from 4 to 5 per cent. gold interest, and thereby makes an addition of at least seventeen and a half millions to the burdens of the people annually in the shape of interest. At simple interest the people will have paid $525,000,000 in interest alone at the end of thirty years, and both principal and interest become a continuing bar to the successful maintenance of coin resumption. What possible justification can there be for thus placing additional impediments in the way of resumption? Is not our interest account large enough, and its payment difficult enough, without adding to its volume? If resumption be so important for the prosperity of the people, and their advancement in wealth and material production, why put obstacles unnecessarily in its way? Does any sane man doubt that specie payments can be more certainly effected and maintained by the Government than by the banks? And is there a shadow of doubt, but for the relentless war of eastern bankers and money kings against the issue of the Government, that, with a tithe of the legislation they have secured for the bonds of the Government, the money of the people would be at par with gold instead of at a discount of 10 to 15 per cent?

It may be asserted without the fear of successful denial that the immense indebtedness of the Government, of the States, and of corporations, municipal and public, offers the great impediment to successful and permanent resumption—if, at present, and for many years to come, it does not form an absolute and insurmountable barrier. For myself, I do not hesitate to assert that there is but one road to resumption, and that road leads to the extinction or recall of our national debt. So long as a large proportion of our debt is held abroad we are at the mercy of our foreign creditors, and it is just as true among nations as it is among individuals that the borrower is the slave of the lender. This is especially true when applied to a debtor people, providing for the payment of its obligations in the world's currency, which at the same time performs the functions of money and is an article of merchandise and commerce in the same sense that wheat, cotton, or tobacco is. Like other articles of merchandise, it is governed by the same law of supply and demand—its abundance in one country rendering it cheap there, and causing it to flow to other countries where it is more in demand and dearer, because of its local scarcity. We have the authority of the great financier, Mr. Biddle, so long the president of the Bank of the United States, that the universal suspension of the banks in this country in 1837 was caused primarily by the short crops of grain in Great Britain, which were supplemented by purchases on the Baltic, and paid for in gold extracted from this country in payment of debts by our merchants. A war in Europe or a great political disturbance on that continent—a short crop of cotton here or a superabundant crop of grain in Europe, so that there could be no profitable shipment of our cereals, would produce a similar drain upon our gold reserves.

We may conceive of the existence of a state of things liable to occur at any time, either here or among any of the great commercial nations of Europe, that would cause large amounts of our gold bonds to be sent home for conversion and the proceeds remitted to the holders. It must be apparent that the increase of our bonded debt, which from the rate of interest as well as the time the bonds have to run will find their way to Europe, is a step not in the direction of permanent resumption, but in the direction of suspension and financial collapse, with all their attending calamities. And I cannot but look with suspicion and distrust upon any attempt needlessly to increase that debt, especially when it comes in the guise of hard money and cash payments. It is impossible to resist the conviction that some other motive than the one professed is at the bottom of this effort to increase our foreign debt. I am safe in saying that the real motive grows out of a determination to supplant our greenback circulation with that of the national banks.

I have thus far, Mr. Speaker, considered the question of the currency as if the resumption of specie payments, especially by the banks, was a mask and disguise, and as if it was neither expected nor desired to resume at the time indicated in the act of January 20, 1875. I have treated this act as having no other purpose than to saddle upon the country the most odious, the most expensive, and the most dangerous monopoly that ever had an existence in the history of the world, with enlarged and constantly augmenting powers of mischief. It is my purpose now to assume that the real purpose of this act and whatever supplementary legislation it may require to enforce resumption is what it professes and purports to be, the restoration of specie payments by the Government and the national banks within the next three years. In this aspect of the subject, is it possible or practicable to resume specie payments by the banks and Government the 1st of January, 1879? And what I may have to say is not predicated upon a temporary or illusory resumption, but an actual bona fide and permanent resumption, a resumption that resumes in fact, and will not cost the country more than it is worth and will not cripple and destroy every other interest than that of capital and money.

The Secretary of the Treasury evidently places no reliance upon the plan of selling bonds for gold, and by this means providing for the redemption of the three hundred millions of legal-tender notes which will be outstanding on the 1st day of January, 1879. He says, "it may be doubted whether the process of accumulating a large amount of gold by a given time could go on without meeting opposition from the financial powers of the world," and instead of relying upon this means (which is alone provided by the act of January, 1875) to redeem the greenback circulation, he recommends a 4 per cent. long bond by which to absorb the three hundred millions of greenback circulation. If the hoarding process is adopted, or if the 4 per cent. bonds absorb and take up the greenback circulation, as is contemplated, the only paper circulation left to the country January, 1879, on the supposition that silver takes the place of the fractional currency, would be the national-bank circulation of $348,216,902, with the possible increase of eight-tenths of $382,000,000 of legal-tenders, less $82,000,000, say $65,000,000; making the sum of $413,216,902.

This is the programme whereby, if either of these means be adopted, the greenbacks are to disappear altogether. If the 4 per cent. bonds, as recommended by the Secretary, should become the basis of national-bank issues, which is more than probable, this sum of paper circulation would be increased by the sum of $270,000,000. This would give as the sum of paper circulation $683,000,000 on the 1st day of January, 1879, less by seventy-nine millions than that circulation amounted to on November 1, 1875, and equivalent to a contraction of twenty-six and one-third millions annually for the next three years. When it is recollected that within the next three years we shall make an increase of population of not less than two millions and a quarter, that in despite of financial mismanagement our productions are keeping pace with the growth of our population, farms are multiplying, towns and cities are being built and populated, and there is growth, expansion, and increase in almost every branch of industry, while the means and instruments of exchange are thus decreased, such a turn of the contracting screw may well strike terror into the stoutest heart.

Contraction of the currency has been the only means brought into requisition by the devotees of gold in order to bring the country to resumption, and it will no doubt be carried on to the end of the chapter, let the consequences be what they may to those who are so unfortunate as not to belong to the creditor class. But how much more appalling the picture, if from any cause the 4 per cent. bonds by which the three hundred millions of greenbacks are to be absorbed and canceled shall not become the basis of another brood of national banks. The paper circulation will then stand at the sum of four hundred and thirteen millions, against seven hundred and sixty-two millions on the 1st day of November last. I have no fear that any public man, party, or administration will ever have the hardihood so to contract the volume of currency; and yet in my judgment, if we are to reach resumption by contraction of the paper circulation within three years, this amount of contraction is absolutely necessary to reach that end.

Whether resumption reached by a reduction of the circulation in three years of 45 per cent., involving a still more disastrous fall in the prices of all commodities, the closing of factories, of ships rotting at our wharves, of labor unemployed, of store-houses deserted, the public revenues decreased, and the pressure of debts between individuals trebled, would be worth the sacrifice, I leave to those whose reverence for the golden god is much more developed than mine. I think it much safer to assume that the circulation of paper money will not be reduced to less than the sum of $683,000,000. And the question arises, what amount of gold will be needed to enable the banks to make this amount of circulation convertible? We can only arrive at a correct conclusion on this subject by the experience of our own and other countries.

In 1857 the aggregate paper circulation of the United States was two hundred and fifteen millions, and the Secretary of the Treasury in his report of that year estimated the amount of coin in circulation and in the vaults of the banks and the treasuries of the United States at two hundred and sixty-five millions. Here we have, according to the best authorities on the subject, more coin than paper money to sustain this circulation; but we know as a matter of fact that it was not sustained, but convertible paper money, as it seldom fails to do, lost its convertibility, the banks all suspended, and a monetary panic swept over the country like a tornado, prostrating commerce and industry and carrying ruin and bankruptcy to thousands. The Director of the Mint estimates the amount of coin in the country at this time at $142,000,000; but if the banks failed and went into suspension in 1857, with more gold in the country than there was paper by fifty millions, it certainly will require all of four hundred millions to sustain a paper circulation of six hundred and eighty millions in 1879. Does any one believe that we shall have that sum in the country in January, 1879, or that we can retain it if it were here?

If we go to Great Britain for her experience on this subject it will be found that the aggregate paper circulation of the Bank of England and all other banks of issue does not exceed $225,000,000, and the estimated amount of coin in circulation is $525,000,000, exclusive of that held by the bank. Speaking of the bank reserve, (some twelve years ago,) the author of the Science of Finance says when "the stock of gold in the bank is at its ordinary sum (say $70,000,000) the export of ten or fifteen millions of gold suffices to produce a dearth of money and a serious commercial crisis." This extreme sensitiveness of the bullion market was illustrated while Secretary Boutwell was at the head of the Treasury, both in the payment of the Alabama award and when he had sold United States bonds in London amounting to $21,000,000. In both cases he says that the Treasury Department was "compelled" to leave the gold in London and to invest these sums in American securities by the influence of the bank and "by diplomatic arrangements here operating upon the Treasury Department."

It is well known that this bank reserve is watched with the most jealous care, and several times this "wonderful organization of credit," within the last thirty years, has been upon the verge of suspension, notwithstanding its heavy reserve and notwithstanding the large sum of metallic money in the hands of the people and in the channels of circulation. Even when it has escaped suspension, it has been by the exercise of sovereign power in increasing the rates of interest as much as from 3 to 10 per cent. within a few weeks, and thus indirectly prohibiting the export of specie, and while saving itself has brought ruin to thousands of merchants and traders, and scattered panic, consternation, and commercial distress throughout the kingdom. Shall we arm our national banks with this power to save themselves at the expense of the public interest? And if they were vested with such authority, is it likely that they could protect themselves against suspension and insolvency?

The latest and most reliable statement of the condition of the Bank of France accessible shows that about a year ago its paper circulation stood at $509,500,000, and the specie reserve at two hundred and sixty-four millions, or more than 52 per cent. The amount of gold and silver coin in circulation, inclusive of the bank reserve, is variously estimated at from ten to twelve hundred millions, and according to American ideas of banking it would appear that the Bank of France could resume specie payments with safety at any time. It is, however, still in suspension. It is not improbable that a remarkable event in the history of this bank may have taught its managers a lesson which our financial managers could study with profit. On the 12th of May, 1854, the coin and bullion held in the vaults of the bank were eighty millions, for the redemption of a note circulation of one hundred and thirty millions. By the month of October, 1855, its specie had been reduced to forty-five millions, and in March following the paper circulation stood at one hundred and twenty-five millions, and the bullion at forty-two millions. It appears from the published accounts of the bank that from July, 1855, to December, 1856, a period of about eighteen months, the bank purchased and imported into France, at a cost of $2,150,000, the enormous sum of $136,800,000, in order to sustain its paper circulation, and the figures show that as fast as it was drawn into the bank it was drawn out and exported.

I have collated these facts and submit them to the House to show the impossibility of our maintaining specie redemption in 1879 by any means at our command. If we contract the paper circulation even to the amount of the present bank-note circulation it would be a perilous experiment, fraught with ruin and destruction to every interest but that of the bondholder and money-lender; and as when Secretary McCulloch began to carry out his programme of resumption by hard, relentless contraction, the people from all parts of the country called a halt upon his policy, so now if this Congress shall again try the heroic treatment this Hall will never know us again forever, and every vestige of this resumption act would be effaced from the statute-book by another Congress. And with a larger paper circulation than I have stated, the experience of Great Britain and France, as well as our own, shows conclusively that resumption in 1879 will result in a disastrous and calamitous failure.

Mr. Speaker, it has often been a matter of wonder and astonishment that in our servile imitation of so many things English we should go so far as to copy even her mistakes and the blunders of her statesmen. We adopt English ideas of banking, finance, and taxation, and blindly accept the theories of her "philosophers" and her political economists, and we refuse to be warned of their errors or their sophistries. That the return to specie resumption by the Bank of England by virtue of what is known as Peel's bullion act was a mistake fatal to almost every interest in Great Britain, is now universally conceded. Greville, in his Memoirs of George IV and William IV, volume 2, page 145, speaking of Sir Robert Peel, says:

If we look back through the long course of Peel's life and inquire what have been the political measures with which his name is particularly connected, we shall find, first, the return to cash payments, which almost everybody now agrees was a fatal mistake, though it would not be fair to visit him with extraordinary censure for a measure which was sanctioned by almost all the great financial authorities.

This measure, so prolific in misfortune to the people and so ruinous to the productive industries of Great Britain, was sanctioned by the leading statesmen and political economists of the day, and was engineered through Parliament in great part by Ricardo, a writer on political economy of no mean pretensions. The similarity in the condition and surroundings of the two countries and the result of the English resumption policy ought to be a warning to us not to follow too closely in the footsteps of her statesmen. Never has experience so effectually refuted the false theories which entailed upon England such fearful calamities. The Bank of England was in suspension about twenty-five years, from 1797 to 1821. The war with Napoleon terminated in 1815, and during the whole of this terrific struggle the prosperity of England in all departments of industry never was at a higher pitch. By the terms of the acts legalizing suspension by the bank from time to time the resumption of specie payments was wholly within the discretion of Parliament, and from 1815 till the resumption act, known as Peel's bill, in 1820 became the law of the land the currency question overshadowed all others. By this act resumption was to begin on the 1st of February, 1820, in part, and resumption in full to take effect by the 1st of May, 1823. Contraction, stern and relentless, was enforced by the Bank of England and all the country banks, the entire circulation of the empire having fallen from two hundred and thirty-two millions in 1818 to one hundred and twenty-nine millions in 1822, and the discounts of the Bank of England dropped down from fifty-seven millions in 1816 to five millions in 1821. The debt of England had increased from $1,100,000,000 in 1792 to $4,000,000,000 in 1815.

The resemblance between the prominent facts in the history of England and those of our own up to the passage of the resumption act of 1875 must arrest the attention of the most careless observer. It may be said that they run in parallel lines; and if our financial managers had not been deaf to the lessons of experience, and had not yielded such implicit obedience to the speculations of schoolmen and the vagaries of the closet, America should have been spared the misfortunes and calamities that befell England from 1820 to 1845. Sir Archibald Alison, in his History of Modern Europe, volume 2, pages 398–400, thus speaks of the effect of this legislation:

The effects of this extraordinary piece of legislation were soon apparent. The industry of the nation was speedily congealed, as a flowing stream is by the severity of an arctic winter. The alarm became universal, as widespread as confidence and activity had been. The country bankers who had advanced largely on the stocks of goods imported refused to continue their support to their customers, and they in consequence were forced to bring their stock into the market. Prices in consequence rapidly fell; that of cotton in particular sank in the space of three months to half its former level. The country bankers' circulation was contracted by no less than five millions sterling. The entire circulation of England fell from £48,278,000 in 1818 to £40,928,000 in 1820; and in the succeeding year it sunk as low as £34,145,000. Nothing in this disastrous contraction of the currency at a period when its expansion was so loudly called for sustained the national industry or averted a general bankruptcy but the fortunate circumstance that the obligation on the bank to pay specie was by the act of 1819 only to commence on the 1st of February, 1820, and this enabled that establishment in the preceding autumn, when the crash began, not only not to contract its issues, but even in a slight degree to increase them.

The effects of this sudden and prodigious contraction of the currency were soon apparent, and they rendered the next three years a period of ceaseless distress and suffering in the British islands. The accommodation granted by bankers diminished so much, in consequence of the obligation laid upon them of paying in specie when specie was not to be got, that the paper under discount at the Bank of England, which in 1810 had been £23,000,000, and in 1815 not less than £20,660,000, sunk in 1820 to £4,672,000, and in 1821 to £2,676,000. The effect upon prices was not less immediate or appalling. They sunk in general, within six months, to half their former amount, and remained at that low level for the next three years. Imports sunk from nearly £36,000,000, in 1818, to £29,769,000 in 1821; exports, from £45,000,000 in the former year to £35,000,000 in the latter. Distress was universal in the latter months of the year 1819, and that distrust and discouragement were felt in all branches of industry, which is at once the forerunner and the cause of disaster.

In a debate in the House of Commons in 1821 Mr. Baring thus speaks as to the effects of the contraction of the currency:

Looking at the facts growing out of the contraction of the currency, it is material to show what is the state of the country in this the sixth year of the peace. Petitions are coming in from all quarters remonstrating against the state of suffering in which so many classes are involved and none more than the agricultural class. When such is the state of the country in the sixth year of peace, and when all the idle stories about overproduction and underconsumption and such like trash have been swept away, it is natural to inquire into the state of a country placed in a situation without a parallel in any other nation or time. No country ever before presented the continuance of so extraordinary spectacle as that of living under a progressive increase in the value of money and decrease in the value of the productions of the people. It appears clear that from the operations of the currency we have loaded ourselves not only with an immense public debt, but also with an increased debt between individual and individual, the weight of which continues to press upon the country and to the continuance of which pressure no end can be seen.

In the Financial, Monetary, and Statistical History of England, by Doubleday, we have the following summary of the effect of this legislation:

As the memorable 1st of May, 1823, drew near, the country bankers as well as the Bank of England naturally prepared themselves by a gradual narrowing of their circulation for the dreaded hour of gold and silver payments "on demand," and the withdrawal of the small notes. We have already seen the fall in prices produced by this universal narrowing of the paper circulation. The effects of the distress produced all over the country, the consequence of this fall, we have yet to see.

The distress, ruin, and bankruptcy which now took place were universal, affecting both the great interests of land and trade; but among the landlords whose estates were burdened by mortgages, jointures, settlements, legacies, &c., the effects were most marked and out of the ordinary course. In hundreds of cases, from the tremendous reduction in the price of land which now took place, the estates barely sold for as much as would pay off the mortgages, and hence the owners were stripped of all and made beggars.

Pages of the same work are filled with the details of the misery and calamity of the English people, the effects of this measure.

In 1822 a resolution was offered in Parliament for a committee to consider the effect of the act for resumption on the agriculture, commerce, and manufactures of the kingdom, and in the debate growing out of that motion Mr. Atwood, who had stood alone in opposition to the resumption act, said:

In the year 1818 the average price of wheat was eighty-four shillings per quarter; and if the present price be taken at forty-seven shillings, that is a reduction on wheat of thirty-seven shillings, which is equal to a fall of £45 in every £100, or 45 per cent.

The price of iron in the year 1818 appears to have been £13; that price is now £88 per ton, and is equal to a reduction of about 40 per cent.

The price of cotton in 1818 was one shilling, and it was sunk to sixpence per pound, which is a fall of 50 per cent. on cotton.

Wool in the year 1818 sold at 2*s.* 1*d.*, which now sells for 1*s.* 1*d.*, and there is, therefore, in wool a fall of nearly 50 per cent.

The fall that has taken place, therefore, since 1818 in iron, in cotton, and in wool is as great as the fall in wheat. These are the great staples of commerce, and the average of the fall upon all three is 45 per cent., being exactly the reduction in grain.

This is recommended to the consideration of those who tell us of overproduction and an excessive cultivation of corn-land; but I refer also to a table compiled by Mr. Tooke, which contains a list of the principal articles of commerce and manufactures, thirty in number, which exhibits the same fall of 45 per cent. in all the articles except indigo, the price of which has been sustained, as I am informed, by circumstances of an exceptional kind.

The fall, therefore, is not peculiar to the products of agriculture, but is universal and has embraced every article of industry and every article of commerce. This fall of prices must have been produced by one of two causes—either the quantity of all commodities has increased, or the quantity of all money has diminished. One of these must of necessity have occurred, for the proportion is altered. Are we to believe that great changes have suddenly taken place in the productive powers of nature or the resources of art, so as to account for this sudden and universal fall in prices?

Is it likely that production in all the branches of industry, agricultural and manufacturing, would go on for three years constantly increasing in the presence of a constantly diminishing price? Evidently, it is not so.

In the midst of this fall of prices what operation in business could proceed without loss or ruin? There has been no form in which the capital of the merchant, none in which the capital of the manufacturer, could be invested without the half of it being sacrificed during this calamitous period. We have been thrown back upon a condition of society in which all industry and enterprise have been rendered pernicious or ruinous, and where no property is safe unless hoarded in the shape of money, or lent to others on a double security.

The effect upon labor and its diversified interests of the resumption act of 1819 was not more disastrous and depressing than upon the revenues of the country. Between 1815 and 1821, $640,000,000 was raised and applied to the payment of the public debt; from 1821 to 1836 only two hundred and forty millions was so applied, and from 1831 to 1841 there was a deficiency in the revenue and a slight increase of the public debt. That inestimable blessing, as predicted by Mr. Cobbett, has become as much of a fixture as its ecclesiastical establishment or its nobility; and the people of England begin to realize, as Americans do, "that no currency but one that was able to sustain a great war need be expected to liquidate its cost."

We may find some excuse for the chosen people of God when, after years of hardship and tribulation they forgot their deliverer from Egyptian bondage and the miracles by which Jehovah had brought them on their way to the land flowing with milk and honey, they made unto themselves a golden calf, and fell down and worshiped

it. Four hundred years of debasing servitude had effaced from their minds all idea of a spiritual, invisible God, and with false and blasphemous lips they cried out before the idol of Aaron's hand, "These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt." I say we can find some palliation for this act of daring wickedness and impious sacrilege in the gross darkness and deep degradation of the weary, wandering, and unbelieving descendants of Abraham and Isaac. But what apology can be offered, what justification can be made for the folly and wickedness of our financiers and their blind idolatry of gold, in closing their eyes and ears to the experience of England, and forcing the American people to travel the same road to commercial ruin, to the destruction of all their industrial interests, and to the aggrandizement of wealth and capital? Have we not worshiped at the shrine of the golden calf long enough? Have we not tasted sufficiently of the fruits of contraction? Have we not drank of the waters of bitterness long enough to satisfy the avarice of the usurer and the capitalist, as well as the crudities and crotchets of the theorist? Is there to be no end to the insane attempt to bring us to an impossible specie basis? Are we to be forever fed on delusions, shams, and cheats? Are we to sacrifice all the great interests of the country to the selfishness and greed of the money-dealers, bankers, and capitalists of the country, in the vain effort to secure a mere fiction—an unsubstantial "ideality"—a convertible currency? We should be warned by the experience of England, as well as our own, to call a halt in this ruinous and abortive policy of contraction, and abandon for years to come this delusion of a convertible currency.

I appreciate the importance, if not the necessity, of our having a monetary circulation of equivalent value with the currency of the world, it matters not what that currency may be; and having the most decided conviction that the framers of our Constitution intended to institute a hard-money government, I do not doubt that when the Government has obligated itself to pay a certain sum in dollars, the only fair and reasonable construction of such an obligation is that it is to pay so many grains or ounces in gold or silver, and nothing else can be made a legal tender. Nor do I give countenance for a moment to that construction of the Constitution which gives this Government powers in war that it does not possess in times of peace, and which authorizes Congress to enact laws which may be either within or without the scope of its delegated authority, according to the exigency or the pressure of surrounding circumstances. The Constitution was made for war as well as peace, and its powers are ample to protect the people and preserve the Government amid the conflict of arms as well as in the piping times of peace. Hence, while I yield to the authority of the legal-tender decisions of the Supreme Court, they do not have the approval of my judgment. The argument against the power of Congress to make anything but gold and silver a legal tender may be presented within a very narrow compass, and must be conclusive upon all who recognize the democratic canons of constitutional construction. This Government has no powers except what are specifically delegated or necessarily implied to carry out the delegated powers. The prohibition against the exercise of this power by the States gives no additional power to the General Government, and is a persuasive reason that the framers of the Constitution did not design that the General Government should do that which the States were prohibited from doing. There being therefore no expressly delegated power in Congress to make paper money a legal tender, and the exercise of this power not being necessary to carry into effect any of the express grants of power, it cannot be exercised by the States because of the prohibition, nor by the National Government, because the power is not specifically granted, nor is it necessary to carry out any express grant of power.

Nor is there any inconsistency between these views and opposition to forcing specie payment at the sacrifice of all other considerations, or preference of the direct issues of the Government over those of banks, guaranteed by the credit and resources of the Government. Specie payments by the Government or the banks, either now or in the near future, is an impossibility; but specie values are not only possible, but entirely practicable. If, as I have said, the Government had directed a tithe of its energies to appreciating the market value of its bonds, on which it paid no interest, which it has employed to appreciate and make more valuable its bonds bearing interest, I doubt not they would now be as relatively valuable as the forced circulation of France is. Nor, in my judgment, would the fact of their being deprived of their legal-tender quality tend to depreciate them in the slightest degree, provided they occupied, without any competitors, the entire field of paper circulation, and become, as they necessarily would, receivable for all taxes, national, State, and municipal.

For reasons hereafter given, discretion would have to be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury either to redeem these Treasury notes in gold or in an interest-bearing bond of par value, at his option, or to pay them when presented at the market value of gold instead of its mint value, in order to prevent the drain of a commodity so fluctuating as gold. But that such a paper token would be infinitely preferable to the issues of banks, either State or national, and would fulfill all the conditions of a uniform, cheap, and safe circulating medium is demonstrable both from reason and experience. Aside from the obligations of the Federal Constitution, and as an original proposition, it may admit of serious question whether the commerce, trade, and monetary transactions of this country and the world have not outgrown the use of metal as a circulating medium for domestic purposes. The general adoption of paper money among the most commercial and civilized nations of the world for the purposes of domestic circulation, not as a representative but as a substitute for coin, would seem a practical confession that the metals are inadequate for the business purposes of the world, and are only useful to liquidate balances among nations and peoples.

The theory that the circulating medium of a country must possess intrinsic value is comprehensible when applied to an exclusively metallic circulation or to a paper circulation such as that of the Bank of Amsterdam, which was a certificate of deposit of so much coin in its vaults. But the commerce and monetary arrangements of the world have progressed far beyond this point. Paper money has ceased to be a mere representative of coin, but an actual substitute for it, and its convertibility into coin has become a financial fiction. It passes current purely and simply on the credit of the issuer, and the idea that it can be converted into coin rarely enters into the mind of those among whom it circulates. The use of the precious metals was no doubt a great advance on the barter of barbarism and the cattle money of Abraham and Lot; and the certificates of the goldsmiths of London and of the banks of Venice and Amsterdam indicate a still higher civilization and a greater adaptation to the needs of society and commerce. Paper money is the outgrowth of a condition of things in the state where order reigns, rights are respected, and honor and good faith are observed among men, and its free circulation depends upon confidence, and not upon whether it can be converted into gold or silver. Herbert Spencer, one of the most original thinkers of the age, is not far from the truth when he says:

> The greater the prevalence of fraud, the greater will be the number of transactions in which the seller will part with his goods only for an equivalent of intrinsic value; that is, the greater will be the number of transactions in which coin is required, and the more will the metallic currency preponderate. On the other hand, the more generally men find each other trustworthy, the more frequently will they take payment in notes, bills of exchange, and checks; the fewer will be the cases in which gold and silver are called for, and the smaller will be the quantity of gold and silver in circulation.

It is one of the axioms of the economists that a circulating medium must have intrinsic value, and they tell us that gold and silver were made for that express purpose by the Creator of all things. But no sooner have our minds taken hold of this fundamental truth than they inform us that these metals are so expensive, so unwieldy, so liable to loss, that it is absolutely necessary to replace them with something that has no real or intrinsic value. They prove by specious and plausible arguments that money must be a veritable reality, and in the next breath they prove that this reality must be necessarily replaced by a ficticious substitute that has no real value. In order to escape from this contradictory dilemma, they tell us that their paper substitute is convertible into gold at will, and therefore is just as good as gold. But the reverse is true in fact, and your paper money is convertible when you do not want it, and inconvertible when you do. The convertibility of bank paper ever since it has been issued as a substitute for coin, and not its representative, has been a fiction and a delusion. When times are prosperous, business remunerative, and there is no demand for gold, you can have your bank-bill converted into gold or silver; but let a panic set in, let there be wars or rumors of war, let too much rain or too little leave the labor of the husbandman without reward and you should want your bank-note converted, the gold is not there for you. If your note is converted into cash, it has been accomplished oftentimes by cutting off accustomed discounts, curtailing the amount of this convertible paper, refusing to make loans, and thus paralyzing the legitimate operations of business and spreading bankruptcy and financial ruin through the country.

Convertibility is as false in fact as it is unsound in theory. We need not go abroad for examples. The history of America is crowded with evidences of its utter fallacy. Scarcely a decade has been numbered with the past that we have not had a commercial crisis and a monetary panic. Within the memory of the living the panics and suspensions of 1819 and 1820, of 1837, 1857, and 1861 have occurred, and all of them traceable directly or remotely to this financial fiction and its synonym, specie payments. A movement of one-tenth of the large reserve kept in the Bank of England is the sure forerunner of a commercial storm that sweeps like a hurricane over the British islands, and often leaves its marks among the remotest nations of the world. If it has not suspended specie payments as often as the banks of America, and its convertibles have not become inconvertible, it is because its power is supreme and autocratic, and it hesitates not to save itself by increasing its rates of interest to such an extent as to stop the movement of gold, bankrupt its customers, and spread panic and consternation through all the channels of commerce. Can a system which brings forth such fruits be worth preservation? "Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?"

And yet it is the necessary, inevitable, and logical result, demonstrable as well by reason as experience, of the theory that we must have a paper-money substitute for gold based upon gold and convertible into gold at all times. The precious metals are commodities, and must be treated as such. Like all other commodities, as wheat, iron, cotton, &c., they must share their fate, and will rise or fall in value according as they are plenty or scarce in the markets of the world. Their small bulk in proportion to their value and their facility of transportation render their fluctuation in value more rapid and frequent than most other commodities. A highly prosperous condition of this country, large crops of cotton, cereals, and provisions sold abroad at high prices, would ordinarily bring to us a heavy flow of the precious metals. This in turn produces a decline in the value of gold here in comparison with other commodities from its superabundance, and immediately it is shipped abroad. The same effect takes place when we have a short crop or large crops with low prices, or when there is a heavy demand for gold abroad from any cause. It matters not whether we have plenty or scarcity, good crops or bad; whether we have domestic prosperity or foreign disaster, the drain of the world's currency will go on; and if from any unusual cause it becomes intensified, monetary panic and commercial distress, if not bank suspension, will surely follow. So common have these seasons of pecuniary distress become that they are beginning to be regarded as inevitable as death, and we resign ourselves to our fate in hopeless despair. Never in our history has this country been so free from such panics as within the last fourteen years; and it must be obvious that, with a currency convertible into gold, the export of so large an amount of gold and bullion during the last fiscal year as reported by the Secretary of the Treasury would in all probability have produced a suspension of the banks with all its attendant calamities. I do not doubt but our true policy is to establish and maintain a non-exportable and a domestic currency, for many long years to come at least.

The solution of our financial problem is full of difficulties and embarrassments in its best aspects; but it must be apparent to any who have given the subject even a cursory consideration that these difficulties are vastly multiplied by the presence of two kinds of circulation, each endeavoring to supplant the other. If we had but one, in undisputed possession of the field, the problem would be greatly simplified. But we have in this currency question another illustration of the inferior attempting to supplant the superior, of the bottom rail taking the place of the top; and it is this conflict between opposing and conflicting interests which excites class, sectional, and individual animosities, obscures the judgment, confounds the real issues involved, and adds greatly to its real embarrassments. If the people of the United States were called upon to pass upon the real question at issue, which in the natural order of things must first be passed upon and finally adjudicated before other extraneous questions are considered; if they were required to make up a judgment on the elaborate argument of the Comptroller of the Currency in behalf of the national banks, presented to the country with all the zeal of an advocate with a fat retainer in his pocket, and the argument of my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in behalf of the greenback and his interconvertible scheme, the currency problem would be greatly simplified and its solution comparatively easy. But this, unfortunately for the cause of truth, is not permitted to them. Beyond doubt the primal question to be disposed of by Congress is who shall furnish the paper circulation of the United States? Shall the banks or the Government furnish it? Shall we pay a few individuals to supply the instruments of exchange for our people at a cost of twenty millions per annum, or shall it be furnished by the Government for nothing? This is the first question to be passed upon; and yet it is studiously kept out of view, covered up, and concealed by others of secondary grade. It is driven into the background by simulated efforts at resumption and by false clamors for specie payments and hard money, when resumption by the banks is an impossibility.

Again, the real issue is covered up and concealed by the raw head and bloody bones of "inflation." No more remarkable instance of shameless hypocrisy and unblushing impudence can be found in the history of partisan warfare. It is another attempt to steal "the livery of the court of heaven to serve the devil in." This resumption act, which its friends claim is a step in the direction of "honest" money and cash payments, is the most gigantic inflation scheme that ever received the consideration of Congress. It makes the issue of "rag money" and the birth of "rag babies" free to everybody who is the fortunate owner of national bonds, or who can borrow, beg, or steal them to the amount of $50,000. The only limitation to the issue of the irredeemable notes of the national banks is the amount of the interest-bearing debt of the Government, which is to be increased by the withdrawal of the fractional currency and the legal-tenders, to over four hundred millions. By this pretended resumption act 90 per cent. of the entire debt, interest-bearing and non-interest-bearing, may be converted into lamp-black and rags for circulation. This is the hard money, specie payment, anti-inflation feast to which all the organs of Wall street invite us. Inflation in their vocabulary means the increase of blackbacks without limit, and resumption means the total extinction of the greenbacks. If you are favorable to a substitution, dollar for dollar, of the bank issues for the direct obligations of the Government, and in favor of making the greenback equal in value to gold by appropriate legislation, you are branded as an inflationist; but if, on the contrary, you are for getting rid of the legal-tenders by an increase of the annual interest of the Government in the sum of seventeen or eighteen million dollars, and for an indefinite expansion of bank paper, with no obligations on the bank to redeem its notes at its counter or elsewhere, with no provision of law requiring such redemption, and with the almost absolute certainty that they cannot make such redemption, you are entitled to a high seat in the synagogue of money-changers and bullion-brokers, hard money, and honest currency!

The increase of national-bank circulation from June, 1874, to November 1, 1875, was $15,721,175, most of this increase being since the passage of the resumption act, so called, of last January; while the actual amount of aggregate bank circulation is diminished by little more than four millions within the same period. When the high price of United States bonds is considered, and the additional fact that many of the banks have been compelled to realize on their bonds and withdraw their circulation in order to meet losses sustained by them in the general stringency of money and the disordered financial condition of the country, it is a little remarkable that the amount of new circulation is so large and the sale and withdrawal of bonds not larger. The fact still remains that an act pretending to provide for resumption and hard money in reality provides for an indefinite augmentation of rag money, in the shape of bank paper; and it only requires the issue of the 4 per cent. bond recommended by Secretary Bristow to be made the basis of national-bank circulation, or a fall in the market value of the five-twenties and other bonds held as security for bank issues, to find banks multiplying rapidly.

Mr. Speaker, I can well comprehend how this conflict between Treasury notes and those of banking corporations should be accompanied with such deception, such false clamor, and with such studied concealment and avoidance of the real gist of the controversy. The organized wealth and capital of the Union has large interests at stake in it; the vast army of bondholders and stockholders, directors and attorneys, of two thousand banks are not indifferent spectators of it, and the whole eastern and northern sections of the Union, who have controlled and directed the finances of the country for the last fifteen years in the interest of money and capital, are aroused and excited about it. Selfishness, cupidity, and avarice furnish the weapons of this unholy warfare. The question whether a small and privileged class shall furnish the circulating medium for this vast and growing country and its forty millions of people and its diversified and expanding industries in perpetuity, not only without compensation to the Government or the people, but that they should receive a bonus for their liberality, or whether this circulation shall be furnished by the Government not only without cost, but at a saving of millions every year to a tax-burdened people, is sufficient to arouse all the baser passions of those so vitally interested. Not only is the value of four hundred millions of circulation to be duplicated in the near future involved, but the use of the taxes collected of the people as a basis of loans and discounts, on which high rates of interest are to be charged, as well. In addition to this the moneyed interest of the country and the men of invested capital look with favor to any plan that centralizes the Government; that steals power from the many to the few, and enables them to control the legislation and political action of the Government.

Never before in the history of America has there existed such a vast combination of organized wealth, welded and consolidated together by the "cohesive power of public plunder;" and it is not a matter of wonder or surprise that resort is had to every deception and device that cunning and cupidity can suggest. Following in the wake of this mighty army of greed and selfishness is an inconsiderable band of well-meaning men, wedded to the traditions of the past—afraid of experiments, enslaved to prejudice, and unwilling to trust the convictions of their reason and judgment. To them the exercise of the power of the Government to supply the people with a uniform and safe circulation for the business wants of the country is of doubtful expediency. They say that it has always been given to a corporation; it is opposed to all experience; it is a dangerous power to intrust to the representatives of the people. But is its exercise more perilous, or does it require a wiser discretion, than the power to borrow money and to issue the Government's obligations for it? There is no limitation on the power to raise revenue, either in the imposition of external duties or internal taxes—to declare war or to make peace. If Congress can be intrusted with the exercise of such important powers, can it not be intrusted with power to determine when and for what sum the Government shall issue its notes to the people? The power to borrow money is one of the specific powers intrusted to Congress; shall it be said the representatives of the people can mortgage the resources of the present and future generations for the payment of debts bearing interest, and yet cannot borrow of the people without interest? So far as governments have exercised this power it has been as often exercised with success as otherwise. It failed during the Revolution because there was a large excess of circulation, put in circulation by an unstable government, and there was no taxation levied with which it could be redeemed. We have not only the faith and resources of the Government on which to bottom it, but we have over three hundred millions of taxation by which to redeem it, in addition to the State, city, and county taxes of the several States of the Union.

The assignats of the French revolution is another bugbear that is always raised up by those who seek to give the banks a monopoly of the Government credit. Like our continental money, they were issued beyond all hope of redemption. Their sum exceeded $9,000,000,000, more than three times the amount of the whole debt of the United States and equal to about $360 to each inhabitant of France. They were not based on the revenues, the faith, or resources of France, but on the estates of the church and the nobility, confiscated by a government in a state of revolution at the time. Real estate of unquestioned title is indifferent security for a circulating medium at any time; but here the security was not only doubtful, but the government itself had no stability, and with the best security and under the best government the large amount issued would have depreciated it indefinitely. In a speech delivered by Mr. Calhoun in the Senate, September 19, 1837, in which he then advocated the duty and power of the Government issuing the paper money necessary for the business wants of the country, he thus spoke of the success which had attended the issue of Government paper by the State:

It may throw some light on this subject to state that North Carolina, just after the Revolution, issued a large amount of paper, which was made receivable in dues to her. It was also made a legal tender, but which of course was not obligatory after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. A large amount, say between four and five hundred thousand dollars, remained in circulation after that period, and continued to circulate for more than twenty years at par with gold and silver during the whole time, with no other advantage than being received in the revenue of the State, which was much less than $100,000 per annum. * * *

On the same point, in the same great speech, he made the following statement of facts:

We are also told that there is no instance of a Government paper that did not depreciate. In reply I affirm that there is none, assuming the form I propose, that ever did depreciate. Whenever a paper receivable in the dues of Government had anything like a fair trial, it has succeeded. Instance the case of North Carolina, referred to in my opening remarks. The drafts of the Treasury at this moment, with all their incumbrance, are nearly at par with gold and silver; and I might add the instance alluded to by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, in which he admits that as soon as the excess of the issues of the Commonwealth Bank of Kentucky were reduced to the proper point, its notes rose to par. The case of Russia might also be mentioned. In 1827 she had a fixed paper circulation, in the form of bank-notes, but which were inconvertible, of upward of $120,000,000, estimated in the metallic ruble, and which had for years remained without fluctuation, having nothing to sustain it but that it was received in the dues of the Government, and that, too, with a revenue of only about $90,000,000 annually. I speak on the authority of a respectable traveler. Other instances, no doubt, might be added, but it needs no such support.

Mr. Jefferson, from whom it is not improbable that Mr. Calhoun borrowed the scheme of Government Treasury notes as being the best, safest, and cheapest form of paper circulation, had in 1813 advocated the same policy, and as evidence of its efficiency and soundness he gave the experience of Virginia in 1755. He thus wrote to Mr. Eppes, then a member of this House and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee:

In the war of 1755, our State availed itself of this fund by issuing a paper money, bottomed on a specific tax for its redemption, and, to insure its credit, bearing an interest of 5 per cent. Within a very short time not a bill of this emission was to be found in circulation. It was locked up in the chests of executors, guardians, widows, farmers, &c. We then issued bills, bottomed on a redeeming tax, but bearing no interest. These were readily received, and never depreciated a single farthing.

We have the authority of Adam Smith for the statement that the State of Pennsylvania also issued a Government paper in 1745, made receivable for taxes, and that it maintained a value equal to the precious metals. And it is a fact well known to every one that the first issue of Government paper in 1861—of sixty millions, and which was receivable for all dues to the Government—was as good as gold, and never depreciated a farthing.

I concede that there is danger that they may, under a peculiar stress of circumstances, be issued to an excess that might depreciate them. But is there any greater danger of this being done by Congress than that the same Congress should make it to the interest of capitalists to put out too many of their promises to pay by organizing large numbers of banks. I have shown that the resumption act leaves the quantity of bank paper to be issued unlimited except by the sum of the Government debt. If the debt be two thousand millions, then 90 per cent. of that amount ($1,800,000,000) of bank paper may be issued under the provisions of that act. And how long would it be, if from any cause there were impediments in the way of the increase of banking and bank paper, before these impediments would be removed by legislation? One of the main grounds on which the people sustained President Jackson in his war against the Bank of the United States was that it exerted an undue and corrupting influence on the legislation of Congress in which the bank was interested. And does any one suppose that the influence of two or three thousand banks, representing six or eight hundred millions of capital, would not be felt in these Halls? Do we not know that they would dictate the legislation of Congress, and that the entire metropolitan press of the country would approve and applaud?

Power to determine the amount of paper money needful for the wants of the country must be lodged somewhere, and the same power that fixes the rates of taxation, that enacts a prohibitory or a revenue tariff, that can borrow a million or a hundred million dollars and issue the obligations of the people therefor, that can increase or decrease the Army, and that can in its discretion expend millions upon millions in building ships and custom-houses and improving harbors and rivers, ought to be as safe a depository of this power as can be found. But let us suppose that they should be issued in excess of demand, and depreciation should follow; the only effect would be to make the burdens of taxation lighter to the tax-payer, and the Government would be the chief sufferer. This injury thus inflicted upon the Government and its fiscal operations would necessarily throw all its power and influence against it, and afford a guarantee that the representatives of the people would commit no such folly except under the pressure of an overruling necessity.

If there were no graver objection to the national-banking system than that it necessarily perpetuates the public debt and organizes a gigantic monopoly in opposition to its reduction or extinction and pledged by the very law of its being to make it a permanent fixture of the Government, this alone should condemn it with a tax-ridden and overburdened people. Without the national debt we could have no national banks such as now exist. It constitutes their foundation, and is the meat and bread on which they subsist. They live and move and have their being in national indebtedness and in high taxation. Their existence is a confession that a national debt is a national blessing, and by their continuance we give form and life to a party and an interest inimical to the well-being of the Government, supported from exactions upon the labor and industries of the country, and dangerous to republican institutions.

No greater curse can be inflicted upon the people of this country, or republican government itself, than a permanent public debt. No party in this country, not even the republican party of this generation, has regarded a public debt other than a public calamity, to be extinguished as rapidly as possible. And yet we are countenancing and giving strength and vitality to a banking system whose central, fundamental idea is a permanent national debt, with its necessary attendants—profligate expenditures, high taxation, and corruption in all departments of the public service. The autocratic power which must necessarily be vested in the head of the Treasury Department under this system, the supervisory control which the national-banking law necessarily gives him over the banks and indirectly over the business of the country and the fortunes of individuals, the discriminations and favoritism of the law in favor of cities and sections, the consolidation of the political and moneyed power of the country which is effected by this system, are all grounds of serious objection; but they sink into comparative insignificance by the side of this gigantic evil of a permanent public debt.

Nor is it fair or just, as the Comptroller of the Currency has done, to contrast the national banks with the old State banks, and offset the vices of the one system against those of the other. It may be regarded as one of the questions on which the public mind is well agreed that no currency will be permitted to exist in this country that is not of uniform value in every part of it, and as good in Maine as in Texas. The day has passed in America when the channels of circulation can be filled with the promises to pay of local banks without credit fifty miles from home, or when a counterfeit detector is a necessary means of protection to every traveler beyond the borders of his State. Assuming that an exclusive metallic circulation is inadequate to the demands of trade and commerce in a highly civilized community, there is nothing more certain than that the paper circulation of the United States must either be issued by the Government directly, or by individuals or corporations under authority of the National Government. No State corporations will ever again be permitted or authorized to issue their notes for circulation, and the issue now is not between the paper emissions of the national banks and those of State banks, but between the direct and the indirect issues of the Government, between Treasury notes and the national-bank notes.

That is the great question before the American people, and it can neither be obscured or concealed permanently by simulated efforts at resumption, or by the false clamor of "inflation," "repudiation," or "hard money." It will not down at the bidding of politicians or party managers, whether republican or democratic. The divorce which the democratic party of the last generation decreed between the Government and the banks will be made final and perpetual by this, and the illicit intercourse which has grown up in a time of national peril and political corruption will cease forever, never more to be renewed. The inauguration of the Independent Treasury was the first step in the direction of a separation of those who should never have been joined together, and the abolition of the national banks will be the next and last in the final separation of the political from the money power.

The common sense of the people revolts against discarding a currency that saved the Union in its hour of peril, and substituting in its place one that never participated in the shock of battle or the trials of the tented field and only came to the help of the Union in time to unite in the shouts of victory. And their sense of fairness and equal and exact justice is not less outraged when they consider the wrong and injustice of establishing a privileged class in America, and conferring upon a favored few the franchise of supplying the paper circulation needed for the transaction of the trade, commerce, and business of forty millions of people. There was a time in the history of England when the right to transport the mails was farmed out to members of the royal family for a consideration, and we look back in amazement and wonder at the degradation of a people that would countenance such violations of right and justice. But what is the national-banking system but the farming out to the owners of United States bonds for a paltry consideration this invaluable franchise of supplying the people with a circulating medium? Indeed, so anxious is the Government to barter away one of its highest duties and to abdicate one of its sovereign powers, that it actually offers a bonus to this privileged class to undertake the business of issuing their own notes and making the people pay interest on them.

If by an act of Congress the Government should confer the privilege of furnishing the circulation for the Union to certain individuals by name, in each State, on their compliance with certain terms, the enormity of such legislation would shock the most obtuse intellect. It would simply be vesting with a new and valuable attribute that which was without such legislation comparatively valueless. It would be in effect saying to these favored individuals that their notes of hand, on which they had heretofore paid interest, should henceforth yield them interest. It would be allowing them the privilege of exchanging their promissory notes without interest for the promissory notes of other men bearing interest. Such are banks of issue in their best and simplest form. But is it any the less an enormity and an outrage upon the rights of the many that this franchise of issuing its notes for circulation and making them receivable for hundreds of millions of Government dues is granted to a corporation called a national bank? Is the injustice and wrong of the thing sanctified by this valuable privilege being made over for a generation to an artificial instead of a natural person; to five men and their successors, instead of to one and his administrators or assigns? But national banking is a still greater enormity than this. It is a proposition to the capitalist if he will invest his money in United States bonds the Government will not only pay him 6 per cent. on his investment but give him the additional privilege of issuing his notes to the extent of 90 per cent. of the par value of his investment, without interest, in exchange for other promissory notes bearing any rate of interest he can bargain for.

I do not doubt that in the extremity in which the credit of the Government was placed during the late unnatural conflict the national banks served a good purpose in absorbing and floating the national debt; but the credit of the Government needs no such adventitious aid now, and justice to the Government and to a tax-ridden and overburdened people demands that we should put these institutions into a course of liquidation and adopt a more just, cheaper, and less burdensome system of currency.

No question of greater moment to the country, and especially to its industrial classes, has ever occupied the attention of Congress. Nor is it less important to the democratic party. From the days of Jefferson to the present time it has been in opposition to national banking, and it can ill afford to repudiate the teachings of its great founder and go back upon its past history. "The field of circulation," which, to use his forcible language, "has been filched from us by individuals," must be restored to the General Government. We cannot permit a delegation of its powers to corporations or individuals. Much less can we permit it to abdicate such an important function of its sovereign authority as that of supplying the people with the life-blood of circulation. If we would preserve the integrity of our party and the purity of its principles, if we would retain the confidence and support of the great producing sections of the Union and of its industrial classes, we have no other alternative than to wage an unceasing war against national banking, whatever disguise it may assume, whether that disguise be hard money or rag money. A timid, hesitating, time-serving policy, that fears to do right and yields to the clamorous demands of money and capital, will expose us to the just indignation of our friends and to the deserved contempt of our enemies.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. DIBRELL was granted leave to print some remarks he had prepared, in the RECORD, as part of the debates. [See Appendix.]

THE TEXAS AND PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, for years the question of a southern line of railway to the Pacific Ocean has more or less engaged public attention. At first such a line was regarded by its opponents as a mere vagary or a bare possibility of the distant future, and by its friends as a something to be dimly hoped for, but by no means a definite expectation. But with the rush of events and the changes of years requirements have been impressed upon the attention of the country which before were either unknown or not appreciated, and public thought is now impelled to this question as one of grave magnitude and importance. And not only has it assumed proportions that keep it in the foreground of the country's observation, but it is also of a shape and character that demand for it some definite disposal. This is a fact which will hardly be denied. The question must be settled before a great while, or it may not only grow more absorbing, but become to some extent an element of bitterness and strife. The friends and foes of one enterprise are already taking sides, and the time has come for a full and fair inquiry into its merits. Shall this inquiry be made in a spirit of liberality and fairness, or shall it be warped and obscured at the behests of jealousy and partisanship?

Will the establishment of a southern road to the Pacific Ocean benefit and promote the interests of the whole country? Will it benefit and promote the legitimate interests of one section without detriment to those of another? If either question can be safely answered in the affirmative, then certainly one obstacle is removed. Do the necessities of the country require the construction of such a road? This question, in the purview of national legislation, is above and beyond all others.

In taking position in favor of the Texas and Pacific Railway, I do not profess the ability to elaborate the great importance and value of that enterprise. Nor will I, in the course of a brief and general argument, undertake to range long columns of figures, or to marshal an array of bewildering statistics. Statistics are facts of history; while figures, though they do not of themselves deceive, can be so grouped as to exhibit almost any desired result. I shall prefer to consider the question in its general aspects, and will leave to those who choose them the pleasures of calculation.

If it be true, Mr. Speaker, that he is a benefactor who causes two blades of grass to grow where but one grew before, we have in that brief saying a text which epitomizes much of the argument in behalf of this great movement. It is expressive of a principle which underlies the whole of human progress in whatever is wise and good. Development is one of the grand ends of physical as well as moral life, and advancement is as much the duty of a people as of an individual. And in the line of material development, that is, of the latent treasures of soil and of opportunities for the use of capital and labor, thus giving range and impetus to the progressiveness and energy of American spirit, the good results that will follow the success of this or some such enterprise are beyond estimate. There is a grandeur in the thought of filling the wilderness with the appliances of progress and the blessings of civilization. But it is not the sole end of this great scheme to people the wilderness and civilize the solitude. Its advantages will be immediate and tangible in every quarter of the country. And the fact that from the construction and operation of this road benefits and advantages will accrue to the Government which it has not now and which are well-nigh indispensable, should be a leading consideration in all our discussions of this subject. To appreciate the gain that the Government will derive we must understand something of its necessities. A vast area of country in the Southwest now requires aid and protection; and on account of the absence of proper facilities this aid and protection can be provided only at vast expense.

In the year 1873 a dozen regiments of cavalry and infantry were stationed in Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona to furnish protection against the danger of hostile incursions. And yet with all this force, comprising nearly one-half of the effective strength of the United States Army, it is said that life and property were not adequately protected. A reasonable estimate of the cost of maintaining for a year a single regiment in those remote regions is a million for infantry, and a million and a half of dollars for cavalry. Then more than $12,000,000 must be expended annually in the matter of transportation, equipment, and supplies for the military force stationed in that portion of the public domain as long as a force of such size may be necessary. If this expense can be obviated or lessened, we ought to hasten to do it. To be convinced that it can be very greatly lessened, we need but inquire of those sections of country crossed by the present Pacific Railroad which were formerly troubled by Indian incursions, and where two regiments are now force sufficient. In the latter case the reduction of expense is due to railway communication and facilities; in the former the magnitude of expense is due to their absence. I do not claim strict accuracy in these figures—they are not mine—but I believe that if there is error in stating the cost of military force in Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, it is in an underestimate.

It is hardly necessary to urge that with railway and telegraphic communication to and through these regions, furnishing facilities for speedy transportation and intelligence, savage incursions would end, and the remote settler would realize the blessings of peace and security. As it is now, he must lead a precarious life, and at great pecuniary cost to his Government, or turn back his gaze from the boasted "star of empire," and leave to the savage and brute a land that challenges his enterprise and hope. It was recently stated in this Hall that the Mexican and Indian had driven back the frontier of Texan occupation two hundred miles. Whether this is true to the extent stated or not, it gives proof of the inability of our Government to protect its territory against a trifling foe except at the cost of a standing army that would deplete its coffers and undermine its strength. We ought not to have this Texan frontier and these Territories, or we ought to provide for their protection through means that will not amount to a positive evil. This reflection, however, we need not indulge. The frontier of Texas and the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona are of this Government, and, whether we will or not, the problem of their security must be confronted.

But if there were no danger of Mexican and Indian depredations, and the employment of an army were unnecessary, there are other and commanding reasons in favor of this highway. In developing the resources of the country where they are worth developing the Government strengthens its own power by widening the field of industry and enlarging the sphere of the citizen's usefulness and prosperity. Of what use to the Government is a waste of territory, wild, remote, and uninhabited? It may abound in natural wealth, but that wealth is of no value to the world. Its mountains may be grand and its valleys lovely; its soil may hold untold fertility, its mines may glitter with gold and gems, its streams may flow in perennial beauty, but the world is none the wiser, none the better. These, which might be blessings, are hid from the sight and touch of man; or, what is substantially the same thing, they lie beyond his reach.

The distance from Fort Worth to San Diego is given at fourteen hundred and fifty-seven miles. The Territories of New Mexico and Arizona are together about six hundred miles across. In 1870 New Mexico had a population of about one hundred thousand, and Arizona about forty thousand. Through all this country, as well as the large region of Western Texas, military posts must be kept up and increased in number and strength as occasion may require. Material and supplies must be transported no matter what the cost; land-offices must be had; post-routes must be established and mails carried; in a word, the active supervision of the Government must extend to remote and isolated sections, without any facilities for the prompt transmission of intelligence or rapid disposition of force. If that whole country were a wilderness, with no inhabitant but the wild Indian, its exploration and discovery might be left to the hunter and his follower, the pioneer. But such is not the case. Already New Mexico is knocking at the door of the Union for admission as a sovereign State, and Arizona doubtless looks forward to the same step.

But there is yet another view why the contemplated railway should be built. The country through which it will pass, taken as a whole, is full of such resources as supply wealth to large populations. The line of construction will lie along the thirty-second parallel of latitude, which is the natural outlet and direction for the expansion of southern industries. It will connect directly and indirectly with the leading southern roads east of the Mississippi, and open to them new sources of strength and new opportunities for prosperous business. As the main line moves westward, penetrating new fields for enterprise, population will go with it. Agriculture will take possession of the soil, manufactories will be built, and commerce in its multiform shapes and relations will send the currents of busy life through all the channels of employment. Renewed vitality will be imparted to the languishing roads of the South, and their invested capital rendered valuable and secure. New hopes will quicken the energies of a people, and business, shaking off the paralysis that has so long weighed it down, will arise from its prostration and diffuse throughout the land the kindling influences of spirit and action.

It is not proposed that the Government shall subsidize this great scheme. It is asked only that the Government, being first amply secured, shall guarantee the interest on the bonds of the road at a given rate, thus enabling the road to procure money by sale of the bonds as the work of construction proceeds. At an average rate of $40,000 per mile, (which is an overestimate,) the cost of actual construction from Fort Worth to San Diego would be a little less than $30,000,000. The only liability the Government is asked to assume is 5 per cent. interest on the bonds. This interest on the cost of construction at the figures stated would be less than $3,000,000 per annum. In fact it is asserted that—

The utmost liability which the Government could assume is less than $2,000 per mile per annum if all the bonds authorized were issued, and this liability would be lessened in proportion to the actual cost of the road.

And the Government is to be protected against loss in this way:

The bonds are secured by a first mortgage covering the road, equipment, franchises, and Government lands; these bonds are placed in the United States Treasury, and as sections of the road are completed the Government commissioners must certify that they are properly constructed, and also as to the actual cost of the same, and that the money has been properly expended.

On this certificate the respective companies get bonds to the amount of the actual cost of the work, but not exceeding an average of $35,000 per mile on the main line, and $30,000 upon extensions.

The Government retains all sums due for its transportation, Indian, military, and postal, and for its telegraphic service.

All net receipts from the sale of Government lands are paid into the Treasury.

Such additional sum from the earnings of the roads is to be paid into the Treasury as may be necessary to meet the interest as it matures.

In case from any cause the earnings should be insufficient, $5,000 of bonds per mile are left in the Treasury, which the Secretary is authorized to sell, and thus put himself in funds to pay the interest.

The ability of the company to meet this interest cannot be doubted. The net earnings of the present Pacific line average $6,000 to $8,000 per mile per annum. The bonds proposed would require less than $2,000 of net earnings at the utmost.

These statements are quoted from good authority, and I believe them to be correct. If they are correct, is not the security ample beyond question? The aid sought for the Texas and Pacific Railway is modest in comparison with the amount received from the Government by the present Pacific road. I do not now know how much of public land was given to that work, but it was certainly a munificent donation. I have seen an assertion that it was enough to make two States, each the size of the State of New York. In addition the Government loaned to that line its bonds to the amount of nearly $60,000,000. On these bonds the Government now pays and must continue to pay $3,000,000 of interest per year as long as the bonds shall run. Nor is the security furnished the Government for this large outlay such as would seem commensurate with such liabilities and burdens; and the present line is a vast monopoly, oppressive to Government and citizen alike. It runs through large reaches of barren country which must remain waste. In the cold seasons it is operated at great trouble and expense, and at times is completely blocked. The difficulties of grade and season will remain difficulties as long as the mountains stand and winters return.

I have no estimate of the commerce that comes from the Pacific to San Francisco, and thence, with the productions of California, along this great highway, nor of the trade and carrying that pass back along the same path; but it is enough to say that the Golden Gate is not merely an entrance to the Pacific shore. Being the only connection between the mighty East and prolific West, and bearing the shipments and trade of both sections on its own terms, the present line is a gigantic monopoly. And yet who would say that the Pacific Railroad is not a necessity to the Government and people of the United States? Who would undo the work, restore the wilderness, obliterate the achievements, give back the progress, and remand the country to its prior situation? Alaska might, perhaps, be left to its freezing with but little regret, but the States of Oregon and California, with all the grand domain of the Pacific slope and the grander domain east of the mountains, would forbid with a voice like a convulsion.

As competition gives life to trade, so it is a safeguard against abuse, and this is another reason for at least one more line of railway to the Pacific Ocean. The country is too large and its interests are too extensive to be in the control of a single line, apart from the inconvenience of such a situation. And, if there were nothing else, the matter of inconvenience is of itself sufficiently serious to demand the location of another line. I speak not now of the inconvenience to the Government in the matter of troops and supplies to the remote regions of the Southwest, but of the general inconvenience to both Government and citizen in any section of the Southern States in reference to the use of the present road. A trader or traveler in New Orleans desiring to go to San Francisco has but one way. He must first go to Omaha, and then he is nearly as far from his destination as San Diego is from New Orleans. In other words, if the Texas and Pacific Railway were built he would be at San Diego, on the Pacific coast, almost if not quite as soon as by the present route he could reach Omaha. A thousand similar illustrations might be made.

This is not in any proper sense a question of party or sectional difference, but if there be a disposition to oppose the enterprise because the South will reap advantages, let me quote high republican authority in its favor:

There are a dozen arguments each sufficient in itself to warrant the construction of a southern transcontinental line of railway from the Mississippi to the Pacific coast. Such, for instance, as the needs of a vast undeveloped territory possessing boundless mineral and agricultural wealth, the addition to our stores of precious metals from Northern Mexico, New Mexico, and Arizona more than now comes from the silver mines of Nevada and the gold-fields of California; the substitution of civilization for savagery or barbarism over a district larger than the thirteen original States of the Republic; the saving to the Government (which means the people) eight to ten millions annually in the single item of border protection; the saving of nearly as much more in Government and general transportation; the addition of annual millions to the revenue from a district that is now only a burden; the giving of facilities for transit and transportation to twelve millions of people; the doing justice to the whole West and South by giving them the same facilities that have been provided at vast expense for the North and Northwest; the restoration of prosperity to the whole country by stimulating all its industries and opening new channels of trade.

A plenty of other reasons might be given for the prompt execution of this great enterprise, but one single argument absorbs or overshadows all the others. There is now in existence and active operation a huge monopoly as corrupt as it is powerful, which holds the only gateway to the Pacific, and levies upon all travelers and traders a tax measured only by its avaricious greed.

If this is true, Mr. Speaker, it is argument conclusive.

If it be asked what will follow the construction of the Texas and Pacific Railway, let me quote, by way of answer, from other authority:

Some of the immediate and legitimate results of the inauguration and vigorous prosecution of this work may be stated as follows:

It will bring many millions of foreign capital into the country to be distributed among iron-masters, contractors, and laborers, thus contributing largely to the relief of the financial pressure throughout the country.

It will rekindle the fires and start the machinery in furnaces and founderies East and West, giving profitable employment to an army of idle men, either in the construction of the work or in the preparation of material.

It will aid in the rapid development of many millions of acres of good farming lands in Texas, the Indian Territory, New Mexico, and Arizona, and in the successful working of the rich silver, gold, and copper mines of the two last-named Territories, and of the northern states of old Mexico.

It will bring into those regions a multitude of industrious emigrants from the older States and from Europe, to build up mining towns and transform a wild waste into productive farms.

It will do much toward the solution of the Indian question by reason of the more rapid advance of the great army of civilization which it will inevitably secure, thus saving the Government millions annually in the single item of border protection. (It was estimated by a committee of the last Congress that it costs the Government annually $10,000,000 to maintain an available force sufficient to protect the lives and property of the white inhabitants of the country traversed by this line of road.)

It will save to the Government in the diminished cost of transporting military stores, Indian supplies, and the mails more annually than the interest on the bonds proposed to be issued for the construction of the road.

It will carry the industries of civilization into the northern states of Mexico, a country containing nearly ten millions of people, and secure to us the immense trade that is now being diverted into other and foreign markets.

It will secure to us a highway from the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean on the shortest, best, and most economical route—a line free from the obstructions of high mountains, deep snows, and the annual floods which beset the present route.

It will aid largely to secure cheap transportation, by creating a healthy competition with the only other line of transcontinental railway.

It will bring increased revenue to the Government, by substituting industrious, productive communities in the place of savage hordes, now a source of enormous expense and perpetual annoyance.

It will rehabilitate the South, by pouring through that fertile but distracted region of our country a perpetual tide of the world's commerce, vitalizing its railroad system, and reviving its paralyzed industries.

It will bring more immediate, substantial, and permanent benefits to the West and South than any enterprise that has yet been inaugurated.

This rich territory, covering an area of nearly one million of square miles, which has been practically ignored in the legislation of Congress, while it is entitled, equally with any other section, to such favors as the Government may legitimately bestow, will add by its prosperity to the wealth and glory of the whole country.

These are facts and arguments, Mr. Speaker, which challenge the approval of every citizen of this Government. They perhaps have been read by most of the members of this House, and it is safe to say that they grow more apparent to the people every day. If any enterprise or measure can secure to the country the whole, or even a part, of the ends stated, it ought to meet only encouragement.

For these and other reasons which might be urged, we say that the contemplated road is demanded by the best interests of the country. It is conceded that it cannot be built by private capital. The Government must give it indorsement, else it cannot proceed. Nor would I advocate a single step that would fix ultimate liability upon the Government, even in this instance, without abundant and unquestioned security. I was reared in the school of strict construction, that tolerated no theory of internal improvements by the General Government, nor do I depart from its teachings. This enterprise does not ask the Government to loan or vote a dollar to its aid.

This is said to be an age of advancement, and if it be true that new liabilities grow with enlarged surroundings, legislation certainly has a broader field and larger responsibilities than it had a generation ago. The area of the Government has immensely expanded, and the Constitution itself has been stretched well-nigh out of its original semblance. The growth of the country, with corresponding requirements, interposed an exception to a time-honored rule of construction or excused its violation, and like causes are offering a similar exception. Knowing, then, that this road cannot be built by private means; that the Government must lend a limited security or see the movement fail; feeling that the Government will be amply assured by accepting the terms proposed, and recognizing the construction of the road as a public necessity, I do favor the scheme in its general features, as I understand it.

There may be matters of minor importance in the measure which are objectionable; and, inasmuch as the bill is not now before the House, I am not pledged by these remarks to any specific details. I reserve to myself the right to oppose, at the proper time, objectionable provisions, or the bill altogether if it be not such as I can consistently support; and I will without hesitation give my humble support to any other measure that may be shown to be better than this.

How long must the yearly drain of millions of money go on without an effort on the part of Congress to stop it? But a few years will pass before enough will have been spent to construct another road from ocean to ocean, and then the same demands will exist as now. Indeed, expenditures and necessities may increase with even pace, for American citizens will continue to push their way into this land of the southwest and impose upon the Government the responsibility of their security. Nor is there any other way of relief to the Government than that of a southern transcontinental line of railway. Trade may revive, industries may awaken to renewed life, commerce and capital may spread prosperity through all the favored portions of the country, but this special section, without the iron road and the steam-engine, must, with all its wealth, remain isolated and unproductive; and still it must be kept in the watchful care of the Government, be the cost what it may.

I have thus presented some of the general and leading propositions in favor of this great enterprise. I have not sought to enter the wide field of specification and detail. To do so would require much time and unnecessary labor. The merits of the question can be sufficiently presented in any general statement, and sufficiently understood without any labored mental effort. If certain leading facts be admitted, the conclusion is inevitable. This enterprise may fail. The road so much desired, and of such commanding importance, may never be built, but the logic of its necessity will be irresistible still.

If, Mr. Speaker, the tendency of this Government to centralization is right; if the doctrine of State rights is a dream of the past and the rights of the States are absorbed in the authority and power of the General Government; if, in short, we are a nation, as some extremists seem to mean by that term, then there need be no hesitation in either lending a limited credit to the Texas and Pacific Railway or in building and equipping it outright. Centralized, consolidated power might well dispense with the farce of enactment and proceed upon its own fiat. But, sir, I can never yield assent to such despotic doctrine. Representative governments are made for the people, in whom alone sovereignty is inherent; and the more there is of centralization the more the people are shorn of their rights. Let it not be said that this tends to wild democracy and would destroy Federal authority, for the very fact of representative government recognizes such authority. But this authority is a creature and servant, and not the creator and master. The creature is of trifling worth in comparison with the power that made it, and if displaced can be re-established by the same power; but if the power itself be destroyed, the tribunal of responsibility is gone and despotism may work its will.

But the question of this road is not one of politics or of party differences. It offers no field for dissension in our views of legislation and government. It affects political parties alike, and looks to the general good as well as the interests of a particular section. I will not deny that to myself its chief attractiveness lies in the fact that such a highway will do much to rebuild the South. In this feeling there is no undue selfishness, for the North already has its road and needs no other, while the South has no such road and is in need. Shall we have to conclude that the more favored section will rest its opposition in a spirit of jealousy and ill-will; that, enjoying the splendid facilities of its own line, it would crush generous competition and still hold the people and Government to an onerous and enforced tribute? Shall we of the South have to learn that peace, though subsisting for a decade, is only nominal, and that beneath the appearance of reconciliation rankle the passions and animosities of the war? Shall the same flag be the evidence of a common prosperity and a common hope, or shall it float above the tide of progress in one section and amid the shadows of decay in another? When we boast of the glory and power of the American nation is it to be understood that a large section, though bearing its full share of public burdens, shall be discredited and despised? Sir, when the soldiers of the South laid down their arms the soldiers of the North quit fighting. With them reconciliation was immediate and final. It could not be otherwise with men who had tested the virtues and exhibited the courage of manhood in a conflict that has no parallel. The brave man who conquers never tramples. Allow me to say that as the great scene of last year in the presence of Bunker Hill Monument was in its sentiment and effect beyond the gift of tongue or pen, so it fell upon the eager heart of the South, and kindled emotions that have not weakened with the lapse of time.

There can be no more effectual way to bind the southern people to the nation's weal than to give us an equal chance in the race of progress. We seek nothing more. It is said that since the beginning of the Government the North and the Northwest have had, in one way and another, aid to the extent of $175,000,000, while the South has had less than twenty millions. I do not allude to this fact in an invidious sense. It is perhaps to be attributed largely to another fact—that the South was almost entirely an agricultural region, and did not so much need the facilities that are indispensable to purely commercial localities. But to-day the case is different. We are dependent upon commerce, and without it must remain in a state of comparative prostration. We have but to contrast our situation with that of the more favored sections to see what we might be. And surely, if there has been so much disparity in the favors of the Government, it cannot be amiss now to ask that the difference shall be lessened. We have borne our share of burdens under a heavy yoke, and now we are entitled to a division of benefits, or we are serfs in a land of vaunted republican equality. If the Mississippi could change its course, and empty its turbid volume into New York Harbor, but a little while would pass before impregnable levees, built at Government expense, would line its banks and all the agencies of prosperous and powerful commerce would be in active operation under the encouragement of the Government.

Sir, I would stir no passion, revive no prejudice; but I would bring the cause of my people to a tribunal of generous minds and responsive hearts. With us the bitterness of strife is past. Our women scatter the roses of spring upon the grave of the soldier that wore the blue as they do above the sleeping dust of the soldier that wore the gray. We invoke oblivion for the ills and sorrows of a family contest; or, if they must be remembered, let it be in that twilight between memory and forgetfulness, where rugged outline and harsh angle are softened by mellowing tints or obscured by deepening shadows. We would lift our gaze to a brightening future, in which a nation's glory is upheld by the common devotion of an undivided people. [Applause by members on the floor.]

REMOVAL OF TAX ON LEAF-TOBACCO.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the opportunity afforded by the order of the House setting apart this day for general debate to present some considerations that in my judgment appeal strongly in behalf of the repeal or modification in some essential particulars of our present revenue laws on the subject of tobacco.

The provisions complained of, and to which I desire to call your attention, are found in section 3244 of the Revised Statutes, and are contained in subsections 6 and 7, which are as follows:

Sixth. Dealers in leaf-tobacco, except retail dealers in leaf-tobacco, as hereinafter defined, shall pay $25. Every person shall be regarded as a dealer in leaf-tobacco, whose business it is, for himself or on commission, to sell, or offer for sale, or consign for sale on commission, leaf-tobacco; and payment of a special tax as dealer in tobacco, manufacturer of tobacco, manufacturer of cigars, or any other special tax, shall not exempt any person dealing in leaf-tobacco from the payment of the special tax therefor hereby required. But no farmer or planter shall be required to pay a special tax as a dealer in leaf-tobacco, for selling tobacco of his own production, or tobacco received by him as rent from tenants who have produced the same on his land: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to exempt from a special tax any farmer or planter who, by peddling or otherwise, sells leaf-tobacco at retail directly to consumers, or who sells or assigns, consigns, transfers, or disposes of to persons other than those who have paid a special tax as leaf-dealers or manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, or to persons purchasing leaf-tobacco for export. Dealers in leaf-tobacco shall sell only to other dealers who have paid a special tax as such, and to manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, and to such persons as are known to be purchasers of leaf-tobacco for export.

Seventh. Retail dealers in leaf-tobacco shall each pay $500, and if their annual sales exceed $1,000 shall each pay in addition thereto fifty cents for every dollar in excess of $1,000 of their sales. Every person shall be regarded as a retail dealer in leaf-tobacco whose business it is to sell leaf-tobacco in quantities less than an original hogshead, case, or bale, or who sell directly to consumers, or to persons other than dealers in leaf-tobacco, who have paid a special tax as such; or to manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, who have paid a special tax, or to persons who purchase in original packages for export. Retail dealers in leaf-tobacco shall also keep a book, and enter therein daily their purchases and sales in a form and manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which book shall be open at all times for the inspection of any revenue officer.

Whenever it becomes necessary to ascertain the amount of annual sales made by any retail dealer in leaf-tobacco, or to ascertain the excess of such sales over $1,000, such amount and excess shall be ascertained and returned under such regulations and in such form as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and whenever the amount of sales or receipts is understated or underestimated by any retail dealer in leaf-tobacco, he shall be again assessed for such deficiency, and shall be required to pay the same, with any penalties that may by law have accrued or be chargeable thereon.

In explanation of the interest I feel upon the subject I may be permitted to remark, that in a large portion of the district which I have the honor to represent tobacco is very extensively grown, and great inconvenience and oppression have resulted from the operation of those provisions, both to the producer and consumer of tobacco.

Complaint is directed especially against the proviso to section 6 and the last portion of section 7, which impose a tax of $500 upon every person who sells leaf-tobacco in less quantities than an original hogshead, case, or bale, or who sells directly to consumers or persons who have not taken out license as dealers in leaf-tobacco. The dealer in leaf-tobacco having paid $25 and taken out license can purchase in any quantities, but he can sell only to "other dealers who have paid a special tax as such, and to manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, and to such persons as are known to be purchasers of leaf-tobacco for export." The retail dealer in leaf-tobacco is one whose businesss it is to sell leaf-tobacco in quantities less than an original hogshead, case, or bale, or who sells directly to consumers or to persons other than licensed dealers in leaf-tobacco; and such retail dealer is required to pay $500 for his privilege.

While no doubt the Government derives considerable revenue from the twenty-five-dollar tax imposed upon the dealer, it is almost unnecessary to state to this House that very little revenue is derived from the five-hundred-dollar tax upon retail dealers.

Your attention is invited to the following letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, communicating some important information on this point:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, January 27, 1876.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 26th instant, and in reply to the inquiries therein contained would state that * * * no collections of special taxes of retail dealers in leaf-tobacco have ever been made from Tennessee. The following returns have been made from Kentucky: In May, 1873, $1,000, by A. H. Bowman, collector of seventh district; and from the same collector, in May, 1874, $1,000; and in May, 1875, $500; in August, 1875, $62.50, by W. S. Holden, collector of sixth district. The last amount is the special tax for one month, with a penalty of 50 per cent. added.

Yours, respectfully,

D. D. PRATT,
Commissioner.

Hon. W. P. CALDWELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

It therefore appears from the foregoing letter that there cannot legally exist now, nor has there legally existed at any time since the enactment of the tobacco law, any retail trade in leaf-tobacco for consumption in the State of Tennessee, which State, I beg to remind the House, as appears by reference to census of 1870*, is in respect of quantity of tobacco raised within its limits the third on the list of tobacco-growing States.

In Kentucky, which stands at the head of the list, the amount of the retail tobacco tax is so insignificant that it is apparent the law there is in effect prohibitory of the trade. The same I take to be the case all over the country; and the result is that the consumer of tobacco who is not a producer of it, though he may prefer the unmedicated leaf, is forced to the use of the manufactured article at a greatly enhanced cost as being the only sort which he can purchase lawfully, or he may share with his neighbor, the producer, the risk of a violation of the law by purchasing the leaf by retail or accepting it as a gift. That the sale of it by retail is in violation of law admits of no doubt; and the opinion is not without some show of plausibility that under the proviso to section 6 the words "transfer or dispose of" would bring even a gift of leaf-tobacco within the purview of the law and make it criminal. The intent of the law-maker seems to have been the absolute prohibition of the use of raw or unmanufactured tobacco except by the producer; for the manufacturer, in whose interest and at whose instance it is believed the law was passed, seems to have paused only before the enormity of denying to the farmer the use of the fruits of his own labor.

Governments should never have recourse to oppressive legislation, unless the public welfare imperatively demands it. When such legislation has to be resorted to, and is of a character which renders it difficult of enforcement and easy of evasion, it is not only vexatious, but demoralizing. When laws are disregarded and set at naught with impunity, the effect is to be deprecated, as tending more or less to bring all law and authority into contempt. It is scarcely necessary to say that the habit of using tobacco, when once contracted, exercises a dominion over its subject from which only the highest degree of moral courage can deliver him; but we cannot assume it to be in any sense a moral or legal offense which the law can undertake to correct, or punish, or prevent.

All the traditions and habits of our people render them extremely averse to sumptuary laws, and the law under consideration is liable to many of the objections which have been urged against sumptuary legislation. It is unjust and oppressive to the unfortunate devotee to drive him from the use of a kind of tobacco to which he has been accustomed by placing it absolutely out of his reach and force him to the use of another kind by which the expense of the habit is increased from six to ten fold. It is unwise and ill-considered legislation which presents to him the alternatives of submitting to these heavy exactions or becoming at small risk a party to a violation of the law.

Only highly conscientious men, it must be admitted, who are restrained from infractions of the law by a higher motive than the fear of detection, prosecution, and punishment, yield obedience and submit, though not uncomplainingly, to its hardships. If it could be rigidly enforced, which it would be impossible to do except at a greatly disproportionate expense, it would be extremely harassing and obnoxious to non-producing consumers in tobacco-growing sections, and the impunity with which it can be evaded is all that renders it at all tolerable. It therefore appears that while the object of the legislation seems to be to coerce the consumer to the use of the manufactured article upon which Government may assess and collect its revenues, its great if not leading tendency is to encourage what wise governments should guard well against—evasions, subterfuges, and covert infractions of law on the part of their citizens.

I ask your attention now to hardships and inconveniences which the law inflicts upon the producer and those who occupy toward him the relation of tenants and employés. A planter may have raised a tobacco crop the past year, and, though having it yet in his barn and under contract with tenants and employés to furnish them supplies for the current year, he cannot lawfully furnish them the leaf-tobacco which he has and which they may and do generally prefer, but must buy for them the manufactured article at a cost of from 400 to 1,000 per cent. more. The leaf-tobacco which is bulked in the barns around which they work must be sold and transported to a licensed buyer, who in turn sells and transports it to a manufacturer, where, having gone through the manufacturing process and been subjected to Government taxation, it is ready to be sold and transported back to where it was raised. The pound of tobacco which would in the barn have cost the consumer ten cents now costs him from five to ten times that amount. This loss is inflicted upon the poor and needy, the laboring-man, the lately manumitted slave, and such as are least able to bear it. They may manage to escape it by some artful subterfuge, but the policy of a law that holds out such temptations to its evasion must be condemned.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I beg the attention of the House to some extracts bearing upon this subject from a memorial presented to this Congress in behalf of the tobacco manufacturers of Cincinnati and Covington. They show very clearly the enormous rate of taxation imposed by existing laws upon this great agricultural interest, and the absolute necessity of some remission of it:

The existing tax upon the annual product of at least 25,000,000 pounds of tobacco ranges from 600 to 800 per cent. on the original cost of the material, while the entire remainder will average at least 200 per cent. Many million pounds of leaf-tobacco will be sold this year by the grower at the place of production for not more than 3 cents per pound. A package weighing 1,000 pounds, which brings the farmer $30, requires, upon its manufacture, the payment of $240, which amount, with accumulating interest and sufficient profit to cover the risk of selling on credit to the dealer, follows the tobacco to the consumer.

The average yield of tobacco is about 1,000 pounds to the acre; there is therefore, under this system of taxation, an annual tax levied of $240 upon the production of each acre of tobacco-land. Is it strange that growers of tobacco are restive against this continued discrimination against their industry and urgent for permission to reach the consumer with unmanufactured tobacco free of tax?

A vast quantity of cheap smoking-tobacco, amounting annually to several million pounds, is made by cutting tobacco-stems, which are now worth only ¼ cent per pound, and the expense of manufacturing them is covered by another ¼ cent. One thousand pounds of this, therefore, costs, ready for use, only $10, the direct tax of which is $240, with an additional cost of $20 to meet the requirement of law in packing it in small papers, labeling, stamping, &c., making the actual tax $260 upon the value of $10.

This extreme taxation, with the reduced wages of labor, is leading to the general cultivation of tobacco in small quantities for domestic use; and, as no change whatever is made in any of its properties by the process of manufacture, this domestic culture will soon reach immense proportions, unless the tax is speedily reduced, to the injury alike of the grower, the trade, the manufacturer, and the revenue.

All the European governments that derive a large revenue from tobacco find it absolutely necessary to exercise the utmost surveillance and to place extreme restraints over its culture and traffic. Such oversight and restriction being, as we believe, impracticable here, it necessarily follows that a permanently high tax cannot be maintained.

We ask you to consider the manifest injustice of this tax, which is borne principally by laborers and persons of moderate means, to whom tobacco is as much of a necessity as tea, coffee, or any other article of comfort or luxury not absolutely essential to the direct support of life. While such a tax might have been justifiable under the exigencies of the great war, equity and fair dealing would have led to its early reduction, along with multitudes of other interests then subjected to taxation, but which were very soon entirely relieved of it. Instead of such a policy, the opposite, as we have shown to you, has been pursued, by increasing the tax within the last three years 50 per cent. on those grades of tobacco that were already the most heavily taxed.

A glass of beer or ale sold for five or ten cents pays less than ½ of a cent tax. A cigar which sells for five or ten cents pays .6 of a cent tax. Native wines, articles of pure luxury, pay no tax at all, but a four-ounce paper of smoking-tobacco, that is sold for 10 cents to the laborer who works for $1 a day, pays an actual tax of 6¼ cents.

Well may it be inquired why this excessive and disproportionate tax, the burden of which falls especially upon the working classes, who are the consumers on one hand, and the growers on the other. Tobacco being native to this country and from the earliest colonial times constituting one of its most important and valuable productions, and in which several of the largest, most populous, influential States of the Union are now greatly interested, is it not entitled to be more justly and reasonably regarded by your legislation?

The effect upon the small producer is most injurious and oppressive. He may not have enough for a hogshead; he cannot sell to or purchase from his unlicensed neighbor. He cannot sell to the consumer. His only market is the licensed dealer, who having paid the twenty-five-dollar tax, can buy by retail, but can only sell to other licensed dealers. It often happens in the country that for miles around there is not more than one of these dealers. If there chance to be more, combinations are easily formed among them which result in the suppression of all competition, and place the small producer completely at the mercy of a monopoly.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is difficult to realize how hardly

* By reference to volume 3, Ninth Census, page 83, it will be seen that the tobacco production of the United States in 1870 aggregated 262,735,341 pounds, of which Kentucky alone raised 105,303,869 pounds, Virginia 37,086,364 pounds, while Tennessee, as next on the list, raised 21,465,452. The largest tobacco-producing county in Tennessee, as will be seen by reference to the same volume, pages 244, 248, is Montgomery, whose yield was 4,856,378. Next to Montgomery was Weakley, yielding 2,599,590 pounds. Next to Weakley were Smith and Robertson, each yielding a little over 2,000,000 pounds. And next Henry, with a yield of 1,715,000 pounds.

the law bears upon one who is dependent upon his little crop for the few common necessaries of life; luxuries indeed to him, but articles of necessity to his more fortunate neighbor. He cannot exchange his tobacco for them unless the merchant, as is seldom the case, is a licensed dealer. Such dealer he must find, and must then submit to this dealer's terms, whatever they may be. It is difficult for him to realize why it is that his Government places no restriction upon the sale of corn, or wheat, or cotton, or any of the products of the soil which his neighbor may raise, but places his skill and his labor at such a disadvantage by harsh and onerous restraints upon it; in effect, making the product of that skill and labor contraband and interdicting it as a subject for ordinary commerce and exchange, as if, indeed, the business of producing tobacco were an unlawful and criminal one, deserving to be discouraged, if not suppressed, by Government.

Prejudice against the law has been greatly intensified in some sections of the country by the arbitrary, insolent, and oppressive manner in which its enforcement has been attempted. I can but give the House an idea of some of the complaints on this subject by submitting an extract from a letter received from a very intelligent and public-spirited citizen of my district:

Our people are very much annoyed by a deputy United States marshal, who employs detectives to go through the country to buy a hand of leaf-tobacco. I and others who furnished our hands with supplies, including tobacco, have had much trouble and expense in going to Memphis. This marshal employs and pays a bonus to all informants.

Cannot a law be passed to allow a farmer to sell tobacco of his own production to his neighbors without license, and also allow him to sell it in small quantities to any one for consumption? By all means let it be settled as to whether he can supply his tenants and employés with it without first taking out the $500 license.

This extract will serve to show, Mr. Speaker, how extremely vexatious and annoying the law has become in certain portions of the country through the superserviceable zeal of irresponsible and unprincipled Government agents; and I only express the opinion of thousands in the section of country in which I live, including all classes from the wealthy planter to the poor laborer, when I say that there is to-day upon the statute-book of this Govrnment no law which excites so much dissatisfaction, prejudice, and discontent as the law under consideration. It violates grossly their traditional and cherished ideas of freedom in the disposition of the fruits of their labor. It affects injuriously their material welfare by circumscribing their markets and remitting them to the proverbial mercy of soulless monopolies. It outrages their sense of equal right and justice by subordinating their weal to the prosperity of a favored manufacturing class to whose insatiable greed they are ruthlessly sacrificed. It should not, therefore, be a matter of surprise that there is an emphatic popular protest against it—a universal demand for its repeal or modification in all the tobacco-producing sections of the country.

While we would be gratified to see all restrictions removed from commerce in leaf-tobacco, it is not expected that this Congress is prepared to go to that extent. I do, however, earnestly hope the honorable Committee of Ways and Means in the exercise of its great and responsible trust may find it neither incompatible with the public interest nor its sense of duty to relieve the law of at least its most obnoxious features. Many bills are pending before them looking to that end. One of them (H. R. No. 2063) I had the honor to introduce, and my distinguished colleague, Mr. ATKINS, whose constituents are also deeply interested in this subject, has embodied his views of the necessary modification of the law in another bill, and the attention of the committee is now invited to them in connection with others upon the same subject. I trust that in any event their deliberations may lead them to conclusions at least as favorable as those reached by the Ways and Means Committee of the last House, whose chairman (Mr. DAWES) reported May 25, 1874, a bill (H. R. No. 3491) the last section of which provided that from and after its passage any farmer or planter might "sell at the place of production tobacco of his own growth and raising, at retail, directly to consumers to an amount not exceeding $100 annually."

Unfortunately it failed to become a law; and I simply refer to it now, in conclusion, for the purpose of respectfully commending to the present committee the liberal spirit which their predecessors charged with the same delicate trust brought to the consideration of this important subject.

THE DANGERS OF GOVERNMENT SUBSIDIES.

Mr. PIPER. I avail myself of the present opportunity to address you on a subject of great importance not only to the people of the Pacific States, but to the people of the whole United States. I mean the subject of subsidies, either of lands or money, granted by Government to railroad corporations.

In making these remarks I shall be obliged to oppose the arguments heretofore advanced in this body; but trusting to the inherent strength of my positions, I have no fear that I shall fail in proving that the projects of subsidies, either of money or lands, in aid of internal improvements, now pressed upon the attention of the House with so much perseverance, are, from the greatest to the least, unwise and improvident, will not produce a tithe of the benefits promised by their advocates, and will as heretofore promote the interests of the corporators, and not those of the people.

I shall endeavor not to comment unjustly on any individual or corporation, but at the same time I shall censure as severely as they deserve the various plausible schemes of internal improvement which have had for their object the advancement of the interests of the projectors, and not the interests of the community at large.

Naturally the first question that arises in the discussion of this subject is the power of Congress to grant pecuniary aid to private individuals or corporations in building railroads and canals. And here let me remark that, in all the arguments now advanced by the advocates of this power, the instances of its discussion are taken only from the periods between 1806 and 1827 and from 1862 to the present time, leaving an interval of thirty-five years during which the subject was discussed in Congress with great ability by the most prominent statesmen; and, as far as any point of constitutional law could be considered as settled, the general opinion of the people in 1860 was adverse to the appropriation of money by Congress in aid of internal improvements.

The principle upon which the early measures making grants of lands alone was based is entirely different from that lying at the foundation of the innumerable subsidy bills passed within the last fifteen years, commencing with the great act of 1862, which granted 35,000,000 acres of land and $65,000,000 in bonds to the Pacific railroads. There is, I repeat, a great and very perceptible difference between the early measures and the audacious projects approved by Congress in 1862 and since as well as the colossal plans that are now being advocated.

At the present time it would hardly be profitable to criticise the action of the Government previous to 1862; but while admitting that Congress did not violently transgress any constitutional provision in granting lands in aid of roads and canals, I hold that these precedents by no means justify the extravagant theory that the power to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare authorizes the Government to appropriate money in lavish profusion in aid of various enterprises which by some possibility may benefit the people, but at an expenditure double the amount necessary and out of all proportion in comparison with the advantages conferred. As for myself, I adhere to the old-fashioned, but as I believe correct, doctrine that Congress is limited in its powers but supreme within its sphere of action, and that it possesses no powers except those expressly granted by the Constitution or to be derived by necessary implication from that instrument.

In these days of liberal and free construction, our hopes of prosperity can only be realized by returning to the old methods of thought and to that reverence for the Constitution which it is now the common practice to ridicule and deride.

My adversaries in opposition to the preceding views may cite the recent opinion of the Supreme Court in United States vs. The Union Pacific Railroad Company, but that opinion confesses that the traditional policy of the country was opposed to works of internal improvement built by or under the authority of the General Government, and justifies the incorporation and subsidizing of the Pacific railroads by a variety of insufficient considerations, but really on the ground that, the public mind being impressed with the necessity, demanded the construction of these thoroughfares without a regard to the particular means to be employed, and the court virtually holds that under the circumstances a departure from the strict provisions of the Constitution was excusable. But the court, in so many words, also holds that the United States Government has no constitutional power to incorporate companies to advance private interests and to agree to aid them on account of supposed incidental advantages which would accrue to the public from the completion of the enterprises.

In the incorporation of the Pacific railroads Congress is supposed to have acted, not for the benefit of private persons nor in their interests, but for an object deemed essential to the security of the country as well as its prosperity. On this point, however, Congress and the people were wickedly misled; and in my remarks I shall, as I think, clearly prove that all subsidized railroads are virtually incorporated for the benefit of private persons and to advance private interests, and that therefore, under the recent decision of the Supreme Court, Congress has no constitutional power to aid such projects on account of the supposed incidental advantages which may or may not accrue to the public. In proof of this position I have only to give a succinct history of the operations of the Pacific railroads, drawing my materials chiefly from printed public documents, but supplementing this with a truthful account of the burdens under which the people of the Pacific coast are groaning by reason of the oppressions of these mammoth corporations.

The operations of these various railroad companies are based upon the act of Congress of July 1, 1862, (Statutes at Large, volume 12, page 489,) and its various supplements. This act incorporated the Union Pacific Railroad Company, with enormous grants of land and money, and admitted to similar privileges the Central Pacific of California, the Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western of Kansas, the Pacific Railroad of Missouri, and the Hannibal and Saint Joseph of Missouri. The right of way through the public lands, two hundred feet in width on each side of the track, was granted, together with the grounds for depots and shops, and the right to take from the adjacent public lands timber, stone, and other materials for the construction of the road. There were also granted five alternate sections of land per mile on each side of said railroads within the limits of ten miles; all mineral lands, with the exception of the timber thereon, being excepted.

The Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to issue to said companies United States bonds at the rate of $16,000 per mile, it being provided that the issue of said bonds and their delivery to the companies should constitute a first mortgage on the roads and their equipments. It was also provided that all compensation for services rendered for the Government should be applied to the payment of said bonds and interest, and that at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings should be annually set aside as a sinking fund.

All lands within fifteen miles of any designated route were ordered to be withdrawn from pre-emption, private entry, and sale after a map of the line had been filed in the Interior Department.

Upon the mountainous portions of the road a bond subsidy was granted of $32,000 a mile and $42,000 a mile, according to the difficulties of construction, and 25 per cent. and on the mountain section 15 per cent. of the bonds were ordered to be reserved out of each installment to secure the construction of the roads.

To minds of ordinary intelligence these munificent grants would seem sufficiently liberal, but the terms were not satisfactory to the greedy speculators, and another act of Congress, that of July 2, 1864, was passed by which other and more immense privileges were granted to these companies. The number of sections of land granted was increased from five to ten per mile on each side, the selection was allowed to be made within twenty miles of the line, and all the lands within twenty-five miles were directed to be withdrawn from pre-emption and sale. The term "mineral lands" was construed so as to exempt from reservation all coal and iron lands, and thus the companies were enabled to secure a monopoly of these valuable products, more valuable than those of the precious metals. The full amount of the subsidy bonds, without any reserved percentage, was ordered to be paid, and only one-half of the compensation for services was required to be applied to the payment of the interest. The companies were also authorized to issue first-mortgage bonds equal in amount to the subsidy bonds, which were made subordinate to the company bonds; and by a subsequent act company bonds were allowed to be issued one hundred miles in advance of the completed road.

Such were the general provisions of the Pacific Railroad acts in 1864; and the various companies mentioned in the early act of 1862 having by 1867 gradually become absorbed and merged in the two great corporations, the Union and the Central Pacific Railroads, let us now briefly examine their financial operations.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

And, first, as to the "Union Pacific." From a series of developments within the last few years, it would seem to be conclusively proved that the stockholders and directors of this company formed a combination for the purpose of defrauding the Government and the people. When the road was declared by the Government to be completed—that is, on October 1, 1874—it had cost $115,214,588, or $111,000 a mile on a length of ten hundred and thirty-eight miles.

According to the reports of the company, the whole line of the road is a very favorable one, the soil on the greater part of it forming an admirable road-bed. More than one-half of the route is practically level, while the Rocky Mountains do not present obstacles so formidable as those offered by the Alleghany ranges to the railroads crossing them, and an elevated table-land extends for four hundred miles, from the eastern to the western crest.

The highest cost of construction of these Atlantic roads, including land damages, is placed much below $50,000 a mile; but taking this sum as a fair estimate, the Union Pacific road should have been built for $52,000,000.

The company has as yet never published an exhibit in detail of its expenditures and liabilities, but from accessible information the account may be stated as follows:

First-mortage bonds	$27,237,000
Land-grant bonds	10,400,000
Omaha-bridge bonds	2,500,000
Sinking-fund bonds	16,000,000
Capital stock, (paid up)	36,762,300
Total bonds and stock	92,899,300
United States subsidy bonds	27,236,512
Total	120,135,812
Estimated cost of road	52,000,000
Difference	68,135,812

What, then, has become of this difference of over $68,000,000 between the money passing through the hands of the directors of the Union Pacific and the estimated reasonable cost of constructing the road? The answer is found in the history of the Credit Mobilier of America, to be read of not only in the Pennsylvania law reports but also in the congressional records. The infamous character of its transactions is sufficiently well known to the public without any attempt on my part to enter into details; it is enough to say that through the interposition of this shadowy corporation the directors and stockholders of the Union Pacific distributed among themselves an immense sum of money for which no actual service was rendered.

Starting in 1864 with a cash capital of $25,000, the Credit Mobilier built forty miles of the Union Pacific in 1865 and 1866, and then from the subsidy bonds received reported in 1867 a paid-up capital stock of $3,750,000. On this capital during seven months' operations it declared dividends in cash and bonds amounting to $7,237,500, or nearly 200 per cent. on their fictitious capital.

Again, the report of the special committee of the Forty-second Congress on the Pacific Railroads, presented March 1, 1873, also throws great light upon the collusive proceedings of the directors of the Union Pacific, who were the managers of the Credit Mobilier. From that investigation it appears that the Credit Mobilier represented the cost of constructing eleven hundred miles of road to be $78,945,012, or an average of $71,768 per mile. The railroad company, however, paid $94,646,288 in stock and bonds under the contracts with Hoxie, Ames, and Davis, guaranteed by the Credit Mobilier; and these contractors actually expended only $50,720,959, leaving a profit in stock and bonds of $43,925,329, which, reduced to cash, produced at least $23,000,000.

This brief account is sufficient to show that the schemes of the audacious projectors of the Union Pacific were conceived in rascality and carried out in fraud. And while thus coining money by the mere exercise of their wits in consequence of the improvident bounty of the Government, the directors of the Union Pacific conceived the happy idea of refusing to pay the interest on the Government subsidy bonds until the principal became due at the end of thirty years. By this miraculous conception the Government will actually be obliged to pay on these bonds, principal and compound interest, $164,964,887, while the company will only pay, principal and simple interest, $78,400,000, and thus the Government will suffer an actual loss of $86,564,887. But this outrage on decency I shall leave for the present, intending to comment upon it more at length toward the close of my remarks. The directors also refused to set aside 5 per cent. of the net earnings as a sinking fund and are contesting the point in court, but at the same time they profess a disposition to carry out any plan that will do justice to the company and to the Government; they being the judges of the justness of the plan.

By the report of the company for 1875 it appears that the profits are being applied to the redemption of the land-grant bonds of which $10,400,000 were issued; of these $2,768,000 have already been actually canceled, and $3,072,502 are protected by land-notes, leaving $4,619,498 to be provided for by future sales. It is therefore evident that the directors are rapidly paying off the bonds supposed to be owned by themselves at the expense of the General Government.

Does any man believe that the members of the Thirty-seventh Congress would have voted for the Union Pacific act of July 1, 1862, had they for a moment supposed that such monstrous evasions would have been attempted? Common sense and common honesty are the only requisites for the construction of the statute, and yet these cunning monopolists with unblushing effrontery excuse their dishonest manœuvers under the plea that they have been nearly ruined in endeavoring to benefit the country, when in reality not a cent of tangible wealth was invested in the enterprise. The comparatively small amount of money raised was employed in floating the concern, and the remaining funds were procured at the expense of a deluded people.

So much for the Union Pacific, remarking that the provisions of the acts of 1862 and 1864 in reference to subsidies and land grants are substantially applicable to all the roads constructed by Government aid in the Territories and in the Pacific States, and also remarking that by the acts incorporating the Northern Pacific, the Central Pacific, (Oregon branch,) the California and Oregon, the Atlantic and Pacific, the Southern Pacific, and the Texas Pacific, the grants of land were extended to twenty, thirty, and forty alternate sections per mile of public lands in the States, and forty, fifty, and sixty sections per mile in the Territories.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

I shall now turn my attention to the Central Pacific Railroad, and under this head I include also the Southern Pacific, the California and Oregon, the Western Pacific, and several other smaller roads, all under the control of the Central Pacific, that giant corporation which rules the Pacific coast with a rod of iron.

The Central Pacific Railroad of California was incorporated June 27, 1861, under the general railroad law of California, to construct a road to the eastern boundary of the State. The act of Congress of July 1, 1862, (Public Laws, volume 12, page 490,) incorporating the Union Pacific, authorized the Central Pacific of California to construct a railroad and telegraph line from the Pacific coast, at or near San Francisco or the navigable waters of the Sacramento River, to the eastern boundary of California, upon the same terms and conditions in all respects as the Union Pacific.

The act of Congress of July 2, 1864, already mentioned in my remarks on the Union Pacific, granted to the Central Pacific other valuable franchises. In addition to an enlarged grant of lands and the release of certain conditions, Congress authorized the Central Pacific to continue the construction of the road through the Territories and States intervening to the Missouri River. And here let me remark in passing that these two words "States intervening," quietly inserted in the act of 1864, contain a most dangerous innovation, and to my mind grossly violate the constitutional privileges of the States. That by the insertion of two words, or seventeen letters, in an act of Congress, the whole current of decisions during seventy-seven years should be turned aside, is only another instance of the insidious attacks of these monopolists on all law and all constitutional construction.

The Central Pacific Railroad of California in 1870 became consolidated with the Western Pacific, the San Joaquin Valley, and the San Francisco, Oakland and Alameda Railroad Companies under the name of the Central Pacific Railroad.

With a desire to own every pass and natural avenue to the Pacific, the directors, by well-known means, also secured control of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation formed October 11, 1870, by the consolidation of the San Francisco and San José, the Southern Pacific of California, the Santa Clara and Pajaró Valley, and the California Railroad Companies. The Southern Pacific Railroad of California should not be confounded with the Southern Pacific Railroad of Texas, a corporation of which a great deal has been said.

In my remarks in connection with the just-mentioned railroads I shall expose the operations of a ring of California speculators, who since 1861 have been engaged in plundering the people of the United States and in oppressing the citizens of the Pacific coast.

The schemes of these men to secure immense profits in the construction of roads to the Pacific were similar to those of the Credit Mobilier of America; but as no real investigation of their conduct has ever been made either in the courts or in Congress, the precise particulars of their projects can only be conjectured. This fact, however, is certain, that five of the confederates having resolved to cheat one of their innocent and honest stockholders, he was obliged, June 21, 1870, to commence a suit to protect his rights; and the disclosures in his complaint at once aroused the attention of the people of California to the serious dangers threatened by the plots of the autocrats who were resolved to rule or ruin the State. Although the suit was never brought to a hearing, yet the facts alleged were so strongly supported by affidavits of respectable persons and were so convincingly presented, that the defendants at once admitted the truth of the charges by compromising the case.

Under these circumstances the account given by Samuel Brannan, the plaintiff in this suit, may be considered as substantially true. He asserts that C. P. Huntington, Leland Stanford, Mark Hopkins, Charles Crocker, E. B. Crocker, and others, being a majority of the directors of the Central Pacific, formed themselves into a company styled the Contract and Finance Company, for the purpose of taking contracts for the construction of the road at rates largely in excess of the sum at which the work could have been let out to responsible parties. The said directors then entered into a contract with themselves, as members of this fictitious corporation, for the construction of the Central Pacific, and transferred to the Contract and Finance Company the entire subsidies of land, money, and bonds granted by the United States, the States of California and Nevada, and various municipal corporations of California in aid of the enterprise. They also granted to Wells, Fargo & Co. the exclusive right of running express trains for the transportation of freight, packages, and bullion over the Central Pacific, and received as pay for the concession stock in that company. They also bought up the stock of competing railroads, and, receiving the subsidy bonds from the United States, appropriated to themselves the profits of said roads. By means of fraudulent devices, they so managed their operations, principally through the Contract and Finance Company, as to earn immense profits, recklessly increasing the cost of building the Central Pacific to double or treble the amount necessary.

In order to obtain these immense grants of land and money, and to procure the re-organization of the competing railroads purchased by them, and to secure their re-election as officers thereof, they expended vast sums of money in lobbying, and in carrying out their schemes generally they rode rough-shod over the people of the Pacific coast, using every conceivable mode of oppression. These grave charges are substantially confirmed by the reluctant testimony of Richard Franchot and C. P. Huntington, given in the early part of 1873 before the special committee of this House appointed to investigate the operations of the Central Pacific.

As all the records and books of the company were in Sacramento, and as most of the persons concerned in the construction of the road lived in California, the committee were unable to make a complete investigation before the Forty-second Congress expired; but they examined the two witnesses just mentioned, who seemed to have lost their memories and were bright and shining specimens of the "don't recollect" class.

Richard Franchot, the lobbyist, testified that he was employed in watching over the interests of the Central Pacific at Washington and other places, subject to the call of the president of the road; but he would not specify any one act of the services he performed at a salary of $20,000 per annum.

Huntington, the vice-president of the road, in his examination, with crafty obtuseness forgot the particulars of his numerous transactions, limited all his answers by the vague phrase "I am under the impression," professed ignorance on every point on which he was questioned, and had no distinct recollection of any one thing. Persistently pursued in all his windings through a maze of evasions, when at last brought to bay he admitted that persons active in the management of the Central Pacific had received considerable values as profits on contracts for its construction; he also admitted that the practical control of the Central Pacific and of the Contract and Finance Company was in the same parties at the time of the signing of the construction contracts and during their execution.

The same committee reported that the capital of the Central Pacific did not represent cash, but profits on construction, and that the property of the road had passed largely into the hands of its own officers, who made contracts in the company name with themselves.

During the present session of Congress similar damaging charges have again been made against Mr. Huntington and his associates, and instead of demanding a thorough investigation of his conduct, throwing open the books of his company for examination, he maintains an impenetrable silence, and will not answer the simplest question, however remote, lest by any possibility it may give a clew to his mysterious course. In his recent argument and examination before the House Committee on Pacific Railroads he could not give the name of any one of the officers or directors of the Contract and Finance Company, or its present successor, the Western Development Company, but relied upon the memory of Judge Brown, who was equally oblivious. And here let me remark that the late contest before the Committee on Railroads to control the southern route to the Pacific has disclosed the secret maneuverings of Huntington and the plans by which he keeps out of the market all the Government lands and compels the settler to buy from his companies at exorbitant rates.

COST OF THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

I have already given a statement of the condition of the Union Pacific, and I shall now present a similar statement in regard to the Central Pacific, taken from their annual report for the year 1874, the latest source of information:

First-mortgage bonds	$25,883,000
Convertible mortgage	1,483,000
Land-grant bonds	9,049,000
Western Pacific bonds	2,735,000
California and Oregon bonds	6,000,000
Central Pacific, (C. and O. division)	1,291,000
San Joaquin Valley bonds	6,080,000
San Francisco and Oakland	500,000
State-aid bonds	1,500,000
Capital stock, (paid in)	54,275,500
Total bonds and stock	108,796,500
United States subsidy bonds	27,855,680
Grand total	136,652,180

The actual cost of the road and equipments is placed at $140,803,789.

The company claims that under the grant of 12,800 acres per mile for 1,033 miles of road it is entitled to at least 11,722,400 acres, worth at the minimum price $29,543,000, and says that these are its most valuable assets. It owns in addition the undivided half of 60 acres in Mission Bay, San Francisco, 500 acres water-front at Oakland, and 140 acres and the water-front at Sacramento, the estimated value of all which, exclusive of improvements, is $7,750,000. These valuable assets are therefore worth $37,293,000.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

I shall now turn my attention to the Southern Pacific Railroad. This road is the favorite bantling of Huntington, Stanford, and their associates, and although the former gentleman has nominally withdrawn from the direction and taken the comparatively humble position of purchasing agent in New York, he is the ruling spirit of the combination, and his operations for the last ten years in this connection present striking proofs of the multifarious projects born in his fertile brain.

The Southern Pacific Railroad of California was incorporated November 29, 1865, under the general railroad act of that State. The articles of association provided for the construction of a continuous line from San Francisco through the counties of Santa Clara, Monterey, San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara, Tulare, Los Angeles, and San Diego, to the town of San Diego; thence eastward to the east line of California, there to connect with a contemplated line from the Mississippi River. Not a single mile of this road had been constructed when on July 27, 1866, an act of Congress incorporating the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad authorized the Southern Pacific of California to connect therewith, and in aid of its construction made large grants of public lands as well as of the right of way.

On January 3, 1867, this Southern Pacific of California filed in the General Land Office a map of the route which had been selected. But in fact this line was not based upon actual surveys; for the interval of time was too short for the work, and it is believed that Huntington or some one by his direction had drawn a red-pencil line on a map of the State of California and had sent the same to the General Land Office. The line so selected and so filed did not correspond with the chartered line, as it did not touch the counties of San Luis Obispo, Los Angeles, and San Diego, and did not approach the town of San Diego nearer than one hundred and fifty miles. The filing of this spurious survey, however, accomplished the intended object, for it caused the withdrawal and reservation of all the odd-numbered sections of public lands in California on a belt sixty miles wide from San Francisco to the Colorado River, containing an area of 6,000,000 acres. It also enhanced the price of the even-numbered sections to $2.50 an acre. At this time not a single mile of road had been built, and only $1,829 had been expended for surveys. The first annual report was filed by Huntington, who transmitted it to Washington from the New York office of the Central Pacific. On being informed of these irregularities on June 14, 1868, Secretary Browning ordered the reserved lands to be restored to the public domain; but Huntington interposed, and in 1869 the order of restoration was suspended to await the action of Congress.

The Legislature of California on April 4, 1870, permitted the Southern Pacific to file new articles of association and validated the change of route and location. Congress also came to the rescue, and by a joint resolution of June 28, 1870, (16 Statutes at Large, 382,) permitted the Southern Pacific to construct its road on the route indicated by the map filed January 3, 1867, and validated the previous irregular proceedings. About this time the Central Pacific, having previously been working in the dark, now came forward openly and bought out the line then actually constructed between San Francisco and San José, and entered into an agreement for the extension of the line to Gilroy. The company then set up a claim to a belt of land lying along the line of this route, and a bitter legal war with the actual settlers ensued.

The land cormorants, however, were not yet satisfied, and on October 11, 1870, the San Francisco and San José, the Southern Pacific of California, the Santa Clara and Pajaró Valley, and the California Railroad were consolidated under the name of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company.

A contract was made with the Contract and Finance Company, and subsequently with the Western Development Company, to construct and equip the whole line of road, for which they were to receive mortgage bonds at the rate of $40,000 a mile and the balance in capital stock. These immense donations, however, did not come up to the expectations of Huntington, and the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, (Statutes at Large, volume 16, page 579,) was passed, authorizing the Southern Pacific to construct a line from Tehachapa Pass, by way of Los Angeles, to the Texas Pacific Railroad at or near the Colorado River. On April 3, 1871, or within thirty days, a map of the additional line was filed, and the lands on each side of the road withdrawn from private entry. The Southern Pacific has received 11,926,600 acres from the United States, and it is asking for more.

Time fails me to speak of the Northern Pacific, with its domain of 47,000,000 acres; of the Atlantic and Pacific, with 40,000,000 acres, and of the Texas Pacific, with 17,000,000 acres. I shall therefore conclude my remarks with a general exposition of my views of the impolicy of alienating such immense portions of the public domain in favor of these grasping corporations.

IMPOLICY OF ALIENATING IMMENSE PORTIONS OF THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

In the world's history no such donations of national property were ever made to individuals. No Roman Cæsar ever lavished on a favorite who ministered to his vices and pleasures such imperial gifts as have been lavished upon the few individuals composing these corporations, and that, too, by the representatives of the people of a Republic in which each and every citizen is supposed to be equal and to be equally entitled to the benefits flowing from Government. I suppose it can only be accounted for on the principle of placing stock "where it would do the most good," as was declared by a former member of this House when speaking of the disposition of the Credit-Mobilier stock. It is clearly demonstrable that the laws, both original and supplementary, creating these corporations were enacted simply in the interests of the companies without interposing any safeguards to protect the rights of the people or Government. Surely no man could have voted for these laws unless he was grossly deceived as to their effect, or had other than the public interests in view.

The system of Government subsidies in aid of persons or of corporations is fundamentally vicious, and is as unjust as was the granting of monopolies and franchises by the despotic governments of the Old World before the people had any voice in the management of public affairs, and when they were considered mere chattels.

I am more especially conversant with the workings and the baleful influences of this system through my knowledge of the workings of the Central Pacific Railroad and its adjuncts heretofore spoken of. This great corporation, as I have previously stated, is owned in the main by four men, to wit, Leland Stanford, C. P. Huntington, Mark Hopkins, and Charles Crocker, and these four men also own the controlling interest in the Southern Pacific. I have no reasonable doubt that they own three-fourths of the last-mentioned road. Could any one ever have supposed that in a Republic four citizens could have ever been the recipients of such bountiful gifts from the Government?

It may not be considered exactly chivalric to comment on individuals upon the floor of this House when they have not an opportunity to reply here; but as Huntington, "the lachrymose," before a committee of this Congress complained of the persecutions his companies were undergoing and of the ingratitude of the public, after he and his friends had risked their fortunes in this doubtful enterprise, wasting the best part of their lives in this patriotic work and only receiving a dividend of 13 per cent. upon the capital invested, as a return for their great labors and hazardous risks, I believe I shall be justified in explaining the means they used, and what and how much they risked. I doubt whether these men, all told, were in the aggregate worth more than $150,000 when they embarked in this railroad enterprise; and now after twelve or thirteen years their aggregate wealth amounts to as many millions as they then possessed thousands. So these "poor" men have been terribly maltreated by the Government!

Now, as to the means they have used to accumulate this colossal sum. About the time they commenced this enterprise they procured the passage of a bill through the Legislature of California submitting to a vote of the people of San Francisco the question whether the city should issue $600,000 of bonds for their benefit. When the election took place there was some opposition on the part of the voters, and I was an eye-witness of a humiliating sight. The brother of this Leland Stanford was openly going about the polling-places scattering gold and silver to influence and buy votes for this municipal subsidy. This is the way in which they have succeeded in drawing these vast sums from the people.

The Southern Pacific Company in 1870 procured the passage through the California Legislature of an act authorizing the voters of San Francisco to decide whether the city should grant a subsidy of $1,000,000 to the company. When the election came off, some of us, thinking that the railroads had got about enough from the public, opposed and beat them at the poll; but what was our surprise when they demanded a recount by the canvassing board! Presto, change, they had carried a majority of the votes for the subsidy. But upon investigation it was so apparent that the returns had been opened and changed, that the railroad men—the penitentiary staring them in the face—abandoned their efforts to secure this million-dollar subsidy from the people of San Francisco. These two instances are evidence of their mode of operating.

These railroad speculators always become alarmed at the prospect of the election to office of any one whom they cannot control, from a supervisor to a governor or President. If they had earned their vast fortunes by legitimate means, they would certainly not be afraid of the election of honest men.

These people have controlled the Legislatures of the States through which their roads are located, and also the assessors and supervisors of the counties. And by these means they are relieved from the burden of their just proportion of the public dues. They pay no taxes on their enormous land grants, as patents are not taken out until they have made contracts for the sale of the lands. By these dishonest means they evade their liability to pay their just proportion of the public burdens. Their mode of influencing a public officer who has not been elected as their tool is to undermine his probity by gradual advances. If they think an officer can by any means be tempted to violate his duty, immediately after he is elected he is approached and sounded by their emissaries—for they keep up a corps of agents as well organized as that of Fouché under the first French empire—and if he is at all pliable he will be presented with a complimentary free pass over all their roads from San Francisco as far east as Omaha. If he happens to be a member of the legislative department of Government, he is accommodated with a special car.

This is only the beginning of the downward course, and it is not difficult to foretell what will follow; for a public officer is already half corrupt when he condescends to accept gratuities.

The president of the Central Pacific, Leland Stanford, as he has always done, remains in California with his corps of lobbyists to corrupt and manage the State Legislature. But this year, it is to be hoped, he will be foiled; for so far he has been defeated in the lower house, and he will probably meet with a similar disaster in the upper unless he succeeds in deluding three or four senators into the belief that he will make them governors or United States Senators in case they will maintain their allegiance to him.

The other partner in iniquity, the "lachrymose" Huntington, operates here in Washington with a corps of lobbyists in his train equal to that of an Indian nabob—men some of whom, I regret to say, have held high positions here. This corps is supplemented by a band of lawyers, who are acting professionally, it is true, and who would be offended at the intimation that they are lobbyists; but it is hard to determine where the lawyer ends and the lobbyist begins.

However strenuous may be the denials, the Southern Pacific is undoubtedly the Central Pacific under another name and in another guise. A mere fraction of the Southern Pacific, it is true, may be owned by outside parties, who have recently been taken into the company, but only taken into the ring to do their dirty work and swearing, since the four "original Jacobs" have already sworn to such an extent that long since no one would believe them.

These railroad speculators have also organized a complete system of black-mailing. They invariably ask to be paid for running their roads through any town that may happen to lie near the projected line, and in case their demands are refused they threaten to locate the route some distance off, and start an opposition town on their own land and go into the "lot and hotel business." This they have done in numberless instances. In one case in Los Angeles County a gentleman who had a tract of land, through which the Southern Pacific was running their road, generously offered them the right of way and twenty acres for depot purposes. But this liberal offer was not satisfactory, and they demanded four square miles of his best land. Upon his refusal to comply with this very modest request, they set their satellites to work in the Departments here at Washington, and have succeeded in getting an order from the Secretary of the Interior instituting proceedings to vacate a patent regularly issued by Government officers over eight years ago. And they have also publicly boasted that they will get possession of half the rancho after they have succeeded in setting aside the title and patent. How indecent is it for such people to talk of fraud and corruption when the life-blood of their existence springs from such sources!

Under the unwise system of subsidizing corporations, the gift of land is, I think, tenfold less defensible than that of money. Land is a necessity for animal existence, and legislation which gives such vast domains to a few corporations must be destructive of the very highest interests of the people and Government.

Since 1861 there has been legislated into the hands of corporations a tract of nearly 235,000 square miles of territory—a domain larger than France or the German Empire, over five times greater than Pennsylvania, six times as large as Ohio, and three times larger than the island of Great Britain. This immense territory has been granted to five corporations, yielding to each one an average of more than the area of the Empire State.

One shudders involuntarily at the contemplation of such vast possessions being in the hands of five soulless corporations—possessions sufficient to support a population of forty millions. This land at $2.50 per acre would produce the immense sum of $275,000,000. What have we got in exchange for this spoliation of the people's patrimony? Three thousand miles of single-track railway run in the interest of these greedy speculators, without any restrictions as to charges for freights and fares. Say what you will, this is a robbery of the people's birthright, and it was criminal to have given it to these pampered favorites of the party that has controlled the Government for the last fifteen years. In addition to all this, the Government has given them $65,000,000 of bonds for thirty years without the payment of interest as it becomes semi-annually due.

I now quote the following from Attorney-General Pierrepont's brief in the case of The United States vs. The Union Pacific Railroad:

> At the end of thirty years the Government will have paid out three hundred and eighteen millions in interest alone, because it must be borne in mind that it is compounded every six months for the term of thirty years.

This is a fact proven by figures; and yet the Central Pacific, which will be indebted for half this amount, as owner of the Southern Pacific, has the audacity to ask for more land to build the road farther east to head off the Texas Pacific, thereby preventing the construction of a competing line and binding more firmly the shackles of steel upon the people of the western coast of the Republic.

As to the great evils that have grown out of this system of legislating the public lands and moneys into the hands of a few speculative corporations, I presume no one will doubt; and as a remedy to some extent, in my judgment, the House should pass bill No. 1033, which provides for the restoration to the public domain of all lands that have lapsed by reason of the non-fulfillment of the conditions of the grants, and forever put an absolute stop to any further concessions of public lands for any other than settlement and homestead purposes.

The construction of a competing line between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts is no doubt very desirable, and no one longs for it more than I do; and if this becomes an absolute necessity, in the name of common honesty do not, as in the past, give double the amount necessary in money and land to some grasping corporation to build the road to be used for private advantage and as another source of public corruption.

In my judgment it is the duty of Congress, and the nation demands it of us, to remedy these evils, and to wrest as far as possible from these public spoliators their ill-gotten gains. Their defenders, it is true, intrench themselves behind the statutes, but they may find that the law-makers are stronger than the law-interpreters. The very acts granting to the railroads these vast subsidies of land and moneys have made reservations that may be legitimately used to coerce them to observe a decent respect for the rights of the people and Government, the courts to the contrary notwithstanding. Let their directors attend to their duties to the country instead of hovering around these Halls and those of State Legislatures like birds of prey in order to retain what they have fraudulently acquired.

The directors of these roads must submit like other citizens to the laws; they must cease trying to be masters of the people, and must cease setting themselves above the Government, or ere long they will find a power greater than the courts that will resist their tyranny to the death—the power of the people, who in their anguish and might will rise and sweep them together with all their ill-gotten gains from the face of the earth.

TEXAS AND PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. WOODBURN. Mr. Speaker, since the commencement of this session many matters of grave moment have been learnedly, logically, and eloquently discussed by members of this body. If what is known as the currency question be excepted, there is a measure now slumbering in the hands of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, which, for aught I know, sleeps the sleep that knows no waking, that in my humble judgment overshadows them all in point of national importance. I allude to the Texas and Pacific Railway bill, designated by its enemies as the "Tom Scott bill," introduced by the honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

The object of the bill is to further the construction of another transcontinental railroad from Texas to the Pacific Ocean on or near the thirty-second parallel. It must necessarily be for all time to come an independent and competing line, for the reason that it is provided that Congress shall have the exclusive and perpetual right to regulate the rates of transportation of freight and passengers, and for postal and telegraphic service, and it can never be leased or controlled by any other line.

In order to consummate this great national enterprise, the aid of this Government is now invoked. No grant of the public domain, no loan of money, no indorsement of the principal of the bonds of the company is prayed for; all that is asked is the guarantee by the Government of the interest on a limited amount of 5 per cent. construction bonds, issued by the company, payable in fifty years, which is necessary in this period of financial depression to facilitate their sale in European markets.

The bonds are not to exceed $40,000 per mile in the mountains, and $30,000 per mile on the plain, limited to an average of $35,000 per mile or less, if the cash cost of the work shall be less.

The liability of the Government would be but $1,750 per mile per annum if the limit of $35,000 per mile is reached.

To secure the Government against any possibility of loss by reason of its guarantee, the bill provides that the acceptance of its provisions shall constitute a first lien upon the road, telegraph, rolling-stock, shops, fixtures, and property of every kind, including the franchises and all lands granted by the United States in aid thereof.

The Government has the right to reserve all moneys due for the transportation of troops and supplies, and for its postal and telegraphic service, and apply it to the payment of the interest.

Besides, there must be deposited in the Treasury of the United States $5,000 in bonds for each mile of road, to be sold by the Government to meet any possible deficiency in the payment of interest while the road is in process of construction.

These, in brief, are the main provisions of the bill, concerning which so many arguments have been made before committees and so many pamphlets have been written for the information of members. It has furnished the press of the country a fruitful theme for discussion. The Legislatures of many States have requested by resolution their Representatives in Congress to support it. It is a matter of intense interest to the people of that vast empire lying west of the Rocky Mountains, who are now anxiously awaiting the action of this body.

Believing that this measure will some day not far distant come up for our consideration, I deem it my duty to my constituents to state the reasons which induce me to give it an honest and earnest support.

I understand, sir, that one of the main objections urged against the passage of this measure is that the aid demanded to assist in the construction of the Texas and Pacific Railroad partakes of the nature of a subsidy, and is in violation of that spirit of economy and retrenchment which is almost hourly manifested by the dominant party in this House. I would not be numbered among its supporters were I convinced that affirmative action on my part would have the most remote tendency to encroach upon any equitable rule of economy which ought to characterize our republican form of government.

I have heard it daily and perhaps truthfully asserted by the leaders of the other side of the House that there never was a time in the history of the Republic when it was more necessary to curtail, economize, and retrench than the present. We have been told that this side of the House is for economy in the abstract, while the other is for the concrete reality. It has been said that the republican members of this House would march in platoons against every measure of economy. Extracts from the life of Franklin, containing the information that before he left this country on his mission to France he gave all his money to the Government, have been read in solemn tones for the purpose of alluring us from the paths of extravagance.

Why, sir, the cry of economy is growing louder and stronger the nearer we approach the presidential election. The very atmosphere that surrounds us is pregnant with its fragrance, and has been purified by its spirit. Even the winds that blow around the Capitol babble and gossip of economy.

I believe in economy, for I have been taught that the real economist is a true statesman, not a politician, who, for the purpose of manufacturing political capital, applies the pruning-knife of retrenchment to cut down the meager salaries of public servants in humble and subordinate positions.

Nor did obedience to the doctrine of economy ever demand a candidate for office to pledge himself to his constituents to vote against even a subsidy to a lawful enterprise, the successful result of which will increase the wealth and promote the prosperity of this whole country.

No supporter of this measure need ever fear the imputation of extravagance, for the possibility of loss to the Government is carefully guarded against by its provisions. If I am correct, then the cry of anti-subsidy is pharisaical, and protestations against extravagance are meaningless.

To prove the strength of my position, I ask no better evidence than is contained in the following extract from the admirable speech delivered a few days ago by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] He says:

> What further security is given to the Government for this mere extension of credit? I answer, the absolute remission to the Government of 33,000,000 of acres of land which is now granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Company, and which, by the enactment of this bill into a law, reverts to the United States for the benefit of actual settlers. Is the reversion to the Government of such a large majority of land nothing? Why, sir, it is worth at least $50,000,000; more than half the entire amount of bonds were the Government required to pay every dollar of it. Add the 33,000,000 acres of land which the bill returns to the Government to the 9,000,000 of acres unencumbered, donated by the State of Texas, computed at $3 per acre, a low price for that rich and prolific soil, beneath a more than Italian sky, together with the grant in the Territories of 10,000,000 acres, and we have at the outset a present and unfailing security against the loss of a dollar upon the part of the United States. The whole amount of bonds to be issued for the entire road would not exceed $90,000,000, and, at 5 per cent., the amount of annual interest, if every bond were issued, would not exceed $4,250,000. But as the bonds are only to be issued as the road is built in sections, the last bond will only be issued as the last section is contracted for. Besides, the bill provides that there shall be no accumulation of interest, because, whenever the company shall fail to pay the annual coupons of interest, the Government at once has the right to sell the property of the company and the road itself. Hence the Government would not, could not, be involved for only six months' interest before it would have the right to sell and indemnify itself. And as the bonds are only issued as the road is constructed, no large amount of bonds would at any time be upon the market.

I invoke especial attention to this point and challenge refutation. Observe, in order that the Government shall be certainly protected, the company is required to pay the interest every April and October; that is, every six months. Now, suppose that the company shall build as much as one hundred miles in six months, which is, perhaps, a large estimate, and should fail to provide for the interest, amounting to $87,500, when due, it is the privilege of the Government to foreclose the mortgage and sell enough of the property of the company at once to re-imburse itself for any payment it may have made.

Before Congress chartered the Union and Central Pacific railway companies, the cost of Army transportation alone was $7,357,781 per annum, which has now been reduced to about $500,000, the reduction being largely in excess of the amount necessary to pay the interest on the greatest amount of bonds that can be issued. As there are about forty military posts and eleven regiments of troops that will naturally draw their supplies from the line of the Texas and Pacific road, there can be no doubt, in the event of its construction, that the Government would annually save more than its maximum liability under the proposed bill. As additional testimony that the security offered to the Government is more than ample to protect it against loss by reason of its guarantee, I call your attention to the recent report of the Union and Central Pacific companies, which shows the net earnings of that line of twenty-two hundred and fifty miles in length to have been $6,279 per mile during the last year.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior for 1875 shows that for the year ending June 30, 1875, the net earnings of three hundred and twenty-six miles of the Texas and Pacific, now in operation, amounted to $1,742,000 per mile; only $8 per mile less than the interest on the proposed bonds.

The Railroad Committee of the last House of Representatives, reporting on this subject, say:

It is evident that the construction of this road (the Texas and Pacific) will enable the Government to withdraw three-fourths of the troops now stationed in the country traversed by it and render the remaining fourth far more efficient than the whole force now employed there.

Who can doubt that the Texas Pacific road, traversing a region unsurpassed in agricultural resources, with a climate unexcelled, and pregnant with the ore of every precious metal, will not derive a much larger annual revenue than the Union and Central Pacific?

I venture the assertion, Mr. Speaker, that few of the honest opponents of this measure have ever maturely reflected upon its provisions. Opposition ought to vanish when the fact becomes apparent as the noonday sun that the Government will reap a golden harvest instead of incurring a pecuniary liability. Its passage would be followed by an immense immigration into the States and Territories of the Pacific, which must augment not only the revenue from imports, but also the revenue from the increase in the sale of public lands now almost worthless because inaccessible. The mines of Arizona, Lower California, and Mexico, now unproductive, would be developed, and would doubtless produce as much gold and silver annually as California and Nevada. To aid the construction of the road at this particular time would be the wisest economy. Money, material, and labor are cheaper now by 50 per cent. than when the Union and Central Pacific roads were built. It would restore a healthy business confidence, would furnish employment to thousands of laborers and mechanics, and would do much toward restoring prosperity to the country.

Mr. Speaker, it is contended that this bill is objectionable for the reason that the grant of the aid demanded is in violation of the organic law of the land, which we have sworn to maintain.

I do not intend to discuss at length the constitutionality of the grant, nor do I consider a profound knowledge of the provisions of the Constitution at all necessary to guide my judgment upon this question. I deem it sufficient to tread the beaten pathway of precedent carved out by the wisest statesmen of this country. The parliamentary history of our country for the last forty years contains abundant evidence that even the apostles of the doctrine of a strict construction of the Constitution favored liberal appropriations for the construction of canals, the improvement of the rivers of the interior, and the harbors of the great lakes. Constitutional scruples should vanish when we are admonished that the great Webster, Calhoun, Monroe, Douglas, and Benton recognized the right and duty of the Government to appropriate money to construct roads and canals of a national character.

In the great presidential struggle of 1856 the democratic party in convention assembled at Cincinnati solemnly resolved that it recognized the great importance in a political and commercial point of view of a safe and speedy communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and that it was the duty of the Government to exercise all its constitutional power to the attainment of that object.

The republican party the same year, in Philadelphia, asserted by resolution that the Federal Government ought to render immediate assistance to the construction of a road on the thirty-second parallel to the Pacific, and at that time no warning voice was raised in either party against a threatened invasion of the Constitution. Buchanan, a strict constructionist, in his inaugural address laid down the doctrine that under the constitutional power to declare war, to raise and support armies, provide and maintain a navy, and to call forth the militia to repel invasion, Congress had the right to grant lands or money, or both, to aid in the construction of a Pacific railroad.

The grant of about thirty-five million acres of land and the loan or nearly $65,000,000 in bonds to the Union and Central Pacific Companies, in 1862; the grant of about forty-seven millions to the Northern Pacific, in 1864, and the still later grants to the Atlantic and Pacific and the Texas and Pacific companies, together with the fact that the legality of these grants have never been questioned, afford the strongest evidence that Congress does not override any constitutional provision in granting the boon demanded by this bill.

It appears from a report of the Secretary of the Treasury made to the Senate January 7, 1874, that there was expended upon public works of the National Government in the United States and Territories from June 30, 1865, to June 30, 1875, and by the United States in aid of construction of canals, railroads, and wagon-roads, from 1789 to 1873, the sum of $207,999,664.77.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court in the cases of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, distinctly recognizing the right of Congress to construct works of internal improvement national in character, in addition to the precedents already adduced, ought to be sufficient warrant for our support of this measure, if we believe the speedy construction of the road is a national necessity.

To prove that the construction of the Texas and Pacific road is necessary to meet the demands of increasing trade and commerce, and that public sentiment on the Pacific slope is in its favor, I desire to introduce in evidence a few extracts from the argument of Hon. PETER D. WIGGINTON, member from the southern district of California, a gentleman for whom I have the highest regard, recently delivered in opposition to this measure before the House Committee on the Pacific Railroad. He said:

I recognize that to the people of San Diego and San Bernardino Counties the building of a direct line from Texas to the Pacific seaboard at San Diego is a question of grave moment. I recognize fully their wishes and desires in the matter, but I do not believe it can be any better, and certainly not as readily accomplished upon the plan contemplated in the Texas and Pacific bill as by other plans which have been or may be suggested; but the whole people of my district feel the need of another transcontinental road, and that too below the snow belt.

Again he says:

The speedy construction of a transcontinental railway from California to Texas, to connect there with the vast railway system of the East, is, I will venture to say, of far more importance to the people I represent than to those of any other congressional district in the country.

Now I find in the same argument that the gentleman's district comprises the nineteen southernmost counties of the State of California, and is more than one-half the size of the second largest State in the Union.. It has an area of one hundred thousand square miles and a population of two hundred thousand souls, and has taxable property of the value of $275,000,000. Taking it for granted that the people of the nineteen southern counties of California are unanimous in favor of the construction of the thirty-second parallel road, let us ascertain how the remaining portion of the population of that State feel upon the subject.

Last fall the democratic party of California adopted a platform of which the following was one of its planks:

Resolved, That we favor the speedy completion of a transcontinental railroad on the thirty-second parallel, subject to such limitations by the Federal and State governments as shall protect the rights of the people.

Now, I undertake to say that that resolution had direct reference to the construction of the Texas and Pacific road, in the manner provided by the pending bill. This measure had been agitated during the last session of Congress, and for a long time had attracted the attention of the people of California. They were familiar with the nature of its terms and well knew that it was the only railroad bill ever presented to Congress for consideration which contained ample and explicit provisions for the protection of the rights of the people. They were aware of the fact that the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, in consideration of the aid demanded to further the construction of their road, gave the full control and management of it to the Congress of the United States.

That plank in the platform could have no reference to the Southern Pacific Railway Company, for up to that time they never made any offer to the Government to construct the thirty-second parallel road subject to any greater limitations or restriction in favor of the rights of the people than is imposed in the charters creating the Union and Central Pacific companies.

The democrats, with that plank in their platform, carried California by 30,000 majority.

The democratic party of California has been uniformly an anti-railroad or anti-monopoly party, and when they adopted that resolution it was in deference to public opinion, which loudly called for relief from the monstrous exactions of the Central and Southern Pacific companies, which I will hereafter show are identical in interest.

Why, sir, on the very day the railroad convention assembled in Saint Louis the Alta California, one of the leading newspapers of San Francisco, and a recognized organ of the Central Pacific, bowing gracefully to public sentiment, declared in a well-written editorial that the country needed the Texas and Pacific road and that the Government should aid it to the extent of at least $20,000,000, but that Leland Stanford should be permitted to take all he could build from the west till he should meet Scott coming from the east.

It would seem strange indeed if public opinion were otherwise in California when we consider some of the causes most instrumental in its creation. It is a notorious fact, that since the completion of the Central Pacific road many of the great political struggles in that State have been determined by the magnitude of its corrupt influence.

Its directors and agents have uniformly attempted to control State legislation in their favor; they have subsidized newspapers of prominence, and visited their vengeance on independent journals of respectability that dared to warn the people of their aggressions.

I will cite one instance, that of the Sacramento Union, not long ago one of the most prosperous and influential newspapers in the West. It was found in the cabin of every miner of California and was regarded as the great molder of opinion. It refused to bow to the behests of the magnates of the Central Pacific, and was consequently marked for destruction.

They who enjoyed the favor of the mighty corporation withdrew their advertisements and stopped their subscriptions. Its general distribution was interdicted by an arbitrary mandate prohibiting its sale on the cars or at any of the stations along the entire line. This persecution was kept up for four years, until the Union fell beneath it. Its property, which had been valued at $300,000, was sold at auction for $45,000, the Central Pacific corporation being the purchaser.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are graver reasons than any yet presented which influence the people of California in favor of the construction of an independent and competing road. They are easily discovered by an inspection of the schedule rates for freight and fares between New York and San Francisco, and by the system of unjust discrimination on roads controlled by the Central Pacific within her borders.

In this I am partially corroborated by the gentleman from Southern California, [Mr. WIGGINTON,] who in the argument to which I have before alluded said that "there is much complaint that these railroads are permitted to charge what seems to be too much for freights and fares over their lines, and I am of opinion that in some cases the complaint is just."

The following freight tariff for the year 1875 indicates what the people of the Pacific coast may expect if the routes by land and sea are controlled by the Central Pacific.

On the tariff of February 3, 1875, their rates were, per one hundred pounds: First class, $3.25; second class, $2; third class, $1.90; fourth class, $1.80, with special classes as against sailing-ships around Cape Horn for low-grade freight running from $1.70 to $1.40.

On the 4th of March, 1875, the day Congress adjourned, they advanced their tariff to—First class, $5; second class, $4; third class, $3; fourth class, $2.50; showing an advance of from 40 to 100 per cent.

On the 29th of March, 1875, they made their rates—First class, $5; second class, $5; third class, $4; fourth class, $3.

Owing to the establishment of this tariff, though forty millions of pounds of through freight less than in 1874 passed over the road, its earnings were $13,300 per mile; an increase of 15 per cent.

I wish to call the attention of the democratic members from California to the report of the committee on corporations of the California Legislature, made on the 15th day of February, 1876, by its chairman, L. Archer, one of the purest men and brightest intellects in that State. That committee made a thorough investigation of the conduct of the Central Pacific and other roads within the State for the purpose of comparing their tariff rates with those of eight of the great railroads of the country. The report, as it appears in the San Francisco Post, shows that by the Stanford and Huntington monopoly the charges on all through and local freights per ton per mile are—

More than the Union Pacific, 98.3 per cent.; more than the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, 67.8 per cent.; more than the Pennsylvania Central, 338.0 per cent. more than the New York Central, 111.1 per cent.; more than the New York and Erie, 140.7 per cent.; more than the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago, 387.0 per cent.; more than the Atlantic and Great Western, 277.3 per cent; more than the Alleghany Valley, 330.4 per cent. Here are eight roads. They average in length 1,088 miles, which is a greater distance than from San Francisco to Ogden; and the Central Pacific charges for transportation of freight an average of more than 225 per cent. above their tariff rates; while the operating expenses of the monopoly average 40 per cent. less a difference of 265 per cent. against the business community of California. Examining the charges for first-class through passengers, we find that the average difference is 96 per cent. against us, and is greater yet for the other classes of passengers.

The road from Lathrop to Goshen, 146 miles, is level, while the road from San Francisco to Sacramento City, 140 miles, crosses the Coast Range of mountains; still the rates to Goshen are from 100 to 400 per cent. greater than from San Francisco to Sacramento, while the rates from Sacramento to Red Bluff are from 100 to 300 per cent. greater than the San Francisco and Sacramento charges. The rates per ton per mile are found to be from 33 to 100 per cent. greater in the San Joaquin than in the Sacramento Valley, except for fourth class, which is 8 per cent. less. Certainly no just cause for this discrimination exists. All these stations being on valley roads, the cost of transportation per mile should be equal.

From San Francisco east to the State line, 278 miles, the Central Pacific tariff on staple articles like coal-oil is now $11.70 in coin per ton, while the freight on coal-oil in the same quantities from New York to San Francisco is only $30 in currency. In other words, the discrimination against shippers within this State is more than 1,500 per cent.; and the same is true in relation to such articles as sheet-iron, rope, and iron pipe, which are brought from New York to San Francisco for from $30 to $35 per ton in currency, but cannot be shipped east to the State line for less than $34.80 in coin.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] for whose ability I entertain the highest respect, in his celebrated speech on finance, drew a comparison between the increasing prosperity of Minnesota and California, to the disparagement of the latter. A careful examination of the above reports, in my humble judgment, would have furnished a better and stronger reason why the Golden State is not keeping step to the music of progress than that her circulating medium is gold and silver instead of paper. He might have asserted without fear of contradiction that, with all her unrivaled advantages, she can never enter the lists of competition with many of her sister States until every branch of her industries, now languishing beneath the exactions of this monopoly, shall be stimulated by the construction of an opposing and competing line.

I hope I have not incurred the displeasure of my brother members from California in referring to matters in their State. I trust they will not deem me guilty of encroaching upon their high prerogative by undertaking to prove the condition of the public mind there. Such a course was necessary to prove the justice of my cause, and was prompted by the belief that public opinion on this question was crystallized and unmistakable.

Believing that I have shown beyond all reasonable doubt the absolute necessity to the people of California of an opposition line to the Pacific Ocean, I desire now to enter the protest of the constituency I have the honor to represent against the discriminating policy of the Central Pacific company, unrelentingly enforced in the State of Nevada, which is traversed from east to west by their line of railroad.

Nevada as well as California has been liberal in her donations to the Central Pacific, and ought to be entitled to some consideration. Her people united with those of California in rejoicing over the completion of the road, believing it was intended to facilitate and cheapen transportation and develop her hidden treasures. But hardly had the shriek of the first locomotive been heard on the sage-brush than we were doomed to a most bitter disappointment. It was the signal for the inauguration of an arbitrary and exorbitant system of freight tariffs, remarkable for discrimination between localities, and in favor of California as against Nevada.

To illustrate: I live, sir, in Virginia City, the largest city between Denver, Colorado, and San Francisco, and perhaps the wealthiest in the world in proportion to its population.

From Virginia City we connect by a local railroad fifty-one miles in length with the main stem of the Central Pacific at Reno, two hundred and ninety-eight miles from San Francisco. Our merchants living in the shadow and awe of this grasping monopoly dare not have their merchandise purchased in New York consigned to the city of Virginia, for the freight rates are higher than they are clear through to San Francisco and back again.

If a merchant desires to ship one hundred pounds of goods from New York to a local station on the Central Pacific road in the State of Nevada, say Winnemucca, which is four hundred and sixty miles east of San Francisco, he is compelled to pay the through rate to San Francisco, $6 per hundred, and in addition to that the local rate from San Francisco to Winnemucca, $2.29, making $8.29 per one hundred pounds.

But discrimination in freight is not all the people of Nevada have to suffer. The fare from San Francisco to New York is $138. We in Nevada are from three hundred to five hundred miles east, yet if we desire to take a trip to New York we are compelled to pay at any of the way stations on the line the full rate of fare, $138.

Such is the brief outline of the system of discrimination that is preying upon the vitals of our people and eating out their substance. For years it has been vehemently but vainly denounced by every journal in the State. Judging by the past and the present, there is no shadow of hope in the future if this measure be defeated.

We have been told by Leland Stanford, the president of the Central Pacific and the head and front of the Southern Pacific, that the main feature of his grand continental railway system is discrimination in favor of the city of San Francisco.

We of Nevada are principally old Californians. We rejoice in the prosperity of the Queen City of the West, and believe the day not far distant when she will rival in magnificence the greatest commercial mart of the nation. Half of the life-blood that circulates in her veins comes from the bone and muscle of the hardy miners of Nevada. The most costly of her garments, the most brilliant of the gems that sparkle in her diadem, and the most palatial of her mansions have been purchased by their industry. They will pour into her coffers this very year a stream of gold and silver bullion which, if properly directed, would in a short time sweep from the land all of our fractional currency. But we protest against the policy which builds up great cities at the railroad termini at the expense of localities of the interior.

Owing to our geographical position we cannot expect to be an equal participator with the people of California in the blessings that must spring from the construction of the Texas and Pacific road; but we claim the right to sound the tocsin of alarm to the countless thousands that contemplate settling in the rich sections of country through which it passes, and to the people of this country, lest congressional legislation should give the control of this great national highway to the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. Speaker, the people of California and Nevada, of Arizona and New Mexico, are not the only parties interested in this most important measure. From twelve to fifteen millions of people, represented by eight hundred and sixty-nine delegates, and representing every variety of business interests, have in solemn conclave at Saint Louis last November raised their united voices in favor of the construction of the Texas and Pacific road in the manner designated in the bill. The propriety of its speedy construction has been urged upon Congress by resolutions of the Legislatures of ten great States, and by the chambers of commerce of New Orleans, Memphis, Cincinnati, Vicksburgh, Richmond, Saint Louis, Augusta, Louisville, Atlanta, Macon, Indianapolis, Pittsburgh, and the Cotton Exchange of Nashville. They respectfully petition Congress to loan the credit of the Government to further its construction, for the reason that it is the most practicable and preferable route, and which, in the language of Benton, "is the one demanded by every national consideration." They believe the people of the United States are entitled to a road below the snow belt, so that transportation of troops and munitions of war may not be retarded in case of Indian insurrection or invasion of the Pacific States and Territories by a foreign foe. Our merchants demand the construction of this road, over which the products of our land, the imports of the Orient, and the islands of the Pacific may pass without interruption from the great snow blockades so frequent this winter on the Central Pacific.

Experience has demonstrated that the Union and Central Pacific Company's line is totally inadequate to supply the increasing demands of trade and commerce, by reason of the great uncertainty in the delivery of freight in the winter season, and the want of restrictions in their charters in favor of the rights of the people.

Let us now ascertain from what quarter comes the most serious opposition to this bill. Is it not from the Central Pacific Railroad Company, which, though a distinct corporation, owns and controls the Southern Pacific? Since the commencement of this session its agents and attorneys have made more speeches before committees than have been made by the most eloquent members of this body in the course of legislation. They even dared to attack the measure on the ground that the Government aid solicited partook of the character of a subsidy, in face of the fact that the honorable member from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] introduced a bill, the object of which was to further subsidize the Southern Pacific Company, declaring the land grant of the Texas and Pacific lapsed and forfeited, and bestowing it on them. A subsidy is infamous when asked for the Texas and Pacific, but when demanded by the Central Pacific for the Southern Pacific it is wise economy.

Now for proof that these two corporations are as closely connected as the Siamese twins in their business relations with each other.

The gentleman from the southern district of California, in response to a question propounded him by the Committee on Railroads as to their identity, said that a great many people of his district believed they were one and the same. Mr. Huntington, the open and avowed attorney of the Southern Pacific, did not dare to give a direct answer to a similar question put to him by the same committee, but awkwardly evaded it by stating that the two corporations were on neighborly terms. I am aware that he has emphatically denied their relationship, but his testimony on this point, when viewed in a legal aspect, cannot be entitled to much, if any, consideration. Before the committee he said he had no concealments to make as to his connection with the Southern Pacific. He knew the rails for the Southern Pacific were bought by the Central Pacific. He could tell whether they were steel or iron, the name of the wood out of which the ties were hewn, the number of tunnels and ranges of mountains traversed by the road, the number of miles to be constructed under the charter per year, yet his memory became so suddenly obscured that he could not tell the name of a single officer or member of the contract and finance company of the Southern Pacific.

Stanford, the president of the Central Pacific, virtually admitted their identity when he said, in speaking of the Southern Pacific, "We are toiling for the greatest prize this continent affords. Had Scott built his railroad to the Pacific he would have taken from us our best prospective traffic and carried it East. He would have reached even to our borders and carried off our trade."

But, sir, I am not confined solely to verbal admissions. I have some documentary evidence in support of the proposition. I discovered it in a speech of the honorable gentleman from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] who introduced the bill to give the Texas and Pacific land grant to the Southern Pacific, delivered in the last session of Congress. It was made in support of a resolution for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the affairs of the contract and finance company of the Central Pacific. The gentleman accumulated a vast amount of reliable statistics to prove the directors of the Central Pacific, who now control the Southern Pacific, were perfidious toward the Government, were robbing the stockholders, and resorted to bribery to cover up their infamy. To use his own language, "they formed a combination before which the fraud and rascality of the Credit Mobilier sink into insignificance."

In showing the necessity for investigation he presented the sworn and uncontradicted affidavit of Sam Brannan, one of the foremost citizens of California, a stockholder in the corporation to the extent of two hundred shares, who, believing himself swindled out of his dividends, brought suit against the Central Pacific, and Stanford, Huntington, and others. That portion of it which bears on my proposition reads as follows:

> That said defendants, Leland Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, Charles and E. B. Crocker, and their confederates, to plaintiff unknown, have by the use of the means, moneys, and assets of the said Central Pacific, and the gains and profits so as aforesaid acquired by them under the name of Charles Crooker & Co., and under the name of said contract and finance company and not otherwise, purchased and acquired, on or about the 20th day of December, 1869, a majority of, and almost the entire amount of, the capital stock of the said Southern Pacific Railroad Company.

He might have made a similar affidavit to-day without any fear of committing perjury, for during the last five years the secretary, land agent, superintendent, and several directors of the Central have held corresponding positions in the contract and finance company of the Southern Pacific.

The parties contracting to build the Southern built the Central. Besides, the Southern Pacific road is only an extension of the Central, it being admitted that the two hundred and twenty-eight miles of road running from Oakland to Stockton and from Lathrop to Goshen is owned and controlled by the Central Pacific.

If these two corporations have an identity of interest, it is not difficult to detect the secret of their opposition to the Government aid asked to assist in the construction of the Texas and Pacific road. The road being necessarily independent and competing, and running below the snow belt through sections of our country richer in agricultural, and with one exception in mineral wealth, than any traversed by the Union and Central, is destined to reap a great revenue. Whatever may be its profits, they lessen to that extent the receipts of the latter, which last year amounted in gross to nearly $26,000,000. The net receipts of the Central alone were nearly $6,500 per mile, and its managers, originally poor men, according to Mr. LUTTRELL, are now among the wealthiest in the land. In order to secure their present and prospective revenue, they propose by the Luttrell bill to construct the thirty-second parallel road without any governmental guarantee of interest on construction bonds, if Congress will give them the Texas and Pacific land grant.

Now, if Congress had the power to declare a forfeiture in this instance (which I deny) and did subsidize the Southern and Central Pacific with the Texas and Pacific land grant, can any one believe the road will be ever constructed?

In order to believe the offer a serious and honest one, we must do violence to every rule that governs human actions. We will witness for the first time the strange spectacle of a rich corporation begging for a chance to construct another road over which they can exercise no control, and which must materially reduce their profits. Give them the land grant, let them construct the road, and we have the first instance on record of a corporation creating an opposition to itself. Why, sir, if an individual were indicted for the commission of the most heinous offense, and it were proven on the trial of his cause that for three months before the perpetration of the deed he had devoted all the energies of his nature to the maturing of a plan for the reduction of his annual or monthly income to the extent of one-half or perhaps more, an honest jury would acquit him on the ground of insanity without leaving their seats. No government ought to treat with such a corporation, for its directors ought to be regarded as irresponsible agents.

With the land grant the directors of the Central and Southern Pacific are willing to construct the road, subject to the limitations in favor of the people as are contained in the following section of the bill of the gentleman from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL:]

> SEC. 7. That three commissioners shall be appointed, one each by the governors of New York, Missouri, and California, who shall prescribe the rates for freight and fares to be charged, limiting such rates to a reasonable percentage of returns on the actual cost and running expenses of the entire line; and said line or lines shall never be leased to any other railway company, or controlled in the interest of any other line.

The striking singularity of the proposition contained in the above section is sufficient at first blush to induce us to doubt its sincerity. Three commissioners shall be appointed by the governors of New York, Missouri, and California to prescribe the rules for freight and fares without the filing of a bond or the taking of an oath for the faithful performance of their duties, responsible to no one for malfeasance in office. What a temptation for a vast railway combination, possessing great political experience, to influence the gubernatorial struggles in these three States for the purpose of securing two corrupt commissioners. But even if the section were amended (as I believe is intended) by giving Congress the right to regulate fares and freight, I have the most incontestable proof that they never intend to construct the road subject to such a restriction upon monopolizing tendencies. In a letter addressed to C. P. Huntington, bearing date the 8th day of February, by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Railroads, this question is propounded:

> Will you consent that the tariff rates for the use of said road for both local and other business shall be subject to the control of Congress at all times?

The letter of Mr. Huntington in reply contains the following language:

> Any further supervision or regulation by Congress, beyond that already provided by law, we regard as uncalled for and superfluous. Without entering upon the question of the policy or power of the General Government attempting to regulate and fix the rates of freight and passenger traffic on roads authorized by States and operated within States, where collateral and possibly conflicting enactments prevail, I desire simply to show that there is here no occasion for it.
>
> If the Government is willing to guarantee, say, 7 per cent. per annum upon the capital invested, then perhaps we might consider the question; but where the parties who furnish all the capital take all the risk of losing it or getting no return, they should have the hope, at least, of making 10 per cent. to induce them to invest. If the bill shall be amended that "whenever the net earnings, after defraying the expenses of operation, administration, maintenance, and the sinking fund and interest payments on its debts, shall exceed 10 per cent. per annum upon its capital stock, then Congress may regulate the rates of freights and fares by general laws, applicable alike to all railroad companies aided by the Government of the United States"—then I am not sure but I could procure the consent of the company to build the road with this provision in the bill.
> C. P. HUNTINGTON,
> Agent and Attorney Southern Pacific Railroad Company.

Now, this letter of Mr. Huntington bears date February 15, nearly a month subsequent to the introduction of the Luttrell bill, and ought to set at rest the question of their insincerity. It must carry conviction to every unprejudiced mind that all their protestations against subsidies and all their offers to construct the Texas and Pacific are but as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. Like the apples that bloom on the shores of the Dead Sea, they are fair to the view but ashes at the core. They are only intended to balk legislation until they obtain possession of every natural avenue and gateway that leads to the Pacific. Already they control not only every road of note on the Pacific coast, but the Pacific Mail, the line of steamers running to China, the Oakland Ferry and California Steam Navigation Company. Their attorneys have studied every industry of the Pacific slope to ascertain the utmost amount of tribute they can levy without hazarding its destruction. Inaction on our part only strengthens the iron grasp of the Central Pacific upon the commerce of the country.

In the language of the Stockton Herald of the 22d of February:

> The only hope of escaping the burdens that now weigh us down lies in the speedy construction of a competing line. California is already bound hand and foot by the capitalists.

In conclusion, I desire to state that I have not set down "aught in malice." My relations with several of the prominent attachés of the Central Pacific Railroad Company are of the most friendly character, while I am totally unacquainted with any of the directors or corporators of the Texas and Pacific. The remarks I have made are simply the result of honest conviction, and, in my humble judgment, will meet the approval of the people I represent.

SALARIES OF OFFICIALS AND EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as the remarks which I purpose to submit will relate more to the general policy and scope of this bill than to any particular paragraph, I prefer to present what I have to say now to the House than to seek the opportunity under the limited debate in Committee of the Whole.

The attempt to cut down salaries and to economize in the public service is at all times an ungracious task, and where undertaken in good faith and carried forward with enlightened caution should receive the support of every member of this House. Cut where you will, you touch some vital interest and are sure to provoke instantaneous and determined resistance. And because you are dealing with interests which are vital, furnishes all the more reason why you should proceed only upon the most thorough knowledge of the needs and requirements of the public service.

None could know these special wants better than the heads of Departments and Bureaus, yet it seems to be conceded that while some of these have been called before the Committee on Appropriations while this bill was in course of preparation others have been wholly ignored, and of those who did appear, some have been informed at once, after giving valid reasons why their force should be increased rather than diminished, that their number of clerks would be reduced 20 per cent., and the compensation cut down 10 per cent., and this in direct opposition to the advice of those who knew the value of their services and the absolute necessity of retaining in the public employ faithful and experienced clerks.

Passing now, Mr. Speaker, to the question of our own salaries, I cannot accede to the doctrine alluded to in this debate and sometimes contended for outside of Congress, that the compensation of a member here rests in contract, in the nature of entirety, not to be increased or diminished during the term for which he is elected, because if it be formed in contract at all it rests always upon the fundamental condition of the power of Congress to increase or diminish it at pleasure. But, sir, without discussing the legal technicality of the question, I prefer to place it on the higher ground of a sacred trust, founded in good faith and mutual confidence. It resembles the case of a party who desires the services of another in whom he has such confidence that he says to him: "Perform this service with fidelity and to the best of your ability, and I shall leave it to you to name the amount of your compensation." No proposition could place a true man under a more delicate or higher sense of honor. And having named what he believed to be a just compensation, upon the slightest intimation that his employer thought it too much, he would respond: "You name the sum yourself."

Now while this theory may be a little too refined for the actual condition of things existing between members and their constituents, it certainly furnishes a hint in the right direction.

So, when in the Forty-second Congress members placed their own salaries at $7,500 per annum and there came up an unmistakable demand from the people for its restoration to the old figure, the Forty-third Congress, responding to that demand, at once put it back to $5,000 per annum; and in my judgment, sir, it should have gone back to that figure on the first day of the session, and without one hour of cavil or debate.

The people had spoken in no uncertain tones. We are their public servants, and in matters personal to ourselves, after a fair hearing and an unmistakable demand, it is our duty to obey. So had there come up now from the people, through the press, by letter or by petition, any general, well-defined demand for the reduction of salaries of members of Congress, arising out of a fair understanding of the facts, it would be our duty to heed it. But who has heard of any such demand? And who does not know that this whole matter has been inaugurated and set forward as a mere matter of cheap political buncombe?

There has been no more apt remark in this whole debate than that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] to the effect that there could be no more unseemly spectacle than that of the American Congress wrangling before the country and the world over the compensation of its members. I believe the public mind was content when the compensation was placed back to $5,000 per annum, and I believe it was and is a just sum. When the compensation was $3,000 the mileage was double what it is now, so that members in the vicinity of Chicago, as I am informed, received as high as $1,600 mileage instead of that received at the present time, and each drew a congressional library said to be worth some $1,500; all of which has since been corrected.

But, sir, I still reiterate what I have heretofore said in this debate, that if the salaries of these twelve-hundred-dollar clerks is to be cut down regardless of the right or the wrong of the matter, then common justice requires that our own go with it. Five thousand dollars may seem a large sum for men engaged in their usual avocations at their homes, and it is. But let any one of these take any portion of his family and proceed upon a journey among strangers, and he will soon discover that there are a hundred ways in which he can practice economy at home which it is utterly impossible to do when abroad; money will seem to evaporate in spite of all his prudence. I judge that more money can be saved in a year from an income of $2,500 in an ordinary western city than with the same economy can possibly be saved from the present salary of a member of Congress. But, sir, whether his salary be $5,000, $3,000, or $2,500 per annum, I would have it understood that from the hour he accepts the trust his services belong to his constituents and the public, and to them alone. I believe there is no more pernicious doctrine than that which teaches that a member of Congress should practice his profession or pursue his private business while he is paid for serving the public.

Look for a moment at the mere routine duties of a Senator or member of Congress here, saying nothing of his extra labors. He visits the Departments from nine to half past ten o'clock a. m. The majority of the members now go daily to committee work at half past ten o'clock, and remain in committee-rooms and in the sessions of this House till half past five o'clock p. m. And during three nights in the week the House sits from half past seven till eleven o'clock at night; making some twelve hours spent in the stifling air of these chambers. In the mean time three mails have arrived. Now, what time or opportunity has the member to attend to his correspondence, read the debates of the two Houses, investigate and write out reports upon matters referred to him in committee? It is simply impossible. He cannot do it. Something must be neglected. The rich member may employ his private secretary; the poor one cannot. Whatever he does must be done on the spur of the moment. He has little time for study and none for reflection. When then, if ever, shall he read or examine the fifty volumes and more of executive documents, reports of committees, and miscellaneous papers of a single session of Congress, many of them containing the rarest information upon matters which are the continuous subjects of legislation? He can never do it except during the recess of Congress and in the quiet of his home.

Mr. Speaker, I should as soon think of counting the hours during which a judge actually sat on the bench, an executive occupied the chair of state, or a clergyman stood in his pulpit, with a view to fixing his salary, as I should of measuring the compensation of a member of Congress by the time spent in actual session.

Of the one hundred and eighty-five lawyers, members of this House, how many have any business whatever in the Supreme Court of the United States? Perhaps a score of them may have such national reputation as to command business there. But, sir, instead of encouraging this practice I believe it should be discouraged, if not prohibited by positive law. No man can go into court and argue causes where the interests of his clients will often conflict with the public interest, and not render a divided service, or not have his judgment warped as an attorney from what it should be as a legislator. To require him to continue practice in local courts a thousand or two thousand miles from the seat of Government is about as reasonable as to ask him to practice medicine or teach school under like circumstances.

No, Mr. Speaker, the compensation should be fair, reasonable, and just, and for that the constituent should command the undivided service; and the member should devote to his public duties the very best energies of his life. I am not unaware, sir, that there is a cry of distress in the country and a demand for economy in all the Departments of Government. It is equally true that the impression very generally prevails that there is a reign of fashionable frivolity, extravagance, and folly at this capital, which within the last few years has been the primary cause of dragging down from places of high position and trust some of the most honored men in public life. Let this impression become fixed, let the belief pervade the public mind that every man in official station has his price, that common honesty is the exception rather than the rule, and we may bid adieu to the traditions of the American Republic and banish all hope for its continued perpetuity.

The people do not demand that we shall enter men's houses and declare by positive law what shall be the grade of their expenditures, the mode of their lives, or the cost or cut of their garments; nor whether they shall indulge in badges, decorations, cockades, coat-of-arms, or any other weak imitations of royalty; whether they shall employ one coachman or two, or whether these shall wear the plain garb of the citizen, or be clothed in the livery of the lackey. These are matters of private taste and personal privilege, though no one can reflect upon them without serious apprehensions from their tendency in a republican form of government. But what the people do want, and what I believe they are longing and praying for daily, is the appearance here of the wife of some leading American statesman who can comprehend the true dignity of her position, and who, by her nobility of character, grace of heart, varied accomplishments, and womanly worth and virtue, can assume her true place in society, and put to eternal rout the shoddy and shams which have dominated here for the last few years to the ruin of individuals and the disgrace of the American name. I am not saying, sir, that we have not such women here now. They exist by the score. Let them come to the front, assert their power, and forty millions of people shall "rise up and call them blessed."

One other thing, Mr. Speaker; for these are times for plain words. There is no disguising the fact that within the last three years the republican masses of this country have been shocked, stunned, and disappointed until they have become sore, sensitive, and distrustful. They scarcely know who to trust or what to believe. The question of the hour is fast passing beyond that of how many delinquencies one political party can score up against the other into the higher and more important one of, "Do these offenses really exist? and, if so, who will ferret out the offenders and bring them to justice." Answer this question; winnow these bushels of chaff and lay bare the clean grain of fact; wring out from these mountainous clouds of accusation, rumor and scandal, the one crystal drop of truth; hold it up before the world, so that by its light honor may shine the brighter and corruption blush the blacker. Do this fairly, thoroughly, impartially, and the people will not haggle with you about a few dollars of a Government clerk's salary on this side or that of the ledger.

Much has been said about the issues of the coming political campaign. May I be allowed to predict, sir, that the real issue will not be finance, the tariff, or any other question of political economy, so much as it will be: First, can the electral franchise be freely and safely exercised in the southern half of this Republic; and, second, can the offices of this nation be honestly administered and our men in public life be trusted? These are the things the people want to know about, and what they want to know and mean to know generally finds its way to the front in political campaigns in spite of parties or political managers.

One word further as to the salaries of these clerks, and I will relieve the patience of the House. If it be true, as it doubtless is in some instances, that there is an excess in the number of these clerks, such excess should be speedily reduced. But, though times are hard, the Government of the United States is not bankrupt; it can afford to employ all the service it needs, and of the very best kind, and for this it should pay a just and reasonable compensation, which compensation should bear a true relation to the nature of the service rendered and the circumstances and surroundings under which it is performed. What would be a fair compensation under some conditions would be wholly inadequate under others. Now, I lay down this general proposition, that he who, by the practice of prudence and economy, can save something from his annual income over necessary expenses, is in the best condition to serve himself, and therefore to serve his employer. It is the man who is gaining a little in the world whose hopes revive and whose energies increase. Would, you then, fix these salaries so low as to discourage all attempts at prudence or economy?

The salaries of these clerks range from $1,200 to $1,800 per year, and were fixed, in 1854, on a gold basis. A statement which we have all seen presented in their behalf shows, in detail, the appreciated price of living in this city and the depreciated purchasing power of money, and demonstrates that, except during and immediately following the war, these salaries since 1818 have never been so low as at the present time. Yet this bill proposes to reduce them 10 and 20 per cent.

The question recurs whether an average of $1,500 a year for a Government clerk in the city of Washington is too high a compensation. It would not be deemed too high at most of the State capitals. Is it here? If we were to estimate just what it would cost to feed, clothe, and lodge one of these clerks precisely as we would do in the case of a horse; if we were to treat them sui generis, isolated from the rest of the world; if they are presumed to have no social relations or intellectual tastes, no desire for reasonable recreation or mental improvement; if they stand separate and apart from all mankind, then doubtless the price is too high. But the exact opposite is the case with most human beings, and so it is with these clerks. Those of them who are unmarried, both male and female, are apt to have a mother, sister, or friend more or less dependent upon their earnings.

Some of the most cultivated young men and accomplished young women in Washington may be found among these Government clerks. You will meet them in the libraries and art galleries rather than at the "german." Some of these might teach even the "Hon. Bardwell Slote" things which it would be profitable for him to know, and "by a large majority." Many of them are married men with families to provide for. I know, sir, of no nobler example either of manhood or of heroism than that of a father, who perhaps has seen better days, and may have served his country in its hour of peril, standing up to his desk day after day, year in and year out, performing routine duties without a murmur, that he may provide for the daily wants of his family. And yet, with such a man, $100 or $200 taken from his salary often marks the dividing line between comfort and want.

I was told by the Adjutant-General of the Army to-day that some of his clerks had been in service so long as to become experts in their special duties; but that as this bill proposed to reduce their salaries, they would not remain, and that many of them had charge of valuable papers pertaining to the war and the country, which he would never intrust to the care of inexperienced clerks. He further said that some of these old clerks had become so interested in their specialties and the prompt performance of their duty that he often found them working at night and out of office hours, and for no additional compensation. Now, Mr. Speaker, what does this bill say to such as these? It says to them, work on; be faithful and diligent, and if at the end of the next ten or fifteen years political party exigencies shall require it, we will again reduce your salary 10 or 20 per cent. in the interest of "retrenchment and reform!"

Gentlemen of the opposition, you hold the knife; you cut among vital interests. See to it that you so wield it that for mere party purposes you do not cripple the public service. The people are neither stupid, parsimonious, nor mean. All they desire is what is reasonable and fair. He who attempts to deceive them upon fictitious issues by appealing to their prejudices, real or supposed, will sooner or later be hoist by his own petard.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I will say let us so compensate all our officials and employés that by the exercise of reasonable prudence they shall feel that they are not mere drudges nor slaves, but that they have a common interest with the Government in the faithful performance of their duties, and that year by year they are gaining a little upon the up-grade of life and gathering around them something more of its comforts. Put hope, energy, interest, manhood, and self-respect into your civil service, and it will reform itself; crush these out, and the opposite will be sure to follow.

DISTRIBUTION OF GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. BURLEIGH. It has been my fortune for about twenty-five years to be familiar with ships and their interests, and with insurance companies, during this time being more or less interested in navigation. I remember well the feelings and action in war times of the ship-owners and insurers. Both were scared. The insurers knew not what to charge, and kept on the safe side by exacting from their scared and cornered customers such rates as would make themselves safe in all human calculation. I said "cornered" customers; most of them were cornered; they were cornered in different ways. It is the custom to own vessels in shares; sometimes they are divided into sixty-fourths. One man is appointed ship's-husband, whose duty it is to insure and look after the interests of the vessel. If he neglects to insure and the vessel be lost, he had better quit the country or pay the loss out of his own pocket. He will keep the vessel insured, whatever the rate may be. Often some of his owners are dependent women and children, having their all in the ship. Others, bolder, have every dollar they are worth invested in one ship; they must insure. Other ships are in debt to banks or for hired money; they must insure to protect their creditors, so that a large proportion of our vessels were and are to-day in such a position that they must insure.

With confederate cruisers turning up in unexpected quarters, and ships being captured and burned in all parts of the world, is there any wonder that a panic seized those interested in navigation; that they paid freely the exorbitant premium demanded by insurers; that the ship-owners were bled, year after year, until their vessels were lost or sold to foreigners to pay their debts; and that the United States from being the second largest mercantile marine nation in the world sank to about the fifth?

Where are the men that officered those ships of ours? Go with me to New England and I will find you men in every town on the seaboard that will take us out in their little fishing-boats to the fishing-grounds; get into conversation with them and you will learn that they once commanded or were mates of a ship in the foreign trade, that the war came on, the insurance bills ate the ship up, and they have no money now, neither have their friends, to build a new vessel. Their life has been spent on the water, and they knew nothing of any other business.

Now, the question is, Who shall have the money awarded to this country by Great Britain to pay for losses sustained by our commerce from English-countenanced confederate cruisers? Shall it be given to insurance offices that are to-day only in name what they were twelve and fourteen years ago? In the ordinary course of events their stock is more than half changed to new men, that will get this award if it goes to them. Or suppose the same men own the insurance offices that owned them in the war, shall we add to their gains? Shall we enrich those who, when their country was struggling for life, took advantage of the necessities of their distressed customers, and sucked the blood from their veins to build marble edifices and offices on Broadway, and palatial residences, with brown-stone fronts, on Fifth avenue? To those that send lobbyists of great fame here, that some way or other have the entrée on this floor, and have long and earnest interviews in the cloak-room with members of this House. This is the way it was last session and the session before; it is so to-day.

They are re-enforced by men that can talk "subrogation" well from the great city of New York. I have seen them often recently in the cloak-rooms and lobbies, exercising on this long word in the interest of the great and powerful insurance companies that have made a league with each other, and mean by their wiles to gobble up this money and add it to their gains, which their own books show were very large.

Let me state a parallel case to a ship-owner and insurer in this question. A business man hires money of a money-lender to do business with at fair rates of interest and prospers. Adverse action to business man's interest turns up; his property is being destroyed and is in danger; both men get scared; the money-lender raises his rates of interest from time to time until the business man is impoverished and exhausted. Money-lender has become rich. Afterward parties responsible for adverse action and destruction of business man's property finds that he has done wrong and makes restitution—to whom? The business man or the insurer?

We have heard a great deal said of insurance law. I know by experience that in adjusting insurance losses hardly any two adjusters agree. In settling losses by insurers the rule in France is different from the rule in England; that of England differs from that of Boston; and the rule in Boston differs from that of New York.

Now we, the members of this Congress of the United States, the highest power in the land, have losses without precedent to adjust. Let us so adjust them that we may not be ashamed of our own action; let us not prefer the gainer to the loser, not prefer those who have grown rich upon the misfortunes of the country to those who did business on the waters and know no other, who are impoverished; men whom the whole country look to to build up our commerce; men who, if the Government will give them their due, will put it on the waters in ships, and dot every sea with their white sails. Again build up our commerce till it stands the foremost in the world, and the old Stars and Stripes will be flung to the breeze in every port—the emblem of a free country purified in the blood of its bravest and best and united from end to end.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I take an interest in the Department of Agriculture. I visit it often. It rests the eye, as it were, after looking upon the severe faces across the Hall, to gaze upon a shrub, a flower, or a bird. It rests the mind after following the flights of fancy and analytical disquisitions of gentlemen to contemplate nature in her less demonstrative moods. It is next to a visit to the prairies to visit the Smithsonian Institution and Agricultural Department grounds, to see nature robing her beauties in spring verdure. These strolls usually include utilitarian calls at the offices that are sending all over the country seeds, plants, roots, and cuttings that are to enable our people in every State of the Union to add to the comforts and luxuries of life and prevent the exportation of $75,000,000 in gold to foreign countries for such commodities as can be produced at home, where our soil and climate are as diversified as our wants in these respects.

The Department of Agriculture has been the means of introducing many of the comforts and necessities of life among our people; better grains, a greater variety of vegetables suitable to the different latitudes of the country. The improvements necessary to be made in these directions are as great to-day as at any time in the past. The greatest of all our crops and the most important is the grass crop. An empire lies in the Mississippi Valley to be seeded down with tame grasses, and while we have plenty of men who can creditably fill a position on the supreme bench, we have very few who can successfully seed down a field in grass that will graze a cow or steer to each acre in both wet and dry seasons. The common law of England applies to causes in our courts between citizens, and precedents centuries old can be quoted in the adjudication of cases arising to-day. Human nature is the same as it was a hundred years ago; but our soil and climate are different from most other soils and climates, while our prosperity as agriculturists keeps pace with the growth of our knowledge of all the elements that enter into the production of our staple crop.

The only aid the farmers of the country have outside of their individual experiments and observation to enable them to determine what is most suitable and profitable as regards grasses, grains, roots, trees, and shrubs, and their adaptability to our varied latitudes, has come from the Department of Agriculture. If the Department can introduce a grass plant that will stand our winters as well as timothy, and be in blossom in summer a month later or a month earlier than timothy and blue-grass, it will lay the foundation of wealth not to be measured by the total sum appropriated by this bill multiplied by itself. The Department is distributing Italian rye-grass this spring that may suit south of the forty-first parallel of latitude, where the winters somewhat resemble Southern Europe. But the great grass belt is north of that latitude, and if there is a grass plant in any part of the Old Word that will add to our pastures and meadows, we need it and must have it. We may have to wait a quarter of a century till we become possessed of the knowledge in this direction we need. Individual effort may discover and demonstrate in a life-time what the Department of Agriculture could bring about and publish to the country in a season.

We buy six million dollars' worth of barley in a season, and nearly as much flax-seed. We have in the Northwest about two weeks of hot, moist weather, about the last of June and first of July, when barley is in blossom. It rusts the straw, preventing the proper ripening of the grain, and also discolors it, rendering it unfit for many purposes for which barley is used; and, in consequence, we are compelled to buy barley from Canada and other countries that succeed in raising a superior sample. The Department of Agriculture has imported one thousand bushels from England, with the assistance of one of our consuls, that may enable us to solve the problem, if it ripens earlier or later, or is better fitted naturally to resist the influence I have spoken of.

There is a manufacturing establishment in my district, at Cedar Rapids, that makes oatmeal from three thousand bushels of oats every day, sending the meal to Glasgow. A much greater breadth of oats has been sown within a radius of fifty miles from Cedar Rapids. But we can only raise oats weighing thirty-two pounds to the bushel, while the standard in most foreign countries is forty-two pounds. The Department of Agriculture is distributing oats imported from Europe weighing forty-five and fifty pounds to the bushel.

It is perhaps not universally known that the country suffers more from worn-out seeds than worn-out land. When a field is partly seeded with oats received from the Department weighing fifty pounds to the bushel, and partly with the best common oats that could be procured weighing thirty-seven pounds to the bushel, and when the heavier oats produced sixty-five bushels an acre weighing forty-eight pounds to the bushel, and the lighter oats produced forty-eight bushels an acre weighing thirty-one pounds to the bushel, it is time every farmer should know what is meant by worn-out seed, the percentage of annual deterioration, and the necessity of periodical renewal, where the best seed can be had, and what sections of our country are best adapted to this and other crops.

We have in the Department the best agricultural library in the country. No provision is made in the bill for librarian. There is no provision for an assistant chemist. In an analytical laboratory a chemist cannot work without an assistant.

Perhaps no feature of this Department is of as much value to the country as the collection and dissemination of statistical information respecting our crops; their condition compared with past seasons in all parts of the country, the probable excess or deficiency, the probable increase or depression of price consequent upon the supply; and while during the present year the stagnation of our industries has prevented the laboring man from earning the money to buy wheat, bread, and beef to the extent he would were our industries prosperous, and has kept the price of these commodities at a lower range than the shortness of the supply may have led the producers to expect, the statistical information furnished by the Department has been of incalculable value to all classes of people interested. From correspondents in every county, nearly, in the United States facts approximately correct are printed in the monthly report. The newspapers, magazines, societies, and correspondents get the facts and spread them broadcast over the land. There is no other agency competent to gather such statistics. No provision is made in the pending bill for the monthly report. The annual report is generally out of date as far as the crop being harvested and marketed is concerned.

The first statistical information the farmers of the country obtained was from the census reports. We have been printing the annual report only after it was years old and out of date. If this Congress refuses to appropriate money to print the monthly, we will be just where we were before the Twenty-fifth Congress, in 1839, when the first appropriation of $1,000 was made for distributing seeds and procuring agricultural statistics, under the Commissioner of Patents, who prepared statistical tables until 1853, when they were discontinued till the Department of Agriculture was established in 1862. In 1863 the first monthly report was issued, which has been continued up to the present time. About this time a Maine farmer wrote to the Department:

> Your monthly reports give me just the information I have wanted for years. Knowing the supply and demand, I am able to sell at my own price, and we can also foresee what will probably be wanted next year. Give practical farmers facts and let gentlemen of leisure theorize.

Individual effort cannot supply this want. No journal in the land furnishes a tithe of the information respecting the monthly condition of crops in all the States and foreign countries.

About one-half of our people are engaged in agricultural pursuits. This is the only Department of the Government that interests one-half of our people directly. The States cannot supply the information for themselves, for while each State could very readily arrive at a knowledge of the condition of all its industries, such knowledge is comparatively valueless without like information respecting all the others.

We were told last Congress that the Bureau of Education and Department of Agriculture were to be abolished, as they had no place legitimately in the Federal Government, but I did not expect to see them starved to death. If this House intends to carry out the States-rights doctrine to this extent, I hope they will do it squarely and openly. If speculators from their superior facilities for getting information are to control the price of our staple products from want of means at the disposal of the Department of Agriculture to procure and promulgate the statistical information that will enable every man who feeds animals, grows grain, manufactures cheese or butter, raises fruit or grass, to judge of the future for himself and of the probably best avenues in which to exert himself in order to prosper individually and benefit mankind, then we should have the manliness to say so, and not continue this Department in such a sickly condition that it cannot work efficiently.

We need apple-trees for the Northwest that will stand our cold winters. Six years ago the Department imported a collection, numbering two hundred and forty-five varieties, from St. Petersburg for the purpose of increasing the list of hardy trees adapted to extreme northern climates. Already the value of this importation is being felt; localities in which the common apple-trees of the country could not live are being furnished with fruit-trees that are not affected by any degree of cold.

The practicability of growing and manufacturing tea is now known to be of reasonable expectation, in competition with countries where labor is cheap, as much can be improved upon in regard to modes of preparation; the ingenuity of our people will apply machinery to the preparation. Foreign manufacturers in China are demonstrating this by superseding hand-labor with machinery. The Department has over five thousand plants ready for distribution, and has been sending out three thousand annually. We paid $22,664,840.78 last year for tea.

Some years ago a valuable collection of orange and lemon trees were imported after being carefully selected in Europe. These are now being propagated and distributed. Scarcely a day passes that a box of these plants is not sent out. The work of propagation is slow. There are several thousand young plants under way at present. They require several years between stock and scion. The amount we appropriate for labor measures the number propagated; the amount produced is equal in value to the labor expended. The introduction of the best varieties is largely due to the Department of Agriculture.

The far-famed Bahia orange was introduced by the Department after much trouble. Several hundred are being distributed this spring. We paid $3,178,872 last year for oranges and lemons.

Superior Chinese bananas that sell higher than the West India variety have been introduced by the Department that produce more per acre and at an earlier age. We paid $338,229.97 for imported bananas last year.

The Department propagates olives, for which we paid $48,223.49. They make a specialty of hybridizing, propagating, and distributing new and valuable grape-vines, for the fruit of which, as raisins, green grapes, pulp-juice, &c., we paid a million dollars last year.

The basket-willow will grow in every swamp in the country, and in many swamps where nothing else will flourish. The Department has been at work for years propagating and distributing the best varieties. There are two hundred distinct varieties, and skilled botanists are required to select the best and most useful, not only for basket-making but for the purpose of inducing verdure on the treeless plains of the West, and for fencing and other purposes. We pay $809,236.44 a year for willow and willow-ware.

Great apprehension has existed during the last few years in consequence of the devastations of insects. The potato crop has been threatened by the potato-bug, and vast territory devasted by the grasshopper. The black locust, which was considered the most valuable tree for economic purposes, was easily grown from the seed, and was valuable for fuel and all farm purposes, has been within a few years literally swept from the face of the whole Northwest, where it occupied thousands of acres, by an insect that no one had seen before nor knew anything about. The natural history of these pests must be studied by some entomologist, and the Department employs a man in that capacity. It is impossible to estimate the amount of loss to the husbandman caused by insects. Their ravages are not confined to States, but are co-extensive with the nation.

The microscopist has also been of vast service since his appointment was made. His advice to cranberry-growers, showing the origin and progress of the rot in the berry which had caused losses in a single county of many thousand dollars, was conceded to be of the greatest value, and is an illustration of the value of the division. It is now well understood that fungoid growths are connected with nearly all the diseases of plants and fruits; a vast number are due to fungi alone. In this class of investigations discovery of the true cause of a disease is very often equivalent to its eradication, and without the aid of an intelligent observer of microscopic objects it would be simply impossible to reach proper conclusions with regard to the nature and extent of plant diseases.

The every-day work of the Department includes answers to inquiries upon almost every conceivable subject connected with the farm and the orchard, and I venture to assert that the advice given and suggestions made, even through the daily correspondence, would be no mean return for the cost of the Department.

This office supplies a want that can be filled no other way. The consequence of informing the workers and thinkers of one part of the country what the others are doing is to teach how much the prosperity and comfort of one citizen depend upon the exertions of others, and how much the general welfare depends upon the prosperity of every industrial interest. The tendency is to break up or prevent sectional feeling, to lift the mind above the contemplation of local interests, and train it to desire and rejoice in national more than sectional prosperity.

Nearly all of our exports are from the farm. The farmers of every section of the country are directly interested in the progress of the farmers of every other section. The leading products of each State are known to us all at present, but the tendency to abandon one branch of agriculture and gradually adopt another by some States is of great interest to all. The agriculturists are the most prosperous of our people to-day, their efforts create most of our exports, and bring back money to pay the interest on our public debt; many of our other industries are prostrate.

It is not the time to strike at our greatest industry. The farmers of the country have had liberal attention since the republican party came into power in 1860. If this democratic House checks the efforts of the Government to communicate information to the men who toil in the fields, it will be remembered that they poll half the votes on election day. I say not a word against reducing the salaries of the employés, but I do protest against cutting off the monthly report and the necessary help to carry on the Department.

And then, on motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey: The petition of citizens of Hunterdon County, New Jersey, against any reduction of the tariff, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. HOPKINS: The petition of 191 business men of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for the regulation of commerce and for the prohibition of discrimination by common carriers, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. JENKS: The petition of George Hayes, for an increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LUTTRELL: Papers relating to the claim of Battelle & Evans, for beef furnished the United States Army, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. RANDALL: The petition of employés in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, for one month's additional pay upon their discharge, to the Committee on Appropriations.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 10, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WINDOM. I present the petition of a mass meeting held at Winona, Minnesota, signed by T. J. Slavin, president, and James T. Bowditch, secretary, reciting that—

Whereas Edward O'Meagher Condon, a citizen of the United States and a soldier of the late war, is now undergoing a life sentence in a British prison for a crime of which there is ample proof he never was guilty; and whereas said sentence was passed upon and conviction obtained upon the evidence of perjured witnesses; and whereas the said Edward O'Meagher Condon has for the last ten years been made the associate of the lowest order of criminals; and whereas there has never been any successful interference on the part of our Government to obtain his release: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the citizens of Winona, in mass meeting assembled, do petition Congress that such steps may be taken as shall lead to a thorough investigation into the facts of this case, and that the United States demand of England the unconditional surrender of the said Condon, or at least secure for him a fair and impartial trial as speedily as possible.

I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present a petition of workingmen of the county of Hunterdon, New Jersey, praying that Congress may leave the tariff laws undisturbed for the present, and that when any alteration is made they will take counsel of the workingmen of the country rather than of the enemies of our industries and commerce. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present a like petition of workingmen of Mercer County, New Jersey; which I move be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I present the petition of Franklin Round, late sergeant Seventh United States Infantry, and ordnance sergeant of the United States Army, praying to be allowed a pension. I will state in this connection, as the chairman of the Committee on Pensions [Mr. INGALLS] is present, that many of the facts set forth in the petition are within my personal knowledge. I served with him in Mexico. I therefore ask that my testimony be taken by the Committee on Pensions, to which committee I move the reference of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of David De Harven, of Boonville, Missouri, praying for compensation for the loss of the steamboat Alonzo Child, taken possession of by the rebel forces at Memphis, Tennessee, in May, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. I present resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, expressing the views of that body touching the postal laws. They commend the rates as they formerly existed, and say that believing them to have been of great value to the public, unless it can be plainly shown that some items which were carried under the former schedule have proved unduly burdensome to the mails, the former rates should be restored. And further, they insist that in the adjustment of rates, a distinction should be made between merchandise and merchandise samples, the former being usually of large size and bulk, limited only to four pounds, and the latter being usually quite small, and generally coming under the limit of twelve ounces. As a bill on this subject has been reported, and is before the Senate, I move that these resolutions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also 2,525 memorials signed by pensioners, largely widows, and to some extent others, remonstrating against the proposed abolition of local pension agencies and the mutation projected in the mode of paying pensions. I believe these petitions, on the suggestion of a Senator, went to the select committee of which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is chairman, a committee touching changes in the Departments. If I am right in that, I move that these memorials take that reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the memorial of Messrs. Appleton & Co., Sheldon & Co., and other leading publishers, remonstrating against the passage of the postal bill now before the Senate; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Matthew Callaghan, praying compensation for having originated and furnished to the Post-Office Department the plan now in use for the return to the writer of letters not delivered to the person addressed; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the memorial of a large number of workingmen of the county of Essex, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the proposed change or any like change in the tariff laws; and a similar memorial numerously signed by workingmen of the county of Onondaga, New York. I move the reference of these memorials to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I present a resolution agreed to by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in the following terms:

That in the opinion of this chamber it is of vital importance that the Signal Service should be established and maintained upon a permanent basis, and that such appropriation be made as may be necessary to maintain this branch of the public service at the highest point of efficiency, (the estimated appropriation asked for the coming fiscal year being about $415,000.)

I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I also present the petition of Burr S. Craft, of Norfolk, Virginia, who represents that he has lost a coin certificate for $5,000, and he prays that the Secretary of the Treasury may be authorized to issue a duplicate upon proper terms. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN presented resolutions of the New York Cotton Exchange, in favor of a permanent organization by Congress of the weather bureau of the United States Signal Service; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of D. Appleton & Co. and the leading publishers of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and other cities, praying for the establishment of a uniform rate of postage on third-class mail matter; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PADDOCK presented three petitions of citizens of the State of Nebraska, living in the vicinity of the Otoe reservation, praying that Congress pass a law providing for the sale of the whole reservation to actual settlers, and also making suitable provision for settling said Indians upon a new reservation in the Indian Territory; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MERRIMON. I present the petition of John A. Harroll, of Henderson, North Carolina, in behalf of himself and the envelope manufacturers, printers, stationers, lithographers, and over fifty thousand dealers throughout the United States, respectfully representing that the United States Government, through the Post-Office Department, has been for some years past manufacturing, selling, and printing envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and postal-cards, at or below their cost to the Government, and delivering the same through the mails to all parts of the country free of charge, at a loss to the Post-Office Department of the cost of transportation, handling, &c.; and also printing address cards on the same gratuitously for merchants and others, requiring a large and expensive clerical force to receive, copy, and transmit orders for the same at a total estimated loss to the Department for the fiscal year 1875, of $4,925,736; and assigning many reasons why their protest should receive consideration. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the petition of Thomas Boles and J. A. S. Miles, colored citizens of Cumberland County, Kentucky, school trustees, praying the passage of a law vesting in them and their successors in office the title to certain property in said county and State, to be used for school purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. COOPER presented a memorial of citizens of Memphis, Tennessee, remonstrating against the passage of the House bill establishing an additional Federal court at Jackson, Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of workingmen of Lawrence County, Ohio, and a petition of workingmen of Jackson County, Ohio, praying that the tariff laws may be left undisturbed for the present; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALLACE presented a memorial of 23 business men of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; a memorial from 523 workingmen in the county of Philadelphia; a memorial of 152 business men of Philadelphia; and a memorial of 22 business men of Pittsburgh, remonstrating against any changes in the existing tariff laws at the present time; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of 10 importers of quinine bark, and a memorial of 113 wholesale dealers in sulphate of quinine, remonstrating against placing sulphate and other salts of quinine upon the free list; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GORDON presented a memorial of Thomas E. Collier, and others, of Barton County, Georgia, praying that the present tariff be left undisturbed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of the leading publishers of school and other books in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and other cities, praying for a uniform rate of postage on third-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PRINTING OF A MEMORIAL.

Mr. OGLESBY. Some time ago the memorial of citizens of California, settlers upon certain of the lands granted to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, praying that the grant may be forfeited, said lands restored to the public domain, &c., was presented and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The committee took up the subject, passed upon it, and reported a bill which is now upon the Calendar. Parties interested in the subject-matter of the bill and memorial have desired to see the memorial. It was printed by the memorialists, and they have seen that, but they desire also to see the names, some six hundred and odd names, describing the even and odd numbered sections upon which the memorialists reside. A majority of the committee have consented that the request be made that the memorial with these names should be printed. The committee would not have made this recommendation, as it is expensive and takes time, had it not been for the desire of parties who deem themselves interested in the subject against which the memorialists memorialize. I move for the printing of the memorial with the names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the memorial being printed, with the names appended? The Chair hears no objection, and the Senate so orders.

Mr. SARGENT subsequently said: I wish to enter a motion to reconsider an order made this morning to print the names connected with the petition of certain citizens of California relating to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company's lands. I think printing the names would be a piece of extravagance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 592) referring the claim of J. Snowden & Son and Snowden & Mason to the Court of Claims, have had it under consideration and instruct me to recommend its indefinite postponement. I may state in support of this recommendation that this bill in the Forty-third Congress was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and there was an adverse report upon it. There are no additional papers in the case at all, and we report it back and recommend its indefinite postponement because we do not propose to review the action of that committee.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) in favor of John M. English, of North Carolina, have instructed me to submit a report thereon, with a bill in the nature of a substitute for the joint resolution. It is entirely in accordance with the joint resolution, but we change the frame of it with a slight amendment.

The bill (S. No. 708) for the relief of John M. English, of North Carolina, was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 435) to amend section 5546 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for imprisonment and transfer of United States prisoners, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 167) for the relief of Sarah E. Wedelstedt, of Manitowoc, Wisconsin, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Annie E. Paige, praying compensation for cotton destroyed by fire while in possession of the Government of the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of sufferers from the raid in July, 1864, upon Washington, praying for an appropriation to pay their claims, which have been audited by a board of officers approved by General Augur, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 361) to reduce the area of the military reservation of Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 532) to authorize the restoration of Nathan D. A. Sawyer to the rank of captain and assistant quartermaster in the Army, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Hans C. Peterson, of New Ulm, Brown County, Minnesota, praying compensation for property destroyed in August, 1862, by the Sioux Indians, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 709) for the relief of Hans C. Peterson.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 606) to establish the Territory of Pembina and to provide a temporary government therefor, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1692) to amend an act approved May 8, 1874, in regard to leave of absence of Army officers, to report it without amendment. I would like, as it will take but a moment, that the bill should be considered at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for imformation, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has made a suggestion which I think is a very proper one, and that is to provide that in case of emergency the Secretary of War may use his own discretion in granting leaves of absence. I do not object to that at all. I move to insert:

Subject to the power of the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to refuse such application.

The object of the bill is to provide for cases where the troops are at such a great distance that thirty days do not give them time to get home and return again.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator from Illinois to let the bill lie on the table until to-morrow. I should like to look at it.

Mr. LOGAN. I am in no hurry about it; but as it is a very small bill I thought it might as well be passed this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 688) referring the claim of John H. Russell to the accounting officers of the Treasury of the United States for adjudication and settlement, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 584) to extend the time for presenting claims for collecting, drilling, or organizing volunteers for the war of the rebellion, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 440) to repeal section 2 of an act entitled "An act for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, and to fix the rank and pay of retired officers of the Army," approved March 3, 1875, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 17) in aid of the commerce of the North Pacific coast by the construction of a canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 566) for the relief of Captain Bird L. Fletcher, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 189) placing the name of C. G. Freudenberg upon the retired list of the United States Army, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 706) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the committee appointed by the Senate to investigate the recent election in Mississippi, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment and recommend its passage, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates the sum of —— thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the expenses of the investigation into the late elections in Mississippi, authorized by a resolution of the Senate adopted March 31, 1876.

The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to fill the blank in line 3 with the word "ten;" so as to read:

That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONKLING. At the instance of a constituent, the party interested, I ask leave to introduce a bill which is accompanied by papers, to be referred to the Committee on Claims.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 710) for the relief of Obadiah B. Latham and Oliver S. Latham, of Seneca Falls, New York; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOUTWELL (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 711) for the relief the sureties of Samuel Chisholm, late postmaster at Newton, Massachusetts; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KERNAN. By the request of a party residing here, I ask leave to introduce a bill to go to the Committee on Claims. I do not know anything about the claim.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 712) for the relief of William Rutherford, of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KEY (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 713) to establish a municipal court in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 714) to aid in the construction of a military bridge across the North Platte River; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying maps and papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ENGLISH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 715) for the relief of Samuel H. Canfield, postmaster at Seymour, Connecticut; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 716) to authorize the execution of a resolution of the Osage National Council of the Osage Indians; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 717) for the relief of Nelson Taylor, of Alexandria, Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 718) to amend section 858 of the Revised Statutes relating to the rules of decision as to the competency of witnesses; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 719) to provide for the coinage of goloid-silver coin of the United States of America; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION INVESTIGATION.

Mr. BOUTWELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, That the special committee appointed by the Senate, under a resolution adopted on the 31st day of March last, to investigate the late election in Mississippi, be authorized to employ a clerk and stenographer, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony; and the expenses of said committee shall be paid upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

ABERT'S REPORT.

Mr. MERRIMON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 10,000 extra copies of the report of J. T. Abert, engineer, on the survey of a line to connect the waters of the Cape Fear and Neuse Rivers and for a connection by water between Norfolk and Cape Fear River, be printed for the use of the Senate.

OATHS TO SENATORS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to take up at this time a bill which was reported on Thursday last further to provide for the administering of oaths in the Senate, a bill which Senators know to be necessary.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 701) further to provide for the administering of oaths in the Senate was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It empowers the presiding officer, for the time being, of the Senate of the United States to administer all oaths and affirmations that are or may be required by the Constitution, or by law, to be taken by any Senator, officer of the Senate, witness, or other person, in respect of any matter within the jurisdiction of the Senate. It also empowers the Secretary of the Senate and the Chief Clerk thereof, respectively, to administer any oath or affirmation required by law, or by the rules or orders of the Senate, to be taken by any officer of the Senate, and to any witness produced before it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A bill (S. No. 309) for the relief of William L. Nance;

A bill (S. No. 326) for the relief of the widow of L. H. Rousseau, deceased, late brigadier-general and brevet major-general of the United States Army; and

A bill (S. No. 431) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Thomas, widow of General Lorenzo Thomas, late of the United States Army.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1118) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Dulaney, and the bill (H. R. No. 2655) to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 111) granting a pension to David J. Garrett;

A bill (H. R. No. 247) for the relief of James M. Coffinberry, of Cleveland, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 610) granting a pension to Seth W. Homestead;

A bill (H. R. No. 1988) for the relief of Hermann Kreismann, United States consul-general at Berlin;

A bill (H. R. No. 1118) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Dulaney;

A bill (H. R. No. 2304) granting a pension to Philip J. Shaw;

A bill (H. R. No. 2655) to amend section 1044 of the Revised Statutes relating to limitations in criminal cases; and

A bill (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States.

FRACTIONAL CURRENCY—SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department, and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The first section appropriates $163,000 to provide for engraving, printing, and other expenses of making and issuing United States notes.

The second section directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue silver coins of the United States, of the denomination of ten, twenty, twenty-five, and fifty cents, of standard value, in redemption of an equal amount of fractional currency, whether the same be now in the Treasury awaiting redemption, or whether it may be presented for redemption; and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, under regulations of the Treasury Department, to provide for such redemption and issue, by substitution, at the regular sub-treasuries and public depositories of the United States, until the whole amount of fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed.

Section 3 makes silver coins of the denomination of $1 a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $50 in any one payment, and silver coins of less denominations a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $25 in any one payment.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments. The first amendment was in section 2, line 6, to strike out the word "whether" and insert "whenever."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to amend section 3, so as to make it read as follows:

SEC. 3. That there shall be coined at the mints of the United States a silver dollar of the weight of four hundred and twelve and eight-tenths grains troy, of standard silver, the emblems, devices, and inscriptions of which shall conform to those prescribed by law for the gold and silver coins of the United States, with such modifications thereof as may be necessary to render the said dollar readily distinguishable from the trade-dollar; and in the coinage and delivery thereof, the same deviations from standard weight and fineness shall be allowed as are prescribed by law for the trade-dollar; and the said dollar herein authorized shall be a legal tender at its nominal value for any amount not exceeding $20 in any one payment except for customs-duties and interest on the public debt; and the trade-dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I was in hopes that the Senate was willing to act upon this bill without much discussion: but, as Senators desire it, it is due to the Senate that I should state in behalf of the Finance Committee the reasons for the passage of the bill and for the amendments proposed by the committee.

The first section of the bill contains simply an appropriation of $163,000 to provide for engraving and printing and other expenses of making and issuing United States notes; and it is plainly unobjectionable, unless the Committee on Appropriations desire to change the amount.

The second section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue silver coins of the United States of certain denominations in redemption of an equal amount of fractional currency, and is, in substance, the provision of the existing law, but is inserted by the House of Representatives for the purpose of making the direction of the law mandatory.

The third section of the bill, however, presents the most difficult question in political science. This section, as sent to us by the House of Representatives, provides:

That the silver coins of the United States of the denomination of $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $50 in any one payment and silver coins of the United States of denominations of less than $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $25 in any one payment.

This presents the question of the single or double standard, which has probably been the occasion of more pamphlets, books, and documents than any other question whatever in political science. As a general rule, the English authors have favored a single standard upon the gold basis; the French writers have generally favored the double standard of both gold and silver; while there are writers without number who have advocated, some the single gold standard, some the single silver standard, and very many of them the double standard. I might state the argument briefly, without going into details, in the language of a recent author, in which the arguments in favor of the single gold standard are concentrated into three.

The advocates of the gold valuation say, "There is a constant liability to fluctuations in the standards of value. It is better, therefore, that, in order to secure unity, there should be but one standard, and this standard should be gold."

* * * * * * *

The second argument brought forward by the advocates of gold valuation is, that silver is too heavy for the present purposes of commerce; that its carriage and handling are inconvenient, and that gold, being so much lighter, is more suitable. * * * The third argument or allegation is, that all civilized nations either have adopted, or show the disposition to adopt, the gold valuation.—Seyd, Metallic Currency of the United States, page 39.

Each of these positions has been answered, as it is thought, by those who advocate the double standard, or the single silver standard. To the first objection in regard to the fluctuation of the value of gold and silver, it has been answered that sometimes gold has declined in value as compared with silver; sometimes silver has declined below gold value; sometimes the variation is one way and sometimes the other, and therefore the mere fact of variation is not an objection to either silver or gold as a standard, and ought to have no weight in the argument. The two metals have kept together with remarkable nearness; and it is said with great force, it seems to me, that to adopt the gold standard alone and demonetize silver would be to deprive the poor people of the world of the money which alone measures the value of their productions and of their labor. The gold, from its nature, is not divisible into a less coin of convenient form than $2.50. The dollar gold coin in this country and the five-franc piece in France never attained any considerable circulation. Therefore gold alone is not suitable for a currency because it will not measure the daily wants of the great mass of mankind.

To the second objection, that silver is too heavy to export, it is answered that it costs no more to transport $100,000 of silver from one port or place to another than it does $100,000 of gold. This is true, as shown by the statistics all the world over. By any form of conveyance the price of transporting $100,000 of silver is precisely the same as of transporting $100,000 of gold.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Based on value and not on weight?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes. I was going to say that it is on the ground that transportation is based on value and not on weight, because it is the risk of loss that is the chief element of cost. That is the answer to the second argument.

The third allegation, that all civilized nations either have adopted or shown a general disposition to adopt the gold valuation, is denied as a matter of fact. England alone of all the great powers of the world has adopted the single gold standard. Half a dozen other countries of minor importance have adopted it. The body of the nations of the world have adopted either the double standard or the silver standard. The great mass of mankind (two-thirds of the human race) still use and do all their business upon the silver standard alone; so that there is no such weight of example among the nations of the world as gives to either standard a decisive advantage over the other.

Mr. President, I shall dismiss this controversy of the schools without going further into it, although it is a very interesting subject of study, and I could give Senators references to about a hundred volumes about it. I will dismiss it so far as the theory of the question has been discussed among political economists, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate in some detail to the existing law of the United States and also to the laws of Great Britain, France, and Germany, so that we may know precisely what the condition of the coinage of those countries is, in order that we may test by law and experience whether the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance are wise or not.

The first United States statute on the subject, which established the Mint, was passed in 1792 and is contained in volume 1 of the Statutes of the United States, page 248. I have it here before me. This act establishes the proportional value between silver and gold by declaring that one ounce of gold shall be equivalent to fifteen ounces of silver, and the coins are based on the idea that the relative value of silver to gold shall be as fifteen to one. The consequences of this error will be perceived in a moment. The alloy of our gold coin was one-twelfth alloy to eleven-twelfths fine gold, or the English standard. The alloy of silver coin was one hundred and seventy-nine parts to fourteen hundred and eighty-nine of silver, or about one-ninth. The weight of the gold coin was twenty-seven grains to a dollar, the weight of the silver coin was four hundred and sixteen grains, and either gold or silver was made a legal tender for all purposes. Thus the double standard was adopted by the people of the United States at the beginning of the Government to the fullest extent. The only debate on this bill, showing that it excited no attention, was as to whether the head of the President of the United States for the time being or the head of the Goddess of Liberty should be put upon the coin. That was the only thing they cared about. All the philosophical questions involved in the proposition, the relations of silver to gold, and whether they should both be made legal tender, do not seem to have been deemed worthy of consideration in that early Congress of the United States.

The result of this act was to demonetize gold, because one ounce of gold was worth more than fifteen ounces of silver; and then the law of currency comes in, that if a coin or currency is undervalued it flees the country. The result was that in the early period of our history gold entirely disappeared. It is a part of the history of the time and is also shown by official reports that there was substantially no gold in the United States from 1792 to 1834, simply because the gold, being undervalued, fled the country, and silver and bank-notes were the basis of all transactions. In order to counteract this effect of our coinage law Congress, in 1834, by an act to be found in the fourth volume of the Statutes at Large, reduced the weight of gold coin from twenty-seven grains to the dollar to twenty-five and eight-tenths grains of standard gold, nine-tenths fine. That is, they made one ounce of gold equal to sixteen ounces of silver. That was the substance of this change. They changed the relative value of gold and silver to each other; and subsequently, by the act of 1837, they changed the silver coins so as to conform to this standard. By the act of 1837, the alloy of gold and silver coin was one-tenth to nine-tenths fine. That is the metrical system of alloy. The weight of the silver coin was fixed at four hundred and twelve and one-half grains for a dollar. It was of less weight than the old silver dollar but was of the same value, because it was finer, having less alloy. By these two acts both silver and gold coins were of the same fineness and bore the relation to each other of one to sixteen. And the weight and fineness of gold coins thus fixed has never been changed; and all coins, both silver and gold, were a legal tender for all sums.

Here again a mistake was made that would appear to be very trivial in ordinary legislation, but it was great enough to revolutionize our metallic currency. In 1834 and 1837 Congress underestimated the value of silver; that is, one ounce of gold was not worth sixteen ounces of silver; but by law they made it so, and at once this result commenced: Gold commenced coming into the country, and silver flowing out; so that from 1834 or 1837 until 1853 silver had entirely disappeared from the currency of the United States by reason of our laws undervaluing silver as they had previously undervalued gold, the true ratio of silver to gold being between one to fifteen and one to sixteen, or one to fifteen and a half. The effect of this is stated very strikingly by Mr. Seyd, from whose book I will read an extract——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. Is there objection to continuing this bill?

Mr. HAMLIN. I should be very glad indeed to proceed with the consideration of the bill which was under consideration at the last adjournment, but I am myself aware of the necessity which attaches to the measure now before the Senate in reference to the employés of the Government, and, at the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, I think it is my duty to yield to allow this bill to proceed informally. I will not call up the unfinished business, but let it maintain its place, to be proceeded with on the conclusion of this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to get through with this bill to-day if possible. I will read from Mr. Seyd's recent work on the metallic currency of the United States in regard to the effect of the laws of 1834 and 1837:

The disappearance and exportation of the American silver coinage were caused by quite a different matter. The American silver coinage was always liable to exportation for the simple reason that it contained an undue proportion of silver.

In all countries where the double valuation prevails the relative proportion of value between gold and silver stands at one to fifteen and one-half, and the market value of silver in countries where it is not a standard give on the average the same result. In the United States alone the rate taken was one part of gold to sixteen of silver, (15.98837,) the proportion resulting from the eagle at two hundred and fifty-eight and the silver dollar at four hundred and twelve and one-half grains. The dollar therefore contained 3¼ (3.29) per cent. more silver than it ought to have contained according to its nominal value. No wonder, then, that the dollar was rapidly exported, and that no one found inducement to bring silver to the mints for coinage. And let it be understood that the supply of gold had little or nothing to do with this. Long before the discovery of gold in California, ever since 1837, has the effect of this premium on the United States silver dollar made itself manifest. In exchange for it the foreigner need not have supplied gold; other commodities served the purpose of realizing elsewhere the large profit which the United States gave to the exporter of her silver coin. Much that has been doubtful, peculiar, and unsatisfactory in the history of the United States currency between 1837 and 1850 owes its origin to this astounding mistake on the part of the Government, which must, as every one can see, have given rise to general disorganization of the currency and to disappointment in the capacity of the country to retain metallic currency. I go further, and say that it was the cause why America was obliged to make so large a use of paper money, with all its evils of unequal interests, extravagant habits, and expenditure.

It is remarkable that by the adoption of the first standard of 1792 gold at once fled the country and silver filled the channels of business, and that by the attempt to correct this error our laws overleaped the market and true relative value of these metals and established the rate of silver too low, and this drove silver out of the country and gold became the universal currency. This necessary result was deepened and strengthened by the fact that in 1850 by the discovery of gold mines in California gold came pouring into us in such floods that our silver currency entirely disappeared and its relative value increased. All the money we had was gold money, not silver money. We had no change. In some parts of the country we resorted to "shinplasters." Thus a slight error in fixing the relative value between gold and silver made two remarkable movements in these precious metals, a striking illustration of the necessity for the utmost care in dealing with all questions affecting metallic money.

In 1853 Congress undertook to correct this evil, and under the lead of Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, then chairman of the Committee on Finance, the act of 1853 was passed. I have before me a very learned report made by Mr. Hunter, in which he pointed out the evils of the then existing system and prescribed, as he thought, a remedy. Perhaps I had better read to the Senate a brief extract from Mr. Hunter's report to show that he examined the matter with great care; that he appreciated the evil to be remedied; but even he finally fell into the error of largely demonetizing silver by not reducing the silver dollar then undervalued. Mr. Hunter, on the third page of his report, says:

Indeed, it appears from a carefully compiled table appended to Mr. Ingham's report, (document No. 117, page 101,) that from 1492 to 1825 there were coined from the American mines $4,310,000,000 in silver, and only $1,890,000,000 in gold. But, in tracing the effect of this change of the relative value upon particular countries, we must not forget its operation upon the rest of the world. In thus excluding one of these metals from one country, if its property and trade were large, and in thus forcing more than its natural proportion into manufactures, we should diminish the volume of specie currency of the world below the natural supply. How this would affect mankind will be hereafter examined. But the mischief would be great indeed if all the world were to adopt but one of the precious metals as the standard of value. To adopt gold alone would diminish the specie currency more than one-half; and the reduction the other way, should silver be taken as the only standard, would be large enough to prove highly disastrous to the human race. Indeed, a reference to the history of the precious metals and the general course of human production can scarcely fail to convince us that there has been a constant tendency to appreciate their value as compared with the residue of the property of the world, and that every extraordinary increase of the supply of the precious metals of which we have any account has exercised a highly beneficial effect upon human affairs. When contracts are made by a standard which is gradually contracting, the advantages are on the side of capital as against labor, and productive energy is cramped by receiving less than a fair share of the profit of its enterprises.

It is manifest from this extract that I have read from Mr. Hunter's report, which is itself very voluminous, that the desire of Mr. Hunter and those who voted for the passage of the act of 1853 was to bring back silver into this country, so that we might have silver and gold again as the currency of the country, and the measure they adopted was intended to produce that effect. What was it? By the act of 1853 no change was made in gold coin or in the silver dollar. It was left demonetized by being rated at less that its market value. The act provided, however, for subsidiary silver coin; the half dollar, the quarter dollar, the dime, and the half dime. It prescribed the weight of the coin at three hundred and eighty-four grains to the dollar, instead of four hundred and twelve and a half grains. It made the subsidiary coin a legal tender for $5, and all other coins were left a legal tender without limit. This act, as I stated, provided for a subsidiary coinage worth about 6 per cent. less than the par of specie, assuming the par to be at the rate of sixteen to one. The subsidiary coin was only made a legal tender to the amount of $5, leaving the silver dollar still in force a full legal tender for all contracts.

The effect of this act of 1853 was to bring back to us silver change in abundance as a token coin. There was issued between 1853 and 1861 about $48,000,000 of silver coin. It was the change of the country, and to that extent silver was monetized again and in daily use; but the dollar was still undervalued and has never entered into circulation from 1853 to this time. Except for special purposes, the silver dollar of the United States disappeared from among the coins of the world for the palpable reason that it was more valuable to export than to coin.

Mr. MAXEY. I will ask the Senator from Ohio if the dollar established as the unit of value shortly after the adoption of the Constitution was left of the same weight and fineness in 1853 that it was originally established? The old Spanish milled dollar, in other words, was the unit of value originally; and was it not left so?

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall answer my friend from Texas with great pleasure. The silver dollar of the United States has never been changed in intrinsic value; the change has been in the gold dollar. But as Senators see that this is a technical question and I have to be precise in facts, I ask that they will not cross-examine me until I get through. Then I will answer all questions.

The effect of the law of 1853 was practically to demonetize the silver dollar to provide a subsidiary coin for circulation, and to give employment to about $48,000,000 of silver for the change of the country. So the laws of the United States as to our coins continued until February, 1873, when Congress passed an act to revise and consolidate all the statutes in regard to coinage. This act is embodied in the Revised Statutes. The changes made by this act are very slight. No change is made in the gold coin; it is still twenty-five and eight-tenths grains of standard gold to the dollar. The subsidiary silver coins were to weigh twenty-five grams to the dollar. That raised the value of the silver coins from three hundred and eighty-four grains to twenty-five grams or three hundred and eighty-five and eighty one-hundredths grains, so that it very slightly raised the amount of silver in the subsidiary coins in order to harmonize with the French coins; so that now $1 of our subsidiary money is precisely of the same weight and fineness as five francs of the French coin, and our silver coin is now easily convertible into French or Latin unit coins. The old silver dollar was dropped out in the revision, and why? Simply because it was not in use. No law repealed the silver dollar; it was simply dropped out—there was no such coin in use. It could not circulate because in 1872 and 1873 the silver dollar was worth more than the gold dollar. As it had not been coined for twenty years it was dropped out from among the coins of the United States. As a matter of course this does not prevent us restoring it at any time when we think it is for the public interest to do so.

But the most striking change made by the act of 1873 was the introduction of a new dollar called the trade-dollar. Senators here mostly understand the reason why that trade-dollar was provided for. Silver was beginning to be affected by the events that I shall allude to presently. There was a great demand for silver in China, however; and the Mexican pillar dollar for a good reason had gotten into the markets of China, and was the most desirable coin, because it was worth a little more than the dollar of the United States and more than the dollar of any other country. Therefore in China they would not take anything but the Mexican pillar dollar. There they measure small differences much more carefully than we do. In order to induce the Chinese to take our dollar instead of the Mexican milled dollar, so that we might give to our people a chance to export their silver in the form of coin, we authorized the holders of bullion to present their bullion at the mints of the United States to be coined into trade-dollars containing four hundred and twenty grains of standard silver. The old dollar only contained four hundred and twelve and a half grains; so that the trade-dollar contained seven and a half grains more of silver, and that made it a little more valuable than the Mexican dollar, which contained four hundred and sixteen grains of silver with a little less alloy than ours. The trade-dollar has a shade more value than any other dollar, and at once superseded the Mexican silver dollar in China, where they measure silver coins with the greatest accuracy. The result was that the Government of the United States, by coining at the expense of the holders of this bullion trade-dollars, have introduced into the commerce of the world a new money, which is now being absorbed largely in Japan and China and all Asiatic nations. This is done, not at the expense of the United States, but at the expense of the holders of the bullion, who pay the cost under the law of 1873.

I have stated, I believe, all the laws of the United States without exception which affect the value either of gold or silver coins. There have not been many of them. Our coinage laws have been very uniform, very stable; no changes have been made except for an obvious purpose. The law of 1792 stood on our statute-books unchanged until 1834, and then was only modified so far as the gold coins were concerned; and the law remained unchanged from that time until 1853, and was then only modified so as to introduce subsidiary coinage; and it remained then until 1873, when it was only changed so as to introduce the trade-dollar.

Those are all the changes, so that the silver dollar of our revolutionary fathers is the silver dollar of to-day if we choose to restore it. The trade-dollar has been introduced simply as a commercial dollar. Here is the difficulty in which we are placed: by the sudden fall of silver the trade-dollar, instead of being worth more than gold, is worth less than gold; and yet by the act of 1873 the trade-dollar was made a legal tender. The result is that a dollar less valuable than gold is made a legal tender for the payment of gold contracts to a limited amount. But that is not the worst of it. We could bear that very well; but the worst of it is that by the act of 1873 any holder of silver bullion can convert his bullion, at the mere cost of minting, into dollars; and then the law steps in and makes them a legal tender for gold values, to the extent of $5, for customs dues and the like. Thus the Government of the United States allows private individuals to regulate the amount of our coinage by giving every holder of bullion the opportunity to convert his bullion, which is worth 7 per cent. less than par, into par and make it a legal tender to the extent of $5. It is perfectly manifest to every man who will examine this matter that we have got to do one of two things: either take away from the trade-dollar its legal-tender quality or take away the right of the holder of bullion to make the trade-dollar. We must do one or the other.

The simplest thing to do is to repeal the section authorizing the issue of the trade-dollar. But then come these gentlemen from California and Nevada and say, "We have built up a trade on this; it is a convenient form of exporting our bullion; we do not ask you to pay the expense, however. We pay that ourselves. Why should you step in now and destroy that which we have built up?" And there is no answer to it. Therefore I think it is well to keep the trade-dollar as it stands, to enable the people of this country to convert their silver bullion into the best form for commercial purposes, but to take away from it its legal-tender quality, and then no silver coin can be issued except by the United States and the profit and the benefit inure to the United States; and, more than all, the amount is regulated by the United States. It is manifest that if the trade-dollar is to continue and silver is still to stand depreciated, with the right of any holder of silver bullion to convert it into trade-dollars, the country will be overwhelmed with money that is not par in gold.

I hope, therefore, Senators will see that, so far as the trade-dollar is concerned, while we do not wish to interfere with its usefulness and its value, we must take away from it that attribute which was not intended to be given to it when the law was passed which changes its character from a commercial dollar to a forced legal-tender token coinage. We must, therefore, restore the trade-dollar to what it was intended to be, purely a commercial agent.

Mr. President, I have now stated all I desire to state about the laws of the United States. But this question is affected by the laws of all other countries with whom we have dealings. The question of coinage is an international question. It is not enough for us to stop with seeing what our own laws are and deciding how far we shall change them, but we must see what the laws of other countries are, or otherwise we may be in the same position that Congress was in 1853 and in 1837 and in 1792, when by making a mistake in the relative value of gold and silver they drove out of circulation, contrary to their intention, first gold and then silver.

Great Britain is generally supposed to be at the head of the nations that have adopted what is called the single standard of gold. In England anybody may carry gold bullion of any kind or in any form to the mint and there have it coined into sovereigns of certain weight and fineness, without charge at all. They have some refining-charges, but they make no charge for coinage. The same right is conferred upon the owner of silver bullion, with this qualification, and it is a very important one: a man may take a pound troy of silver bullion of a certain standard, or of what will make a pound troy of silver bullion of a certain standard of fineness, and Great Britain engages to convert that into sixty-six shillings; and then it pays him sixty-two for it. It retains the other four for its own use as a seigniorage. It issues sixty-two shillings of the proper fineness for sixty-six shillings' worth of bullion, levying the four shillings for its seigniorage.

Mr. BOGY. That makes the alloy.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; the shillings issued are of the standard fineness. The result of that is that every English shilling is worth less than bullion in intrinsic value, but by being made a legal tender for small amounts and limited in amounts it is equal in money value to gold coin. It is used as what is called a "token" coinage. The weight of the shilling is eighty-seven and one-fourth grains. Four shillings are equal to three hundred and forty-nine grains of standard silver. The alloy of standard silver there is eighteen two hundred and twenty-seconds or seventy-five one-thousandths. Their silver coin is finer than ours, but it is not so valuable, our alloy being one-tenth, but containing more grains to the dollar. The value of the English silver shilling in our money is twenty-one cents and four mills. The value of the gold shilling is twenty-four and thirty-three one-hundredths cents, or twenty shillings passes for a sovereign worth $4.866. The difference between the English shilling and our quarter dollar is in favor of ours. Our coin is more valuable than theirs. Our silver coin has always been more valuable than theirs since 1816. And yet, notwithstanding that Great Britain has thus debased its coinage, four shillings to sixty-six, they keep in circulation of this token coinage in a country of 32,000,000 people from eleven to fifteen million pounds sterling on an average, over $60,000,000. Though everybody knows it is intrinsically worth 6 or 7 per cent. less than gold, yet from the fact that they carefully limit the amount and regulate its issue it is maintained in circulation, and is the coin by which nearly all the labor of England is paid. It is a legal tender to the extent of forty shillings and no more. Nor is it necessary, in order to maintain this large amount in circulation, to have it a legal tender for any greater sum, because, the Government having the exclusive power to issue it, they only issue so much as the demand calls for at par with gold. It is a token coinage. Such is the law of Great Britain.

In Canada, where there are 4,000,000 people, their twenty-five cent piece is worth a little less than ours. It is very much like the English coin, but a little less valuable than ours. I estimate it at six one-thousandths of a grain less than ours. As a matter of course our silver coin will pass between this country and Canada from hand to hand when we get to specie payments. Our subsidiary silver coin will go all over Canada. It is worth a little more than the Canadian money, and I have no doubt it will fill the channels of business in Canada.

This brings me to the statement of the silver coinage of France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy, composing 72,000,000 of among the most intelligent people in the world. Their money is based mainly on the French standard of 1792, and it is regulated by the convention of December 23, 1865, which I have here before me. It is, probably, the most important monetary convention now in force in the world. I will cite some of the provisions of it. The weight is five grams per franc, so that they have a simple metrical unit of weight. For five francs it is twenty-five grams, and that is precisely the weight of our two half dollars or four quarters. The fineness is nine-tenths, precisely like our own coin. The limit of amount is fixed at six francs, or $1.20 per inhabitant. In Great Britain they have no enforced limit, because it being entirely in the hands of the government the director of the mint controls it according to supply and demand. But in this convention they have provided that neither of the nations shall issue more than six francs per inhabitant. But that makes an enormous sum. The limit of $1.20 per inhabitant would give to Belgium 32,000,000 francs; France, 239,000,000; Italy, 141,000,000; Switzerland, 17,000,000; in all 429,000,000 francs, or about $82,000,000 or $83,000,000. And this, remember, is subsidiary coin. Each nation has its standard of silver besides, which it maintains at the relation to gold of fifteen and one-half to one. The five-franc piece in France is precisely like our dollar was in 1853 and up to 1873—a legal tender for all sums. The same law applied to us would make a circulation of about $50,000,000, except that our country being more scattered it is generally supposed by those who have studied the subject that we can now maintain a circulation of subsidiary coin of seventy or eighty million dollars with our present population.

The legal tender among private individuals under this convention is fifty francs, or $10. It will be seen that wherever silver is used in modern nations, the limit of legal tender is carefully preserved as the only way of preventing the depreciation and exportation of one or the other of the coins. Among private individuals it is limited to fifty francs, or $10; among the contracting states to one hundred francs; that is, each of the contracting states agree to receive it at their treasuries for one hundred francs. The old coinage is redeemed in the gold and silver of that standard. Such is the conventional law which I have before me, which regulates now the monetary transactions of 72,000,000 people. There is no doubt whatever, that in 1867, when the Paris monetary conference was held, if Germany had consented, this conventional law would have been agreed to as an international law, and would have been made the basis of the entire commerce of the world. I was present at that monetary convention, and then it was the general sentiment of the nations represented that gold should be the unit of values; and after that, by providing for subsidiary silver coinage and maintaining it at its relative value fixed by this convention of fifteen and a half to one, there would have been no difficulty in maintaining that relative value. What defeated that convention was the pride of the English in the pound sterling, and the refusal of the German nation, then not united as now, to surrender the silver standard, which was then their sole standard of value; and so the effort for an international money failed. But the monetary convention of the Latin states, which was the work of purely scientific men, has proved a success. One of the provisions of the convention authorized any nation whatever to join it, with all the advantages conferred by that convention; so that it is open to all the world. It was not more successful only for the reasons that I have given. In this convention the legal relation between gold and silver is fixed at fifteen and one-half to one.

Now I come to what is called the German law; and I think there is a great deal of misapprehension not only in the newspapers and among the intelligent people, but among the mass of our people, in regard to the recent action of Germany. I have the German statute here, which I have taken the pains to have translated, not being able to read it in the original vernacular.

In Germany formerly silver was alone the standard of value. They had but little gold. I remember very well in 1867, in traveling in Germany, that we relied entirely upon the English sovereign and the French twenty-franc piece to pay expenses in Prussia because the German coinage was abominable, composed of pfennigs and a confusing variety of coin. There were many states or nations in Germany; they could not unitize; they could not agree. They had the silver thaler, which was the standard of value, but there was no gold in Germany that I saw except the French napoleon and the English pound sterling. But when Germany became a great power as the result of the recent war, the German Reichsrath, on the 4th of December, 1871, provided for gold coins and established a mark, worth twenty-three and eight-tenths cents, as the unit of value. That is the unit not only of silver but of gold. The ten-mark piece of gold is worth $2.38 of our money, and so it goes on in multiples. That act of December 4, 1871, only related to gold coins and provided a unit, but did not demonetize or affect in the slightest degree the silver coinage of Germany, which then amounted, according to some estimates, to four or five hundred million dollars. By the act of July 9, 1873, which I have before me, Germany undertook to change her standard from a single silver standard to the double standard of silver and gold. The common impression now is that Germany has adopted the single gold standard and demonetized its silver. On the contrary, the change in Germany is simply from the single silver standard to the double standard of gold and silver. I have the translation furnished me by an employé of the library—and I suppose it is correct—of the statute of the Reichsrath:

Article 2 provides that in addition to the gold coins created by act of December 4, 1871, there shall be coined also silver coins.

Article 3 provides for pieces of 5 marks, 2 marks, 1 mark; of 50 pfennigs, and of 20 pfennigs; nickel and copper.

The coinage shall be regulated by the following decisions:

One pound of fine silver shall be coined into 20 pieces of 5 marks, 50 pieces of 2 marks, 100 pieces of 1 mark, 200 pieces of 50 pfennigs, and 500 pieces of 20 pfennigs.

The alloy consists of 900 parts of silver and 100 parts of copper, 90 marks weighing one pound.

The process of coinage shall be decided by the Bundesrath. The deviation from the standard shall not exceed in single coins .003 in fineness, and not more than .001 in weight, with the exception of the 20-pfennig coins; the normal weight, however, must be preserved in the bulk.

Article 4 provides that the total amount of silver shall, until further orders, not exceed 10 marks per head of the population.

This is the important provision of this law by which a larger silver coinage is authorized in Germany than is found anywhere else in Europe, because while 6 francs is the limit in France, while our limit has practically been only about $1.25, having only issued $48,000,000 of this coin, and while in England the amount has been limited to about $2 per inhabitant, in Germany the amount of silver provided for by this law is 10 marks per inhabitant, or $2.38, making for 40,000,000 of people at least $100,000,000 of silver coin; and, as I will show, they have already issued nearly two-thirds of that amount.

Mr. MAXEY. Have they limited their silver as legal tender?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will read that:

After every new issue of coins an equal quantity of the old circulating silver coins shall be drawn in, beginning with the coin under the thirty-thaler foot standard. The value to be determined in the way explained in article 14, section 2.

ART. 7. The coinage and redemption is done at government expense.

ART. 9. Nobody is obliged to receive more than 20 marks in silver or more than 1 mark in copper.

The Reichs and the Landes cassa (government banks) shall receive silver to any amount as legal tender.

That is, all the government banks are bound to take silver as legal tender for all transactions.

The Bundesrath will designate the banks which shall exchange amounts of not less than two hundred silver marks for gold coin.

The government undertaking to supply the banks with the necessary money to redeem and the banks undertaking to redeem all this money at its par rate, so that is practically a legal tender.

ART. 10. Silver coins which have lost considerable weight by circulation shall be received in Reichs and Landes cassa; they must be, however, drawn in at the cost of the empire.

ART. 14, SEC. 2. In reducing the value of other coin, not gold, the value of the thaler is three marks, the gulden süddent: währing one and five-sevenths marks, the mark of Hamburg one and one-fifth marks.

The important bearing of these provisions of the law will be seen when I come to look at what has actually been done in Germany and has so disturbed the monetary values of the whole world. The amount of silver coin outstanding in Germany has been estimated by various authorities, and was estimated by the government of Germany at $340,000,000; but it is shown now while they are changing currency from one form to another the amount was underestimated, so that the amount of silver in circulation in Germany alone in 1873 when this act passed was probably $400,000,000. The one and two thaler pieces which were the common circulation of Germany are still a legal tender for all amounts, and are received by the government at par in gold. The great body of them is still outstanding. A recent writer in the London Economist says:

As regards the bearing of this arrangement on the requirements for gold in our market, the leading facts are, first, that the one and two thaler pieces coined were estimated by the German government in introducing the coinage law of 1873, to amount to 459,000,000 thalers, equal to about $340,000,000, or £68,000,000, of which the two-thaler pieces represent 65,000,000 thalers, or £9,750,000, and the one-thaler pieces, 394,000,000 thalers, or £59,000,000; second, that according to the estimates of writers like Herr Soetbeer and others, at least three-fifths of this silver coinage is still in circulation—that is, $180,000,000, about £36,000,000 in all, of which £5,850,000 would be in two-thaler pieces and the remainder, or about £30,000,000, in one-thaler pieces.

That is, there is still outstanding $180,000,000 of the old silver coins of Germany, besides the amount that has been issued of new coin. I have here also a statement taken from the London Economist of a late date, March 25, 1876, of the amount of new coins issued by Germany:

On the 11th of March all the newly-coined money in Germany amounted to:
In gold pieces, 1,356,141,220 marks—

Or about $300,000,000 in gold coin.

In silver pieces, 193,118,226.

Or about $50,000,000 of new silver coins have been issued, besides having outstanding, as I have shown, $180,000,000 of old silver coins, which are now a legal tender for all purposes. The enormous effect of this law in Germany, and as a consequence the partial demonetizing of silver coins, I suppose is felt by every man, woman, and child who buys or sells anything. I suppose there is no act of any parliament that has had so wide-reaching effects as this act of the German Parliament. The amount of coin in the world is estimated by Mr. Seyd and other technical writers at $3,200,000,000 silver and $3,500,000,000 in gold. That does not include plate, jewelry, or silver in the form of merchandise, but that in the form of coin. So the effect of the act of Germany, aided no doubt somewhat by the large supply of silver by our mines, has been to reduce the purchasing power of the whole of this enormous sum of thirty-two hundred millions of silver fully 10 per cent. The fall of the silver trade-dollar in this country has been from 103 to 91. This effect extended itself to what is called the Latin league, who feared that German silver would be rushed into Italy, France, and the nations of the league for coinage purposes, and they interfered at once and stopped the coinage of silver. It also created an impression in India; so that, for the first time for two hundred years, the current flow of silver into China and India was arrested but for a short time. It is one of the remarkable currents of trade in the history of mankind that with the amount of silver that has been coined out of the mines of the world the great body of it flows in an unceasing and continuous stream into these oriental nations; and only for three or four months a feeling of alarm was created in India and China lest that which they cherish as the measure of all their values should become valueless to them. It created a partial panic, but that panic has passed, and now the stream goes on; silver flows into India and China and all the Asiatic nations as heretofore.

That was not the worst of it. It at once begot a struggle for the possession of gold between all the great nations of the world, because everybody could see that if you demonetized $3,200,000,000 of silver coin and made $3,500,000,000 of gold coin the sole standard of all the transactions of the world, commencing with the great nations of Europe, then extending to the smaller until it reach the Asiatic countries, it would enormously add to the value of gold, and therefore it was that the Bank of France, the Bank of England, and the Imperial Bank of Germany at once commenced grasping for gold in whatever form. Therefore what we have observed recently is not so much a fall of silver as it is a rise of gold, the inevitable effect of a fear of demonetizing the whole mass of this silver; and now the Bank of France has in its vaults the enormous amount of $300,000,000 of gold in coin and bullion; England has in the Bank of England $170,000,000, and the Imperial Bank of Germany has $125,000,000. So, in these three depositories there is over $600,000,000 of gold, or nearly one-fifth of the supply of the world. This accumulation of gold has been produced largely, first, by the partial demonetization of silver in Germany, the endeavor of the Imperial Bank of Germany to accumulate gold, and the effort made by the Bank of France to meet that current, and then by the Bank of England, until these three great banks, three spots on the face of the world, contain nearly one-fifth of all the gold that has been coined from time immemorial and that now exists in the world.

Mr. President, the effect of the movement in Germany has already reacted in a wonderful manner. A recent order in Germany has suspended the conversion of the thaler and monetized it. I have not that order, but I have here a recent French pamphlet, a very incisive one and a very well-written one, which speaks of the recent action of Germany thus:

It is scarcely necessary to point out the gigantic losses Germany would, before causing this disastrous crisis, entail upon herself should she continue to offer heavy sums of silver and to demand heavy sums of gold. The silver so offered would be more and more depreciated, and the price of gold would rise in a converse ratio, entailing a loss of millions to the German treasury.

The ministry of the Empire have foreseen these difficulties. To meet them they inserted in the decree-ruling that from January 1, 1876, all payments shall be made neither in florins nor thalers, but exclusively in marks, a restrictive clause to maintain in circulation the thalers, which are to be counted as gold and to be each held as equivalent to three marks.

Since demonetization has begun, silver which is constantly offered to foreign markets goes on falling in price, while at home the value of the thaler, this coin being a legal tender under the restrictive clause above mentioned and appraised at three golden marks, is not depreciated. Bankers, therefore, when they have payments to make abroad, are careful not to transmit thalers. They send gold marks, reserving their thalers for home payments. Government buys back the gold in foreign markets and the bankers go on exporting it. The treasury thus undertakes to weave a Penelope's web without any Ulysses in the distance. Already 20,000,000 marks have been sent abroad, the sixth part of all that has been coined. To sum up, Germany has judged it prudent not to demonetize rapidly, while the success of a slow demonetization appears highly doubtful.

I do not believe that this process will go any further than it has already gone. It is now arrested. Besides that, an agitation in Great Britain and France already has arisen for the establishment of a bimetallic currency. Even Great Britain, that since 1816 has maintained the system of a single-unit and a token-coinage, is now discussing the question whether it will not be necessary for them in self-defense, especially for their India commerce, to restore, to some degree at least, the double standard. In France they have already provided that when specie payments are resumed they shall be resumed upon the double standard of fifteen and a half to one, which is now the legal relation of silver to gold in France; and when specie payments are fully entered into, as they very soon will be, and probably can be now, the old law of the monetary conference will be enforced in France and all the Latin countries. Besides that, Asia again is absorbing rapidly the silver of the world, and the forced demonetization of silver will be counteracted. It is used now by two-thirds of mankind as the sole standard of value. It is used by all nations as a token-coinage to a very large extent, as I have already shown. It will soon be used to the extent of forty or fifty million dollars in the United States of America. We now have nearly $20,000,000 to pay out, and can coin it at the rate of $2,000,000 a month; so that we shall ourselves, in the execution of our law and of this law among others, use a large amount of silver, probably not less than sixty or seventy million dollars. The absolute necessity of smaller coins will always maintain more or less of silver and make it absolutely necessary. The utter ruin that would come to mankind, especially to the poorer nations, by the entire demonetization of silver cannot be estimated by us. Take one-half of the solid money of the world out of existence; take the sole standard of more than two-thirds of the human race, reduce it to a base metal, and the effect upon the commerce of the world would be incalculable. It cannot be done; it will not be done. There is no danger of it. These two metals, gold and silver, have traveled side by side from the beginning of time; the records of human history do not go back beyond it. They have varied, sometimes one and sometimes the other higher; but they have gone on, gold the money of the rich, silver the money of the poor, the one to measure acquired wealth, the other to measure the daily necessities of life; and, sir, no act of parliament, although it may disturb for a moment the relation of these two metals to each other, nothing but an act of God, can destroy the use of both these metals among the nations of mankind. I will add some statistics from Dr. Soetbeer, published in Germany, of the proportionate values of gold and silver at different dates and epochs:

Some interesting notes have been published lately in Germany by Dr. Soetbeer on the variations in the proportionate values of gold and silver at different dates and epochs. In ancient times the relative value of gold to silver was about one to thirteen and one-third, and toward the end of the old Roman Empire of the West it rose to about one to fourteen and one-half. In the Middle Ages and down to the fifteenth century the standard was about sixteen of silver to one of gold; but after the discovery of America the value of gold fell rapidly, until the proportion stood at ten and one-half to eleven of silver to one of gold, which relation was maintained with but little fluctuation during the sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth century. After that date gold began to rise again in value, and by the end of the seventeenth century the proportion had become one to fifteen. The standard of comparative value fluctuated backward and forward at about that figure during the eighteenth century, and at the close silver was about fifteen and one-half.

Up to 1850 silver had never fallen so low as sixteen, while from 1850 to 1852, owing chiefly to French coinage operations and the absorption of silver for the double standard in that country, the price of that metal tended to advance slightly. It was never higher than fifteen, but still it was considerably less than fifteen and one-half. After 1859 the course of the price of silver tended downward by almost imperceptible steps; but it was not until 1873 that the price began to be decidedly low; it then fell to sixteen and eight one-hundredths in relation to gold, and by the end of 1875 had touched in London sixteen and eighty one-hundredths, or fifty-seven and eleven-sixteenths pence in London.

Perhaps I am wearying the Senate by these details; but it seems to be necessary in the condition of the information on the subject that I should state them. There are certain general conclusions which I draw from a reference to these statutes in various countries which I will briefly state.

First. It is impossible in the nature of things to fix the precise value of silver and gold. We have tried it three times and failed.

Second. Whenever either coin is worth more in the market than the rate fixed by the law, it flees from the country. That we have twice proved. That is the admitted economic law. It is the Gresham law—a law of currency named from the name of its discoverer. He wrote a book to show that always the poorer currency would drive out of circulation a superior currency; and his book gave name to the theory that is called the law of Gresham. It is the universal law of political economy: that, whenever two metals or two moneys are in circulation, the least valuable will drive out the most valuable; the latter will be exported.

The third proposition is that the example of several great European nations as well as of the United States proves that to prevent the depreciation of silver the tendency of modern nations is to issue it as a token coinage somewhat less in intrinsic value than gold, and maintain its value by issuing it only as needed, at par with the prevailing currency, and to make it a limited legal tender. I may say that has been acted upon by every great Christian nation. Russia and Austria have not yet gold coinage at all, but still they have their values based upon gold.

Fourth. That the demonetizing of silver tends to add to the value of gold, and that though its relative value ebbs and flows it is more stable compared to gold than any other metal, grain, or production. Its limit of variation for a century is between fifteen to seventeen for one in gold.

Fifth. That both coins are indispensable, one for small and the other for large transactions.

Sixth. That the causes of its decline are temporary. It is still used by a great majority of mankind as the standard of value. Its use in France and the United States will on resumption more than counteract its decline in Germany.

Seventh. The general monetizing of silver now, when it is unnaturally depreciated, would be to invite to our country, in exchange for gold or bonds, all the silver of Europe, and at last it would leave us with a depreciated currency.

Eighth. The decline of silver enables us now to exchange silver coin of the old standard for fractional currency, leaving the exchange optional with the holder, until we have the courage, as we now have the ability, to redeem it in gold.

Ninth. More silver can be maintained at par than we have now of fractional currency.

Tenth. The redemption of a part of our currency would advance its purchasing power, while the silver in circulation will counteract the contraction of the currency.

Whenever we have heretofore proposed any measure that looks to the redemption of our United States notes—and I cannot but regard our failure to provide for them now, twelve years after the war, as a disgrace to American civilization—when we seek to advance United States notes, it is said that we contract the currency and affect prices and a derangement of values. Here we can pay out solid money, good money, money of the Revolution, money unchanged in value from the time of the Revolution to this hour, for the redemption of our United States notes without loss, without contraction; and surely we cannot refuse to do it. If we pay out the silver it enters into circulation and it takes the place of United States notes; and why should we refuse to the holder of the United States notes the right to demand that of us which is now no more valuable than the note itself? It is sometimes said that nobody wants the silver dollar. Try the people and see if they do not want it. If they do not want it, then no harm is done. I would not make any man take it. I would not make any man who holds a greenback note payable in gold take the dollar in silver, because I would tell him beforehand the greenback some time probably in the future will be much more valuable than the dollar he gets; but that is no reason why we should not give him the dollar if he wants it, and there can be no reason why we should not.

Now, Mr. President, that brings me, and very briefly, to the provisions of this bill. It will be perceived that the Committee on Finance took the House bill as far as possible without alteration. With deference to the House we made no change in the first and second sections, and if the House had not put in the third section, I for one would not have desired to change the bill as it was sent to us at all. But they presented to us this difficult question of the double and single standard, and we were forced to consider it. I have no doubt, perhaps—I betray no secret when I say that the Committee on Finance would have been glad to have laid this question aside and considered it more fully; but it was presented to us in the bill, and therefore we had to deal with it, I may say forcibly, against our will. As it was before us, we could not get rid of it in any other way, and we cannot now unless the Senate should see proper to strike out the third section and risk a controversy with the House, which would probably produce longer delay. Therefore we undertook to amend the third section so as to avoid the objections to it.

The first provision I wish to call the attention of the Senate to is that our amendments make no enlargement of the legal-tender quality of subsidiary coin. We have left the subsidiary coin precisely where it was under the old law, unchanged, and it is clear that it should be unchanged. To make the subsidiary coin a legal tender for $25 would utterly destroy our customs revenue, would raise the question of the payment of the interest on the public debt in the subsidiary coin, would evidently impair the public credit, and would be wrong in every sense of the word. Besides that, it would be a departure from the example given to us by other intelligent nations that have acted upon every one of these questions.

The House of Representatives proposed a legal tender of $25. We left it where it was, at $5, and I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury showing in the most conclusive manner the evil results that would flow from the enlargement of the legal tender of subsidiary coins and its effect on the revenue. I will not have it read, but may hand it to the reporter to be embodied in my remarks, so that Senators may have the benefit of reading it if they desire.

As to how much of it can be kept at par, I have already stated that, in my judgment, from fifty to sixty or seventy millions can be kept at par.

But the vital question presented by the amendments of the committee is the restoration of the silver dollar. Why restore the silver dollar when it is now so depreciated by the events that I have named? Well, sir, the answer is that we have a large amount, some $400,000,000 of United States notes, which now are a legal tender for all purposes, and the time has arrived when we can redeem all these United States notes with the old dollar of the United States. We do not create a dollar; we simply provide for the issuing of the dollar. The law was, as I have shown you, up to 1873, that this old dollar could be tendered for the payment of all debts; but it was simply not coined because the silver dollar was worth more than the gold dollar. Does that prevent us from coining it? Not in the least. I will read you a short extract from Seyd on the very subject I am now speaking of, the importance of the American dollar in the commerce of the world; and as he expresses it much better than I can, I think Senators will be better pleased to hear his statement:

What, indeed, could America risk in adopting silver again as a coadjutor to gold? What, considering the actual state of the question in the world, namely, that the majority of the nations adhere to the double or the silver valuation, does she not lose now in endeavoring to follow the footsteps of England? Would America do wrong in following the example of France, which maintains the five-francs silver piece? Germany is obliged to adopt the double valuation; is the example a pernicious one?

I think not; I think that America, by deciding in favor of the double valuation, would not only save the world at large from an abyss, and prevent the accomplishment of a stupid general crime, whose authors humanity would some day learn to curse, but that she would advance her own material interests more than may be supposed possible, and that she may perchance take the lead in the intelligent and prudent organization of firm monetary systems.

The state of the whole question in the United States favors the re-introduction of the silver dollar. It has not been abolished by law, consequently no legal enactment for its re-establishment and legal-tender rights is required. All that is necessary is an act of Congress fixing the weight of the silver dollar at four hundred grains (399.9) of nine hundred fine, reducing its present weight by twelve and one-half grains.—Seyd's Metallic Currency of the United States, pages 56, 57.

This is the opinion of Mr. Seyd, an English writer, who is perfectly familiar with the whole subject, and who has lived in this country the most of his life.

There was one question of detail that came before the Committee on Finance, upon which there was some difference of opinion: what should be the dollar; what should be the weight of the dollar? Should we take the gold value now of silver and make a new relative standard; or should we take the French ratio of fifteen and a half to one; or should we take the old ratio of fifteen to one; or should we take the American dollar as it has stood from the foundation of the Government to this time? It seems there was a mistake; I do not know how to explain it. The old dollar was intended to be sixteen to one; but we know very well, if our arithmetics do not deceive us, that sixteen and a half multiplied by twenty-five and eight-tenths grains will make four hundred and twelve and eight-tenths; and therefore it was an error in some way by somebody to make the old dollar weigh only four hundred and twelve and a half grains. It was not very material for it was a very small fraction; but still the committee thought it was better to take the exact standard fixed by law, sixteen to one, and make the new silver dollar weigh exactly sixteen times the weight of one dollar of gold. The gold dollar is twenty-five and eight-tenths grains, and the silver coin we have provided for is four hundred and twelve and eight-tenths instead of four hundred and twelve and a half grains. I make this explanation because a New York paper says the Committee on Finance did not know what the old dollar was; that the old dollar was four hundred and twelve and a half grains, and we have made it four hundred and twelve and eight-tenths, because we did not know better. I give the editor my respects, and state that we did it for a reason. The author, Mr. Seyd, that I have read, recommends, on the contrary, that we should adopt the French standard. I am not sure but that it would be a very good thing to do if we were treating the question apart from all old customs and habits. If it were a new question, I should say at once adopt the French standard, and make the dollar four hundred grains. That would be exactly fifteen and a half to one. But I would not do that. I would not debase and degrade the dollar below its old standard merely for the purpose of assimilating it with the metric system of the French. I think, therefore, the old dollar is the best dollar.

It has been also proposed to make the dollar to be issued equal to two half dollars of the subsidiary coin. That would be only three hundred eighty-five and eight-tenths grains; that would be to debase the coin. I have no doubt that if this dollar is now restored to its old standard, in all human probability the fluctuations that have gone on in one way against silver will after a while turn in favor of silver, and the dollar may come to the par of gold. It has been done in the past; it was done when it was provided for. Whether that be so or not, I would not force anybody to take this silver dollar who does not desire to take it. If anybody desires to surrender a note of ours past due, payable in gold when paid, for a silver dollar, because he is tired of waiting so long for payment, give him the silver dollar; but I would not force him to take it, because the time will come when these notes of ours I think will be worth dollar for dollar in gold. If a man prefers, rather than wait the uncertain time in the future, to take a dollar in silver, give him the opportunity to do it.

The question is to what extent should it be made a legal tender. The House provided that it should be made a legal tender for $50. There are serious objections to making silver a legal tender for $50. I would prefer to leave it at $10; but the House proposition made it a legal tender for customs duties and interest on the public debt. That would plainly be a bad proposition. It would drive gold out of the country. If the silver dollar now, with its depreciated value, is made a legal tender for $50, you will have no gold whatever except in the mints and sub-treasuries of the United States. Our experience has shown that fully; and therefore the only way to maintain our silver coin at par in currency is to limit the amount either by the law of demand and supply or by the demand for silver coin in exchange for fractional currency and United States notes. That will at least keep United States notes and fractional currency always up to the par of silver, and would not prevent the United States notes from rising above the par of silver when the people become satisfied that we were about to redeem or were preparing to redeem them in gold. Therefore the committee fixed on the amount of $20 as a fair compromise. I would greatly prefer to reduce it to $10; but I am willing to vote for $20. It is manifest that to make it $50 would entirely destroy our gold revenue, and probably cause the exportation of gold abroad and impair the volume of gold in the country.

It is objected that this measure is the entering wedge for the double standard; and very good men, specie-paying men, have made this objection, and it is therefore proper to answer it. I reply that we have always had a double standard, and generally to a greater extent than this bill allows. Until three years ago the dollar was a full legal tender. Since that time the United States have contracted no debt, and every existing debt could have been paid in dollars of that standard. Does it injure any man to restore it now and limit its legal-tender quality to $20?

We are asked, then, why was the old dollar omitted in the act of 1873? I answer that it was omitted practically by the act of 1853 by being undervalued. It was formally omitted from the silver coinage by the act of 1873 because it was then too valuable for circulating coin, and was made to replace the Spanish milled dollar with a commercial coin. Is there any reason why it should not be restored now when we can use it as an agency for the redemption of United States notes?

It is said that a silver coinage is in the interest of silver bullion and those who produce it. Certain Senators have even been designated in the House of Representatives as owning bullion in the West; "silver-clad Senators," I believe, has been the expression. I hope it will be a benefit, not only to the producer of the silver, but to the people who use it as money. I have always supported the policy of encouraging the production of iron, wool, and fabrics. Why not also of silver? The most common and the meanest of arguments against a measure is that it will help somebody. I am quite sure that this will help the body of the people; and that is the only interest I have in it certainly.

But, sir, the House of Representatives have also made this silver coin a tender for duties and interest on the public debt. I do not think it is necessary to waste much time about that. Our duties are by law made payable in gold and are set aside as a sacred fund to pay the interest on the public debt and to provide for a sinking fund.

Mr. BOGY. The law says "coin." It does not say "gold."

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that. It is set aside, however, in coin. Now, I ask the Senator, suppose we should receive silver coin into the Treasury of the United States in payment of duties, as it would be received almost exclusively in case $50 could be paid in silver, would you pay that silver money now, taking advantage of its depreciation, out to the public creditors who bought your bonds payable in gold coin of the present standard, weight, and fineness?

Mr. BOGY. No bonds are payable in gold that were issued before 1873; not one.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not suppose any one would desire to raise the question whether they should be paid in gold.

Mr. BOGY. That is another question; but the obligation was "coin" without one single exception until 1873.

Mr. SHERMAN. In 1862 when the act passed there was no coin in the United States except gold coin.

Mr. BOGY. Silver coin was just as much coin as gold at that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was not any of it, and you would not pay it then; you would not have paid the silver dollar then to the bondholder, because the silver was worth more than gold.

I do not care to discuss that matter much further. I know one thing, that the House of Representatives—I have reason to argue it, and I think I know it outside of that—never intended at all to interfere with our general law by which the customs duties are collected in gold, the change only being paid in silver, and that that gold should be used to redeem our promises. And, sir, any intimation by Congress, any effort by Congress to impair the public debt or the honor of the public debt, or its full payment in gold coin, would, in my judgment, do more harm than all the silver that can be issued under this or under any other law can do good. Anything that tends to destroy the public credit or the confidence of the creditors in our willingness and ability to pay, depreciates the value of our bonds, and brings them back to us for payment or for sale, and will prevent us from funding our debt at a lower rate of interest and availing ourselves of our present excellent credit. Therefore I hope in this debate there will be no suggestion which in the mind of the most timid man can induce a fear that we shall avail ourselves of the present circumstances to pay his bond in some other standard than that of gold coin. Therefore we except, from the operation of even the limited legal tender of the silver dollar here provided for customs duties. The same reason applies also to the interest on the public debt, with this additional reason that the bill as it stands now discriminates against the small holders of bonds. For instance, a man owns a thousand-dollar bond—a person in the country—and he could be paid his interest in silver dollars, for it is less than $50 in one payment, while the capitalist abroad who collects his coupons through a bank presents them in hundreds and thousands. He must be paid in gold coin by the bill as it passed the House, while the widow or small holders all over the United States who may hold small bonds would be paid their interest in silver coin. I think it is a discrimination against the small holders of bonds in favor of those who hold large sums. I take it, therefore, and I have no doubt that it was not the intention of the House to interfere with the law in this respect.

As to the legal-tender quality of the trade-dollar, I have already pointed out the necessity of changing the legal-tender quality or of abolishing the trade-dollar entirely. I was rather disposed for one to abolish it entirely, as making confusion; because we have two dollars so near each other. But as a matter of course the people who have built up a trade on the trade-dollar ought not to be deprived of it, except for some good reason; and we have required, in our amendments, that the trade-dollar shall be so different in its devices and emblems, that it can be readily distinguished from the general dollar.

Mr. WHYTE. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a single question in regard to that very point? The injustice of his amendment strikes me to be apparent against those persons who have sent silver bullion to the mints, and have been able to get no coin from the mints but the trade-dollars, and who have those trade-dollars on their hands now, coined at a time when the trade-dollar was a legal tender to a certain amount; and now, while they have that money in their possession, you take away from them its value as a legal tender.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have answered that as I went along. The trade-dollar was only intended as a commercial dollar, as a convenient mode of putting silver bullion for the benefit of depositors.

Mr. WHYTE. Still it was a legal tender to a certain extent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know; but we can change that. It is no harm to change that; and it is entirely within our power to change it. It does not do them any harm. These trade-dollars are worth more in China than they are in the United States to-day; so that as a matter of course the holders will have the benefit of the China market.

Mr. HOWE. They are worth more than the legal-tender dollar here.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; and everybody will take the trade-dollar for another silver dollar.

Mr. WHYTE. But you cannot sell it on this coast.

Mr. SHERMAN. I guarantee that I will find plenty of people in the city of Baltimore who will agree to take all the trade-dollars, and give silver dollars for them.

Mr. WHYTE. I can show you some of them in Baltimore now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will get some one over there to do it. There is no weight in that point. The trade-dollar is worth 3 or 4 per cent. more than the silver dollar.

Mr. President, some objection might have been made to this bill if we had authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to buy the bullion to make these dollars, but we did not. On the contrary, we simply carry into effect the spirit of the law of 1862, which authorized the sinking fund to be used in payment of any portion of the public debt, and to the extent that the sinking fund can be used to buy bullion and coin silver dollars with which to redeem fractional currency and redeem United States notes—to that extent the sinking fund may be used. That is a wise provision at all events, because now our bonds are so exceptionally high that under the sinking-fund law the Secretary has got, in buying bonds, to pay 18 per cent. premium, when there is a debt existing against the United States which must some time be paid in coin, which he will be at liberty under this bill to buy in silver and extinguish and put it out of existence, and add to the sinking fund.

Now, Mr. President, I am afraid I have wearied the Senate, but I have gone through this matter simply as a business matter. The exchange of silver coin for silver bullion is a profit to the Government of the United States. On the issuing of silver dollars the profit is several per cent.; on the issuing of subsidiary coin it is 6 per cent. more; and this profit more than pays all the expenses of the mints, saves all the expense of printing your fractional currency. The actual profit under this law will carry into the Treasury a surplus over and above all the expenses of the mints.

There are but two things more that are needed to make this bill, in my judgment, a complete financial measure. They are, first, to authorize any holder of greenbacks to convert them at his will and pleasure into a bond of the United States. Would to God that we had the courage now, without regard to party, to do this and give to every holder of these notes of ours the right at his will to convert them into a 4 per cent. bond running forty years! No considerable amount would be converted, in the present state of the market, into bonds now. Some would be. Those persons desiring a perfectly safe and long investment might convert their notes into 4 per cent. bonds in small sums; but as credit rises, and it is rising every day, these 4 per cent. bonds will advance to par in gold. What I would desire next is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convert our 6 per cent. bonds into 4½ per cent. thirty-year bonds. A bill has passed the Senate for that purpose, but yet sleeps in the House. Then authorize the holder of the notes to convert them at his will and pleasure into a 4 per cent. forty-year bond and there stop, and you will reach specie payments without a ripple on the current. These two bonds would approach each other in value; your notes would gradually be retired; silver would take their place—its natural place in the currency of the country. We are producing the silver, and our own products would be converted into our currency. Then our notes would gradually rise to par in gold. Then the circle of the rebellion, or the revolution, as our southern friends may call it—I prefer to call it by the old-fashioned name—would be finished——

Mr. DAVIS. Would you withdraw the greenbacks?

Mr. SHERMAN. As soon as greenbacks were at par with gold I would keep them afloat; but that is not in this bill. I merely alluded to it in passing.

There is another object that could be desired, and I think if the United States would now lead off in it it would undoubtedly be accomplished; that is to establish by international convention a unit of money of accounts, both of gold and silver. Advances have already been made to this Government by Great Britain, and a proposition is now pending looking to that end; and there is no doubt whatever that Germany would be glad to enter into the same international relation that was proposed in 1867, and which she then defeated and rejected. The difficulties and embarrassments in which Germany is now involved from the unforeseen effect of her own measures would make her eager to enter into a general monetary union or the extension of the Paris conference so as to make everywhere fifteen and a half ounces of silver equal to one of gold among all the nations of the world; to limit silver coinage to the token coinage or small change of the people, and make gold the standard of value, but silver the standard of labor and all minor accounts. By a convention between the leading nations, including Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, and the United States, which must find the gold and silver to carry this arrangement into effect, you would have a monetary unit, and you would then be free from the oscillations that we have met in our whole history, of gold disappearing and silver disappearing by turns, destroying the value of contracts and deranging all our monetary affairs.

Sir, I do not hope to accomplish these things now; but I see in this bill an opportunity to accomplish some good; and I believe that true statesmanship consists in doing the good you can, without seeking the unattainable, and therefore doing no good at all. Here we have an opportunity to monetize a portion of our silver product; to redeem a portion of our United States notes; to come back toward specie payments—all in the right direction. And the fact that this bill does not accomplish all I desire is no reason why I should delay it, oppose it, or antagonize it.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks rather in the nature of inquiries than discussion of this subject, for I have not had time to examine it.

I shall be glad to see silver introduced into the circulation of this country largely, and I shall be glad to see the proper silver coin made a legal tender for a much larger sum than is authorized by this bill; but there are several questions which I should like to have the Senator from Ohio, who has been paying much attention to this subject, answer. I sent this morning to an officer of the Treasury who is informed on the subject to obtain certain statements of values which I think it important that the Senate should consider in undertaking to decide this question.

In the first place, what is the value of the present silver coin; the old coinage and that which is now lying in the Treasury that has just come from our mints, which is still authorized and which is to go on after this bill shall have become a law; the coinage of half dollars, quarters, twenty-cent pieces, and ten-cent pieces? Taking the gold dollar as the standard of value, this mass of silver coin is to-day worth eighty-four and five-eighths cents on the dollar, a small fraction over eighty-four and a half cents.

Mr. SHERMAN. The subsidiary coin?

Mr. MORTON. The subsidiary coin; and its currency value to-day in greenbacks is ninety-five and eight-tenths cents. The new silver dollar proposed to be issued by this bill the Senator from Ohio says is the revolutionary dollar. I do not know that there is any merit to be given to it on that account; for when it was made the dollar gold and silver bore a different relation to each other from what they do now. Then that dollar was intended to be the equivalent of gold, so that the gold dollar and the silver dollar should be interchangeable. This dollar was established first upon that hypothesis. The dollar provided for in the third section of this bill may, therefore, be considered a new one; and its value is as follows: It contains according to this bill four hundred and twelve and eight-tenths grains of standard silver, or three hundred and seventy-one and fifty-two one hundredths of pure silver; and that dollar when it is issued will be worth, according to the gold dollar, ninety and seven-tenths cents. It will be nine cents and three mills under the gold par as soon as it comes into the world. It is depreciated coin to begin with.

Mr. BOGY. It is supposed that this depreciation will disappear when it is made a legal tender. Not being so now is the reason it is below the value of gold.

Mr. MORTON. Making this new dollar (which we will say to begin with is ten cents under par) a legal tender for $20 may add something to its value, but very little. Your legal-tender notes are a legal tender for all amounts, and they are all the money you now have to pay your debts with, and yet to-day they are 12 per cent. under par; and this new dollar that is to start out with a permanent depreciation of nine cents and three mills cannot be brought to par, nor will it have more than one or two cents added to it, in my judgment, by making it a legal tender for the small sum of $20. The currency value of this new dollar in greenbacks would be $1.027 to begin with. These values are based on the present price of silver, fifty-three and one-half pence per ounce standard, and the premium of gold 13¼, as it was last week. With silver at fifty-three and one-half pence sterling or $1.172 per ounce fine, a full-valued silver-coin dollar would have to contain four hundred and fifty-four and fifty-nine one-hundredths grains of standard silver or four hundred and nine and thirteen one-hundredths grains of pure silver. This dollar will contain three hundred and seventy-one and fifty-two one-hundredths grains of pure silver, and to make it equal to gold it would have to contain four hundred and nine and thirteen one-hundredths grains of pure silver.

I will call the attention of the Senator from Ohio, and I want him to inform me—perhaps everybody else understands it—what is to be the benefit of this coin. We shall then have four different standards of value in circulation: First, we shall have the subsidiary coin, some twenty millions of which are now in the Treasury, worth eighty-four and five-eights cents to-day; we shall then have the greenbacks, which are to-day worth eighty-eight cents; the fractional currency, being convertible into greenbacks, is worth the same sum, and is worth four cents more to-day than this subsidiary coin which we are now making, half dollars and quarters; and then we shall have this new coin, worth ninety and seven-tenths cents. That is the third currency we shall have in point of value; and then, fourth, we shall have the gold coin, worth one hundred cents. Here we have four different currencies differing in value, ranging from eighty-four to one hundred cents on the dollar.

Mr. President, what is to be the value of this coin, or rather what is to be the use of it; what is the office it is to perform? The fourth section of this bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange it for an equal amount of United States notes, greenbacks. The coin will start out worth ninety and seven-tenths cents, while the greenbacks to-day are worth eighty-eight cents. If there were $10,000,000 of this coin in the Treasury to-morrow to be converted into greenbacks there would be a great rush for it, because the holders of greenbacks would thereby realize two cents and seven mills by converting their greenbacks into the coin, and then they would take the coin to the melting-pot, get bullion, and sell it as bullion. But when the greenback gets above ninety-one cents, gets three mills above the value of this dollar which starts out at ninety cents and seven mills, there is no longer any conversion. No man will convert a greenback worth ninety-one cents into a currency worth ninety cents and seven mills; and if the greenback gradually appreciates, goes up to ninety-two cents, ninety-three cents, ninety-four cents, as we hope it will do and expect it will do under the law we have passed, who will convert his greenbacks into this coin? So far as the use of this coin is concerned, after the greenbacks are worth ninety-one cents there would be no use of it for the purpose of conversion. What is the next use to be made of this coin by the Secretary of the Treasury?

And he is authorized to exchange such silver coin at its nominal value for silver bullion at the market value, to be ascertained and announced from time to time by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Secretary is authorized to exchange these new coins, worth ninety cents and seven mills, for silver bullion at its market value and at the nominal value of the coin. What is the nominal value of the coin? One hundred cents. What is its actual value? Ninety cents. What is the market value of bullion? It is so much in gold. Now the idea that the Secretary of the Treasury can buy one dollar's worth of silver bullion in gold at the market value (for that is the way bullion is measured) for the nominal value of a coin that is worth only ninety cents and seven mills, is a thing I cannot understand. I hope my friend can explain this. I want to state that again. This bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange these coins at their nominal value—that is, their face value—for silver bullion at the market price. Who will do it? Will a man sell a gold dollar's worth of bullion for a silver dollar worth only ninety cents? I cannot understand it.

If we come to specie payments, as I hope we shall, here is a coin that is permanently depreciated. We talk about having a uniform currency. It is not subsidiary coin; it is not change. This dollar cannot be change, unless you abolish one-dollar bills. If we have nothing less than a two-dollar bill, then a silver dollar would be in the nature of change; but as long as you have one-dollar bills, either bank-notes or greenbacks, a silver dollar is not change.

To begin with, here is a difference of six cents in these two kinds of coin. I call the attention of the Senate to that. We now have silver coin worth eighty-four and five-eighths cents on the dollar. It is proposed now to make a new coin worth ninety and seven-tenths cents. There will be a difference of six cents and a little over one mill between these two coins to start with. Will these silver coins be interchangeable? Certainly not. The man who has these silver dollars worth ninety cents and seven mills will not exchange them for silver coins worth eighty-four and five-eighths cents, unless it is a matter of sheer necessity. Then these silver coins will not be interchangeable. The man who has subsidiary silver and wants silver dollars cannot exchange them either. Why? Because he proposes to give that which is worth eighty-four and one-half cents even for that which is worth ninety and seven-tenths cents. The man who holds the silver coin worth ninety and seven-tenths cents will not be able to see it in that light. You have two silver coins of different value and not interchangeable any more than gold and greenbacks are interchangeable. Why can you not exchange a greenback for gold coin even? Because one is worth more than the other; and when you have these two silver coins of different value they are not interchangeable, and you have confusion thrice confounded. The merchant in New York will have to regulate his stock in this way: "I will sell my goods for so much in subsidiary coin worth eighty-four and one-half cents; I will sell my goods for so much in greenbacks worth eighty-eight; I will sell my goods for so much in silver coin worth ninety and seven-tenths cents, and I will sell them for another price in gold worth one hundred cents on the dollar." Instead of having a uniform currency you create more confusion, it seems to me, than there is now.

Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Ohio to this question. If we are to make new silver coins, why not make them of the value of gold coin? Put enough silver into them and make them the equivalent of gold coin, so that they may circulate together and be interchangeable the one for the other. Then you can make it a legal tender for a large amount. I understand the Senator to say to-day that the depreciation of silver is not the result of the increased quantity, but of the action in Germany, the demonetization of silver; and he thinks that has gone as far as it will go; and therefore the depreciation of silver has ceased, and the prospect is that silver will increase in value instead of declining in value from this time. If we can make a silver coinage that is the equivalent of gold coin or very near it, that will circulate alongside of the gold coin, you can make that a legal tender for a much larger sum than $20. There was one question that I wanted to ask the Senator as he went along, and I will ask him now, if he will answer it. What is the difference between the value of the silver coin of Germany and the gold coin; take five thalers in silver and some gold coin representing the same sum, and I want to know what is the actual difference in the bullion value of the two coins?

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought my friend was here all the time I spoke, and so would have saved me the necessity of answering these questions; but I can answer every one of them seriatim, and, reversing the order in which he puts them, I will answer the last first.

He asks me what is the standard value of the German coins. I stated two or three times in the course of my remarks that it was fifteen and a half to one. That is now the legal fixed value of German silver coin. Fifteen and a half ounces of silver coin are issued as the equivalent of one ounce of gold coin. That is the German relation. Ours, however, was sixteen ounces of silver coin to one of gold coin, and our silver coin is worth more than the German coin; and yet theirs is at par in gold.

Now I will answer the next question. The Senator talks about the value of the subsidiary coin as eighty-four cents. Well, it is worth eighty-four cents for bullion no doubt; but as money it is worth a good deal more. To the extent of $5 it is worth gold. The subsidiary coin is received for customs to the extent of $5. It is worth greenbacks always any way. If it is not, try the people and see whether they will take it for greenbacks or not. The Senator's idea is a confounding of the value of silver as bullion and its value as money. Let us try it on paper. What is the value of the paper in a dollar bill? About one-tenth of one mill. As bullion it is worth one-tenth of a mill; but as money it is worth eighty-nine cents, my friend says. Silver is worth as much as money as paper money; certainly it cannot be worth less. The silver dollar we provide in this bill is worth 2 per cent. more than paper money is to-day, as my friend says. Therefore, in any way you take it, the silver money is worth more than paper. As bullion our silver is worth eighty-four cents on the dollar, and our paper is worth one-tenth of one mill; while as money they would naturally be in the same relation to each other.

In regard to the other question, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue these silver coins. As a matter of course, that is the exercise of discretionary power. He would issue them probably; and the notes would advance up to par with the silver coin. He would not probably pay them out until they were at par. When they were, he would pay them out to the extent that he had the silver on hand, to the extent that he could redeem the notes, and every note that he redeemed would add to the value of the remaining notes without diminishing the value of the silver.

But the Senator says, Why not make the silver dollar of the full value of the gold coin? The answer is that if we do that to-day, to-morrow it may change; the silver may go down or go up, and in either event it would be demonetized. The only way you can keep two coins in circulation together is by making one tributary to the other by limiting the amount, by limiting the legal-tender quality. In this way you keep the two both in circulation, and although their bullion value may change, their money value never changes. In England the shilling, worth only twenty-two cents, goes every day for gold and is exchanged for gold. The silver is worth as bullion twenty-two cents in the shilling, but it is worth twenty-four and three-tenths cents for money. My friend certainly ought to perceive the difference. Now the paper is not worth anything as bullion except the lamp-black and rags, but it is worth whatever the law fixes on it as money.

But my friend cannot see how the Director of the Mint can purchase bullion under this law. He does it now under the same law; that is, he has bought this bullion at so much an ounce. A man comes and says, "I have got one hundred ounces of bullion; what will you give me for it?" The Director of the Mint says, "The price to-day is $1.03 in gold per ounce; but if you will take currency I will give you one hundred and fourteen cents for it." Then the man says, "I will take it in gold; I prefer to sell it in gold;" or, "I will take it in currency;" the two having a fixed value day by day; and he sells an ounce of silver for one hundred and fourteen cents in currency. What does the Director of the Mint do with that ounce? He does not pay that ounce out at the same rate he gets it for. On the contrary, he coins that ounce of silver into $1.28 in money, pays it out in money, giving the man back only $1.14 in currency. That is what they do in England every day. They buy silver bullion of everybody for so much, sixty-six shillings for a pound sterling; but when they come to pay him for it they only pay him sixty-two shillings, keeping the balance as seigniorage. We do the same. That is the way we have bought all our gold and silver bullion since the organization of the Government, buying from private dealers at the market price and paying them in our own money at the money price. If my friend will keep in view the difference between the bullion value and the money value, he will have no difficulty in answering the question.

I believe I have now answered all the questions he put.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to my friend that he has missed the point entirely, I think. Now he says the bullion value of a greenback dollar is one-tenth of one mill. Is that any answer? What makes the greenback dollar to-day worth eighty-eight cents? Because of the promise of the Government to redeem it in coin, a promise that it is bound to carry out. That is what makes the greenback dollar worth eighty-eight cents to-day. Why are two silver half-dollars worth only eighty-four cents? It is because of the quantity of silver bullion that is in that dollar. When you come to compare gold coin and silver coin you estimate the relative value of the amount of bullion that is in each. My friend says there is a difference between the bullion value and the money value. What is that difference? The subsidiary coin is a legal tender for $5 and the greenback is a legal tender for any amount; but yet that does not make the legal-tender equal in value to gold and making the subsidiary coin a legal tender for $5 does not make it equivalent to the greenback that is worth eighty-eight cents when its intrinsic worth is only eighty-four cents. The point that I asked in regard to the German and French coin was this: What is the actual value of this coin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Fifteen and a half to one.

Mr. MORTON. But that still is not answering the question. I hold in one hand a German silver coin calling for $5; I hold in the other a German gold coin calling for $5. I want to know what is the actual difference in the intrinsic value of these two coins. In this country if I take $5 in silver and put it in one hand, and a gold five-dollar piece in the other, the actual difference in intrinsic value is nearly sixteen cents—fifteen and a half cents; and I want to know what the difference in the intrinsic value between $5 in a German silver coin and $5 in a German gold coin is. That is the point. The Senator says that in England there is a difference of nearly 6 per cent. between the shilling and the gold coin in its intrinsic value, and that the shilling still passes for twenty-four and three-tenths cents in common circulation. That may be as a mere matter of change in common use; but that is a small difference compared to what we have got. We have got nearly sixteen cents to begin with, and yet we talk about honest money. We make a coin sixteen cents depreciated, to begin with, the equivalent of a gold coin worth one hundred cents, and are here proposing to make a coin almost 10 per cent. depreciated the equal of a gold coin. Talking about honest money, it seems to me that is not much more honest than the greenback which we have heard denounced so much, and the failure to redeem which, we are told, is the disgrace of the age and of our civilization.

I want to see a uniform currency; and if we are to have a silver currency and a silver dollar, why not make that silver dollar the value of the gold dollar, or so near it, perhaps saving out enough for the cost of coinage and the waste, say about one cent and a quarter, that they shall be interchangeable, that they will pass side by side in the commerce and trade of the country? Then the silver coin would not go abroad because it is not the standard over there where they have taken gold. Being a shade less than gold coin in point of value, it would not be its equivalent for circulation; but in common circulation, if you will put them within a cent or two of each other, they will go for each other and exchange with each other. I can remember when before the war the five-franc piece, worth only ninety-five cents, was actually received for one dollar in circulation; and the silver dollar, worth ninety-eight cents, that is to say the ninety-eight cents of silver bullion in it being in the commerce of the world worth two cents less than the gold dollar, would still pass in common circulation along with gold coin of this country and became a part of the permanent circulation of this country; but when it is depreciated sixteen cents, as it is now with our present coin, or nearly ten cents with this new coin, they never will go together. There will be no use for this new silver coin. It will not float along with your greenbacks after the greenback gets over ninety-one. It never will circulate alongside of the gold dollar. What is the use of it? What office is it to perform? If we are to have a measure, let it be a practical measure. I should like to see a silver coin adapted to the new state of things. When this old coin was first authorized by law in 1792 the value of silver was different. It has changed and perhaps permanently changed. Why not adapt ourselves to the change? We cannot undo that change. The Senator says perhaps the value of silver will go back. It may, but it is not likely to do so in our life-time. I hope it may appreciate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought I assured the Senator from Indiana many times that our silver coin is now worth more, ounce per ounce, than that of any nation in the world. Did he not hear me say that to-day our silver coin is worth more and the dollar we provide in this bill is worth more than the coin of Germany, or the coin of France, or the coin of England, or the coin of any other nation? and yet the coin of these nations is maintained at par in gold. The people of California and Texas who use our silver dollars, although they are worth as bullion only eighty-four cents, pay gold coin for them; and they cannot get them in any other way, because we being the only makers can control our sales of them so as to keep them at any standard we may fix. So, we being the only makers, the United States may convert lampblack and rags, worth one-tenth of one mill, into a note worth a dollar or very nearly that. That is all there is of it. The Senator from Indiana certainly ought to see that.

Mr. MORTON. One word. The greenback, although made of lampblack and rags, has the promise of the Government to redeem it in gold at par. The silver dollar worth ninety cents to begin with is not to be redeemed; it is never to be worth more than ninety cents. That is the difference.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I was not aware that this question would come up this morning; and therefore I am not prepared to go into it at length, and, after the interesting and perhaps technical speech of the Senator from Ohio, it is probably less necessary; but let me congratulate the Senate and the country upon the sound position taken by the Senator from Indiana; and I hope my indorsement will not injure him.

I most cordially agree with the Senator from Ohio in being ready to circulate a larger amount of silver, provided we can raise it so that it shall be equal to the standard of gold. It seems to me that the Senator from Ohio, in making his argument, has attempted rather a wide straddle, to make it include a double circulation of gold and silver; and yet his argument, if it is worth anything, is worth most in favor of a change to a silver currency alone.

This bill appears to me a very incongruous one. It comes here with a proposition at the head to supply a deficiency in the Treasury for the printing of legal-tender notes; and yet attached to it is a proposition that is to revolutionize our whole established custom from the foundation of the Government in relation to legal tender in coin; and I regret to say that, when I see the Senator from Ohio advocating a bill like this, I think we are right on the brink of Niagara; we are just about ready to go over. What is the proposition here? The proposition is to make silver dollars a legal tender, the House proposition to the amount of $50 and the amendment to the extent of $20. I admit that this bill will not accomplish the main purpose or, if not the purpose, the ultimate result without further and additional legislation; but I say that it is a blundering attempt to introduce nothing but silver as the legal tender of the country and to utterly abolish the use of gold. When we have taken this step, the next will be at less cost for a greater introduction of the system of silver legal tender.

The Senator from Ohio admits in his argument and in the authorities he cites that in all cases the currency of less value will drive out of practical use the currency of greater value. Therefore, if silver shall be introduced now at its present value, it will, as a matter of course, drive out gold. And yet the Senator says that this is the same identical coin that was started in the Revolution. Is not that rather an unfair statement when he knows that even since the introduction of the trade-dollar silver has gone down from 103 to 91? Between the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the price of silver, after the discovery of the mines of Potosi and other mines in Mexico and Peru, went down 60 per cent. It has gone down within a few years some 15 or 16 per cent. We know that all over our western country, in Montana as well as Nevada, there are very valuable silver mines that are increasing the product much more largely than the discovery of the mines in Mexico and Peru did. Those mines produced to the extent of $12,000,000 to $20,000,000 each annually; and yet the mines we have in Nevada exceed them beyond all comparison.

I am quite ready to accede to the proposition of making a double currency, provided it can be made equivalent one for the other, but I am utterly averse to the attempt to introduce two currencies, one of which shall be 10 or 12 or 15 per cent. less than the other.

The Senator from Ohio maintains that the silver currency of Europe is now at par, but it seems to me he gave us the facts which showed conclusively why it was kept at par: simply because the amount was limited.

Now, so far as the exchange of silver for our fractional currency is concerned, I am heartily and cordially in favor of it. I think it ought to have been done before. That would give us between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 in circulation of the subsidiary coinage, and these, being mere tokens of money, would pass current and be kept at par; but the Senator from Ohio has no clause in this bill limiting the amount. It is merely limited by the proposition to make $20 or $50 the amount that shall be tendered in any one sum as legal tender.

It seems to me that this is altogether too grave a question to be tacked on to a little deficiency bill. It never ought to have been here except as a separate and independent proposition, to be thoroughly considered and discussed by all Senators. There are many here who could contribute some knowledge, some valuable information on this subject, and it is in my opinion wrong, radically wrong, to attempt to force a measure of this kind through upon a deficiency bill.

Mr. President, I do not like to delay the Senate when I have not even at hand the documents that I have at home on this subject, and I shall not detain the Senate this morning, for I have no idea that this bill is going to pass to-day, or to-morrow, or even next week. It will have to be thoroughly discussed and considered before a question involving all the points that this bill involves can be passed by this body, I am very confident.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I think it very possible that I am the only Senator who is out and out in favor of making silver a legal tender without any limit whatsoever; and it is my wish at the proper time to give my views upon that subject. Enough has been said today by the different Senators who have spoken to show the magnitude of the question, and the question is more important to us than to any other people of the world, and more important at this time, when we consider our large amount of paper issue, our large amount of bonded debt, the condition that we are in of non-resumption, the attempt that we are making to resume at an early day, the fact that there is in this country but a limited amount of gold to redeem a very large amount of paper money, the fact that the balance of trade is largely against us every year, and the further fact that we have to provide in coin every year an amount upward of $100,000,000 to pay the debt which we owe, the debt which is owing by the Federal Government, by the State governments, by the city governments, by individuals, and by railroad companies. All these combined make this question, as was well said by the Senator from Ohio at the outset of his speech, the most important in the range of political science.

Again, we see it assumes the form of a constitutional question, and a very nice question. Has the Congress of the United States the power to say what shall and what shall not be a legal tender in execution of contracts between the citizens of each State? That is a question which is worthy of discussion. The Constitution says that "no State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." That being so, clearly each State has the power to make "gold and silver," not "gold or silver," a legal tender. That being so, can the Congress restrain that? I say the subject is worthy of discussion. I hold that it is not impossible to make silver as a currency equal to gold. I hold that it is equal to gold to-day in all countries where the double standard is recognized. While it may be true and is true that gold intrinsically is more valuable than silver, nevertheless, if you establish the ratio between the two for all purposes for which money is used in trade and in commerce, one will be as good as the other.

The Senator from Ohio alluded a while ago to the fact that the public credit is of so delicate a nature that the mere whispering in this body that we had the most distant idea of paying our obligations in silver would affect the public credit. That may be so; nevertheless it is always well to face the dangers that may exist, nationally and individually, and not to skulk. Now the fact is that all our obligations, without one single exception, up to the year 1873 are not payable in gold; they are payable in "coin." It is a further fact that the duties are not required to be collected in gold, although that has been said not once but a thousand times. The duties are to be paid in "coin." It is a further fact, which cannot be successfully disputed, that at the time the law was passed coin in this country was composed of two well-known metals, gold and silver, and therefore the duties could be paid as well in one metal as in the other, as well in silver as in gold. Since 1873 we have made our bonds payable in gold, but up to that time they were not.

Mr. President, I do not rise at this time to discuss the subject. I can very well see that the Senate is somewhat weary. I desire to do so at a future day, and I must hope that the Senator from Ohio will not urge his bill to a vote to-day. The subject is too important; it is too vast and too complicated; and not only to-day, but it is a subject which should be discussed with care and with great labor. We did commit a blunder once in regard to this very question. In 1873 the silver money of this country was demonetized by an amendment to a bill not germane to the subject without any discussion in this body or out of this body, by the public press or by anybody in this country. By a mere amendment to a bill regulating the Mint the silver coinage of this country was demonetized, and gold was made the only standard and the gold dollar the unit of value. I say it was a very great mistake, and we have been laboring from that time to the present under that mistake. It can be demonstrated, I think, that we in this country can freely part with our gold which we annually produce from our mines, and if we retain nothing but silver as the circulating medium of this country the nation would not be injured, if we had enough silver. With 40,000,000 of people in this country we could very well, without suffering any great bad effects, use $400,000,000 of silver coin. I say more, that we could very well afford to part with our gold to pay off the balance against us annually which we owe to foreign nations and retain our silver; and unless we do increase the basis of our metallic money we cannot. The production of gold to-day is not equal to the export of gold from this nation; and it is a question of a very few years when the last gold dollar will be on its way from the shores of this country to the shores of the Old World. These are all great facts which should be discussed.

The speech of the Senator from Ohio was certainly something very remarkable and very singular. I admit its ability and I admit the fact that he has well and laboriously investigated the subject. I have no question about that; but, while he advocates in an able way the utility, the value, the wisdom of the double standard, he yet concludes by advocating a bill which is not the double standard. It is of very little consequence as a financial proposition that you make silver a legal tender for $20. That will absorb but very little money. It will not relieve the wants of the people; it is too small.

I hold that silver and gold are the money of the Constitution, and that it is not competent for Congress to restrain it. It is not within the power of Congress to prevent silver from being a legal tender. I hold that you can to-day go to the custom-house and tender your duties in silver, and if the question was brought before the Supreme Court of the United States the tender would be held to be a legal tender. I have no doubt of it. If these legal propositions are true, let us not try to avoid the discussion; let us meet them. If they are not true, let them be proved not to be true. This subject was discussed at the very beginning of the Government. At the time the Mint was created in 1792 the subject was discussed by the ablest financial mind of that day, Mr. Hamilton, and, for reasons given in that remarkably able report of his, silver and gold were looked upon as the two royal precious metals for us to use in this country.

Mr. President, I do not know exactly how to go at the subject. I am not in favor of voting on this bill to-day. I will therefore move, if it is a proper motion, that the subject be postponed until Thursday week.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to state to the Senate what I know officially, that the passage of the first and second sections of this bill immediately is very important; that the country at large is getting scarce of change. As a matter of course, under the law as it now stands, the Treasury cannot issue fractional currency, because they have no appropriation to print it; nor have they issued the silver coin, and there is no appropriation to print United States notes. So there is a necessity for passing the first and second sections of this bill. I therefore venture to suggest whether we cannot, by unanimous consent, pass the first and second sections of the bill, leaving out the third section, promising that the Committee on Finance will consider the matter and report to the Senate on that subject, so that it may be considered.

Mr. BOGY. I have never yet seen the necessity of the first section of this bill; because, if I understand the subject at all, the Secretary of the Treasury is now authorized to issue silver coin in lieu of fractional currency.

Mr. SHERMAN. The first section of the bill appropriates money to enable him to make and issue United States notes. They have no money now; the whole Printing Bureau is stopped. As for the silver coin, I suppose——

Mr. BOGY. I have never seen the policy of that bill. They have $15,000,000 now; why not issue that to redeem the fractional currency? I do not see the utility of that section.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There are nearly one hundred national banks without notes who want them.

Mr. BOGY. But we must understand each other. The passage of this law is not going to put any money into the Treasury. You have fifteen millions there now; no more, no less; he is authorized to pay that out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have been unfortunate in making myself understood. I say there is an immediate necessity for the passage of the first and second sections of the bill; and I am endeavoring to suggest a mode in which the third section may be reserved and the Senator debate it to his heart's content. But the first and second sections, together with an amendment in regard to national banks, ought to be adopted; and I think the House will agree to that, reserving the consideration of the legal-tender question for another bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Does the Senator propose to amend the bill?

Mr. WITHERS. I ask the Senator if it is possible to do that without taking out the third section.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly not; and I was about to propose to strike out the third section of the bill and pass the first and second sections, and then take up the subject of the third section as an independent proposition.

Mr. BOGY. I do not want your speech to go without an answer. It is too good a speech to lose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will promise my friend a chance to make a speech on the very day he names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion made by the Senator from Missouri to postpone to a day certain takes precedence.

Mr. BOGY. Just one word. The first section makes an appropriation to the amount of $163,000, I think, for the printing of this fractional currency. I presume that is the fact.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, not fractional currency, but United States notes—greenbacks.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is apparent from the communication of the Comptroller of the Currency that it is very important the first section of the bill should pass. I do not speak of anything more than that section which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and to which that committee have authorized me to propose an amendment. It is vastly important that that part of the bill should pass, in order to supply the means for printing the legal-tender notes and also to supply the national banks with currency. According to the schedule handed to me, there are one hundred and ninety-five banks distributed over the country that are without currency, without bank-notes, and they will be in that condition until this or some other bill passes by which provision shall be made for supplying those notes. It seems to me the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio is eminently fit and proper that we pass so much of the bill as makes this appropriation, and remit other portions to the Finance Committee, to be reported upon and discussed hereafter. I should greatly hope that that course would be pursued.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to accomplish that object I will move that the third section be stricken out. I withdraw the amendments of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And the fourth section?
